Moscow Wants To Lead London Investigation Into Litvinenko Case. The Washington Post (1/13, A16, Finn, Jordan, 690K) reports Russian investigators "want to interview more than 100 people in London and conduct dozens of searches across the city" as part of their inquiry into the death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko. "Prosecutors declined to name any of the people they wish to question," and the Post says the proposal "far exceeds the scope of British inquiries in Moscow, which amounted to a few interviews with Russian businessmen who met with Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1, the suspected date of the poisoning." The probe "is likely to unsettle some Russians who live in London and are fiercely opposed to the rule of President Vladimir Putin."

The New York Times (1/13, Broad, 1.16M) focuses on the emerging US angle to the story, noting, "Health officials in the United States have begun to tell some people who traveled to London last year that they may want to be tested for exposure to" polonium-210. The CDC "said yesterday that the notification process began this week after health authorities in London gave them a list of people who may have been exposed to" the poison that killed Litvinenko.

Bangladeshi Former Central Banker Takes Over Caretaker Government. The Financial Times (1/13, Johnson, Joehnk) details Fakhruddin Ahmed's assumption of temporary power in Dhaka. "A fresh attempt to break the deadlock between Bangladesh's two feuding political families had a shaky start on Friday night as a new head of a caretaker government took office under the cover of an army-backed state of emergency." A former governer of the central bank, Fakhruddin Ahmed "replaced President Iajuddin Ahmed as head of the caretaker government, whose principal function had been to oversee free and fair elections later this month. But there is now no indication of when they may take place." Iajuddin Ahmed resigned Thursday, and "analysts on Friday night likened the situation in the fourth most populous Muslim nation to a 'hidden coup,' saying they expected that a team of technocrats would govern Bangladesh for a lengthy period before it" will hold elections.

NYTimes Implores US, UN To Move Quickly To Back New Elections. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/13, 1.16M) says Bangladesh "is lurching in a dangerous direction," and "only strong pressure from the United States and international help will keep [the] country from slipping further off a democratic path." Calling Iajuddin Ahmed's state of emergency declaration "a particularly disturbing development," the Times says Washington "should use its substantial political influence to urge the government to restore suspended rights immediately." Calling Bangladesh "one of the poorest and most politically polarized countries in the world," the Times adds that the "international community needs to help it build a stable democracy -- the best underpinning for development -- starting with swift, internationally guaranteed elections."

Envoy Touts Enhanced Chinese "Engagement" With Sudan. The Washington Post (1/13, A13, Cody, 690K) reports Darfur special envoy Andrew Natsios "said Friday that China has pushed the Sudanese government recently to help resolve the bloody Darfur conflict and ease the plight of the region's nearly 3 million refugees." That "intervention marked a shift from past policy under which Beijing seemed reluctant to use its influence in Sudan, according to" Natsios, who is quoted saying, "I think they're engaging much more aggressively." AFP (1/13) notes Natsios "said he had held surprisingly positive talks in Beijing this week and that he expected China to play a greater role in helping to end the conflict in Darfur."

Isabel Peron Arrested In Spain For Human Rights Abuses. The New York Times (1/13, Rohter, 1.16M) reports, "Acting at the request of Argentine officials, the Spanish police on Friday detained María Estela de Perón, the former president of Argentina and the widow of the founder of the ruling party, as part of a broadening investigation by the Peronist government of Argentina into past human rights abuses there." A provincial judge ordered Isabel Peron detained "for questioning regarding the disappearance of a student during her time in power. Almost simultaneously, a judge in Buenos Aires authorized the arrest of two other officials with ties to the late José López Rega, who was Gen. Juan Perón's private secretary and later Ms. Perón's closest adviser." The Times says Peron is "blamed" for directing the killing of over 1,500 political opponents during her 20 months in power.

The AP (1/13, Heckle) notes Spain's National Court "ordered [Peron's] conditional release pending an extradition request from Argentina. The court said Argentina has 40 days to file an extradition request and Peron has to appear at a police station every 15 days." The AP calls her "chaotic" 1974-76 rule "a time when shadowy right-wing violence destabilized Argentina," and says Peron's "arrest marked the expansion of Argentina's human rights investigations beyond dictatorship-era crimes to the death squads that terrorized the nation prior to the 1976 coup."

In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (1/13, McDonnell, 850K) says Peron's detention "signaled an expansion of human rights cases here beyond the former military junta to the epoch of ex-strongman" Juan Peron.

Writer Backs US Embrace Of Cuba As Hedge Against Iran, Venezuela. In an op-ed in today's Wall Street Journal (1/13, A13, Loyola, 2.04M), the Foundation for the Freedom of Democracies' Mario Loyola writes, "With Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad visiting Venezuela today, it might be a good time to consider another 'change in course' for U.S. policy. The isolation of Cuba, a legacy of the Cold War, is pushing that country closer to America's most dangerous enemies." Saying the "advocates for the current policy -- chiefly three intransigent Cuban-American representatives in Congress -- are increasingly alone," Loyola says continued Cuban closeness to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez "would be terrible for the U.S."

IRANIAN NATIONAL PLEADS GUILTY TO CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT VISA FRAUD IN CONNECTION WITH A VISAS-FOR-SALE SCHEME AT THE U.S. CONSULATE IN DUBAI, UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

WASHINGTON – An Iranian national has pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit visa fraud before the Honorable Ricardo M. Urbina in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division announced today.

Shahram Shajirat, a citizen of Iran, was indicted in January 2004 along with his wife and co-conspirator, Soraya Marghi, in connection with a visas-for-sale ring operated out of the U.S. Consulate in Dubai, United Arab Emirates in the summer of 1999. Through this scheme, at least 25 Iranian men, women and children purchased U.S. non-immigrant visas from Shajirat and Marghi for travel to the United States without undergoing the required security protocols. As part of his plea of guilty, Shajirat will cooperate fully with U.S. authorities to identify each of the visa recipients who illegally received non-immigrant visas.

The conspiracy charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a fine of $250,000. Judge Urbina set a sentencing date for April 12, 2007.

Marghi, who has dual Canadian and Iranian citizenship, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit visa fraud in connection with the same illegal scheme before Judge Urbina on October 20, 2005. Marghi has cooperated with U.S. authorities.

The case is being prosecuted by Matthew C. Solomon and William J. Corcoran of the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division, headed by Acting Chief Edward C. Nucci. The case is being investigated by the Visa Fraud Branch of the Diplomatic Security Service of the U.S. Department of State.

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Prepared Remarks, Gonzales Criticizes Judges For Terror Rulings. The AP (1/17, Jordan) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says federal judges are unqualified to make rulings affecting national security policy, ramping up his criticism of how they handle terrorism cases." The AP continues, "In remarks prepared for delivery Wednesday, Gonzales says judges generally should defer to the will of the president and Congress when deciding national security cases. He also raps jurists who 'apply an activist philosophy that stretches the law to suit policy preferences.' … The text of the speech, scheduled for delivery at the American Enterprise Institute, was obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press. It outlines, in part, what qualities the Bush administration looks for when selecting candidates for the federal bench. … 'We want to determine whether he understands the inherent limits that make an unelected judiciary inferior to Congress or the president in making policy judgments,' Gonzales says in the prepared speech. 'That, for example, a judge will never be in the best position to know what is in the national security interests of our country.'" The AP adds, "Gonzales did not cite any specific activist jurists, or give examples of national security cases, in his prepared text. The Justice Department is appealing an August decision by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit, who ruled the government's warrantless surveillance program unconstitutional and ordered it stopped immediately. … The Justice Department appealed her decision and the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati has ruled that the administration can keep the program in place during the appeal."

Gonzales Says Legal Challenges Are Cause Of Guantanamo Trial Delays. The AP (1/17, Jordan) reports, "Trials for detainees at Guantanamo Bay have been delayed because of numerous challenges by their own lawyers, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday in defending the Bush administration's treatment of terror suspects. … A leading human rights attorney called the attorney general's comments 'a convoluted view of the world.'" The AP continues, "Gonzales, meeting with Associated Press reporters and editors, said the trials of terror detainees may begin as early as this summer, and that rules for military commissions in carrying them out will be sent to Capitol Hill this week. … But he acknowledged the delays, of up to five years in some cases, in deciding the legal fate of detainees being held at the military facility in Cuba. … 'It's not for lack of trying,' Gonzales said. 'We are challenged every step of the way.' … 'A lot will depend on the courts and the legal challenges brought by detainees at Guantanamo,' he said. 'But we are trying as hard as we can to bring these individuals to justice.'" The AP adds, "Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, called Gonzales' remarks 'a convoluted view of the world.' … 'We've been trying for five years to get the majority of the detainees in federal court,' Ratner said. 'They've resisted from the first day, when they took people to Guantanamo.' … The Guantanamo issue was one of several topics during the hourlong AP interview that had Gonzales on the defensive over Bush administration policies criticized by Democrats and civil libertarians as overstepping legal boundaries. … Others included: … Little-known but recently revealed powers authorizing the Pentagon to examine banking records of Americans suspected of terrorism or espionage. Congress authorized such investigations decades ago, and recently affirmed them in the USA Patriot Act, but some lawmakers question whether it is an improper expansion of the Defense Department's domestic role. … 'If Congress gives them the authority, I think they probably ought to be exercising that authority in connection with national security investigations,' Gonzales said." The AP (1/17) distributes excerpts of the interview with Attorney General Gonzales.

FNC On the Record with Greta Van Susteren (1/16, 10:38 p.m.) broadcasted, "Alberto Gonzales blamed delays on attorneys, 'We are challenged every step of the way.' Military officials saying 60 to 80 detainees will be charged and brought to trial. Gonzales says the trials May start sometime this summer."

Stimson Apologizes For Gitmo Remarks. The Washington Post (1/17, White, 690K) reports that deputy assistant secretary for detainee affairs Cully Stimson, "who criticized large U.S. law firms for representing terrorism suspects at the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has apologized for his comments, saying that his discussion on a local radio program does not reflect his 'core beliefs.'" Stimson's letter to the editor appears in the Washington Post (1/17, 690K).

Law Deans Blast Stimson's Remarks. The New York Sun (1/17, Gerstein) reports, "More than 130 deans of American law schools have signed a letter deploring a Pentagon official's statement criticizing major law firms for representing detainees at Guantanamo Bay." The Sun continues, "The law deans wrote that they were 'appalled' by an interview last week in which the Pentagon's point man on detainee affairs, Charles Stimson, said corporations should be disturbed by the law firms' pro bono work for detainees and might want to reconsider sending business to the firms involved. … 'We find Secretary Stimson's statement to be contrary to basic tenets of American law,' the deans wrote. 'Our American legal tradition has honored lawyers who, despite their personal beliefs, have zealously represented mass murderers, suspected terrorists, and Nazi marchers…. In a free and democratic society, government officials should not encourage intimidation of or retaliation against lawyers who are fulfilling their pro bono obligations.'" The Sun adds, "A Pentagon spokesman said Friday that Mr. Stimson's views were not shared by the department's leadership. The letter asks the administration to repudiate the statement. … The missive was circulated by the dean of Yale Law School, Harold Hongju Koh, and the dean of Northeastern University's law school, Emily Spieler. The signers include the deans of law schools at Columbia, Fordham, New York University, and New York Law School."

Stimson Criticized For Comments On Detainee Representation. In an op-ed for Washingtonpost.com (1/17), CBS News legal analyst Andrew Cohen writes, "Here is how our executive branch last week waged its legal war on terrorism against the detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. While federal lawyers and intelligence officials earnestly prepared behind the scenes to put on trial some of the major terror suspects, a skuzzy Pentagon lawyer was front and center on the radio attacking the motives and integrity and even the patriotism of detainee defense attorneys and the law firms that support them." Cohen continues, "If there is nothing surprising about a group of prosecutors preparing for trial…it is…downright shocking that a government attorney would denigrate the work of attorneys and their colleagues who have chosen to help men who sometimes quite literally have no one else on their side. The malfeasant culprit is a man named Charles 'Cully' Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, and there is simply no excuse for the tone or the tenor of the remarks he made Thursday on Federal News Radio." Cohen adds, "What Stimson said, and why, and how, constitutes conduct unbecoming a member of government and a member of the bar. One hand may be acting aggressively, if not mercifully and justly, toward prosecuting suspected terrorists. But the other hand, Stimson's hand, is undercutting the very principles we fight for. This is how our government waged the legal war on terror in our name last week."

The Boston Herald (1/17) editorializes, "Well, it's official now: Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs Charles 'Cully' Stimson has made himself a household name virtually overnight with a comment that is beyond idiotic. … Interviewed by Federal News Radio on the fifth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo Bay prison, Stimson said, 'It's shocking . . . The major law firms in this country . . . are out there representing detainees.' … Then the former Navy lawyer went so far as to suggest a boycott of those firms, noting, 'when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms.'" The Herald adds, "A Pentagon spokesman has already distanced the Defense Department from Stimson's comments. And Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told The New York Times [NYT], 'Good lawyers representing the detainees is the best way to ensure that justice is done in these cases.' … Anyone clueless about that concept ought to be out the door."

DOJ Letter Details Problems With Prosecuting Detainee Abuse. The New York Times (1/17, Johnston) reports, "A Justice Department team responsible for reviewing accusations of abuse of detainees by civilian government employees in Iraq and Afghanistan has encountered 'delays' and 'unique difficulties,' the department said in a letter on Tuesday." The Times continues, "The letter, to Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, said prosecutors found that some accusations were not credible. Some victims could not be identified, it said, and a few had been released from custody and could not be found. … In one case, two lawyers were prepared to travel to an unidentified Middle Eastern country to interview people who say they had been abused, but canceled the trip because the country's officials refused to allow the prosecutors to meet with them. .. 'As with an American suspected of a crime, those Americans who are the subject of the referrals are innocent until proven guilty,' the letter said. 'When career prosecutors conclude that we cannot prove allegations of a crime beyond a reasonable doubt, the department — consistent with its longstanding practices and policies — will not prosecute.'" The Times adds, "The Justice Department provided the report in response to questions posed by Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, who in a letter on Dec. 18 asked government lawyers for a progress report. Democrats have expressed skepticism about the department's inability to bring cases to trial. … The letter described the reasons no charges would be brought in most of the cases, saying, 'All were declined for insufficient evidence to warrant criminal prosecution for one or more of the following reasons: insufficient evidence of criminal conduct; insufficient evidence of the subject's involvement; insufficient evidence of criminal intent; low probability of conviction.' … A government lawyer who worked on some of the cases said Tuesday that the problems made prosecutions unlikely in nearly all of the 21 abuse accusations the team reviewed. … But the official, who did not want to speak on the record about pending investigations, said prosecutors had tried hard to assemble cases."

9th Circuit Tosses Ressam Sentence. The AP (1/17, Kravets) reports, "A federal appeals court on Tuesday threw out the sentence of a man who was convicted of plotting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport at the turn of the millennium." The AP continues, "Ahmed Ressam was arrested near the U.S.-Canadian border in December 1999 after customs agents found 124 pounds of explosives in the trunk of his car. … Prosecutors said he was intent on bombing the airport on the eve of the millennium. The arrest raised fears of terrorism attacks and prompted the cancellation of millennium celebrations at Seattle's Space Needle." The AP adds, "Ressam was sentenced to 22 years in prison after being convicted off all nine charges. On Tuesday, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco reversed his conviction on one of the charges and sent the case back to a lower court to issue a new sentence and explain the rationale behind the 22-year term. No new sentencing date was immediately set. … The decision does not necessarily mean Ressam will get a shorter term. Judges are given wide latitude to sentence defendants as they see fit. … Defense attorney Thomas Hillier II said the reversal might not reduce his client's sentence but 'helps in fending off the government's argument that the original sentence was too lenient.' … Emily Langlie, spokesman for U.S. attorney John McKay in Seattle, said the government was mulling whether to ask the 9th Circuit to rehear the case with 15 judges. They maintain Ressam should get a 35-year term."

The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Weinstein) reports, "U.S. 9th Circuit Judge Pamela Ann Rymer, writing for the majority, referred to the fact that the U.S. Supreme Court and the 9th Circuit are considering cases that are expected to have a significant impact on federal sentencing law. … Consequently, District Judge John C. Coughenour will have to wait for those decisions, said Thomas W. Hillier II, the federal public defender in Seattle, who is representing Ressam." The Times notes, "Ressam left his native Algeria for France in 1992 and two years later fled to Canada after being arrested on an immigration violation. While in Montreal in 1998, Ressam met an Al Qaeda operative who recruited him for a training camp in Afghanistan. According to Tuesday's ruling, Ressam spent six months at a training camp, learning how to fire a rocket-propelled grenade launcher and make explosive charges, and 'how to destroy infrastructure targets, such as power plants, military installations, railroads and airports,' Rymer wrote. … Later, Ressam went to a second camp near Jalalabad, where he and others "hatched the plot to target a U.S. airport to coincide with the millennium," the judge added. .. .In December 1999, Ressam left British Columbia in a rented Chrysler loaded with explosives, electronic timing devices, detonators, fertilizer and aluminum sulfate. After he crossed by ferry to Port Angeles, Wash., an alert customs inspector, Diana Dean, noticed that he was agitated and asked other agents to search his car. … They found component parts of a bomb hidden in the trunk's tire well. Ressam was arrested and indicted. The case was transferred to Los Angeles because of heavy pretrial publicity in the Northwest."

Bloomberg (1/17, Gullo) reports, "The U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco said today the sentence should be recalculated in part because the court overturned one of Ressam's convictions, for carrying an explosive during the commission of a felony. The charge carried a 10-year minimum sentence under federal guidelines. … 'We vacate the entire sentence so that the district court can resentence in light of this decision and developments in the law of sentencing,' the court said in its ruling." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. Justice Department had sought a tougher sentence for Ressam after he stopped cooperating with investigators.

The 9th Circuit declined to address the government's appeal because of its reversal of one of his convictions. … 'We are studying the ruling to determine whether or not to seek an appeal,' said Dean Boyd, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington."

Author Of Controversial Terror Memo Takes Podium At U Of Minnesota Law School. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (1/17, Tosto) reports, "It may be the most anxiously awaited constitutional law class ever at the University of Minnesota. … At the podium Tuesday will stand Robert Delahunty. A recognized scholar and U.S. Justice Department veteran, he is better known as co-author of one of the most controversial legal opinions in the nation's war on terrorism. … His one-term appointment to the U triggered waves of praise — and scorn — from students and faculty in the fall." The Pioneer-Press continues, "While he's kept a low profile, supporters and detractors continue to slug it out in letters and on the Web. The latest volley came two weeks ago, when eight of Delahunty's former Justice Department bosses wrote to praise him — and to scold U professors for deriding his hiring as being akin to the U paying Enron executives to teach accounting." The Pioneer-Press adds, "Written while Delahunty was a Justice attorney, the 2002 memo concluded al-Qaida and Taliban prisoners were not protected by international treaties or federal law. … Critics charged the memo paved the way for the Bush administration to mistreat prisoners and ignore the Geneva Conventions. Amnesty International has called for Delahunty and other attorneys to be investigated for failing to meet professional standards in advising the president — accusations his supporters ridicule. … Delahunty joined the University of St. Thomas Law School faculty in 2004. The St. Thomas law dean defended Delahunty then, noting his "long and distinguished career" working for several presidents, including Bill Clinton. … He fell out of the public eye until last fall, when the U began looking to fill a constitutional law teaching slot after a professor took an unexpected leave."

Trial Of Would-Be London Subway Bombers Underway. The Washington Post (1/17, A10, Sullivan, Adam, 690K) reports on the trial of six British Muslims for their role in the failed subway and bus bombing attempts on July 21, 2005. The "grainy security video showed a London subway car crowded with midday riders, a man with a backpack among them. He looked around, then turned his back toward a woman with a child in a stroller. Suddenly, a large puff of dust shot out of his pack, and panic erupted among the other passengers." British prosecutors said the man "was Ramzi Mohammed, 25, one of six men on trial for conspiracy to murder commuters that day, July 21, 2005. The dust, they said, was residue from a bomb hidden in his backpack. Its detonator fired and caused the puff of dust, prosecutors said, but the shrapnel-laced main charge failed to explode." Prosecutor Nigel Sweeney "told jurors that three other bombs carried onto subway trains and a bus that day also failed to explode, preventing a repeat of a nearly identical attack two weeks earlier, July 7, that had killed 52 commuters and wounded about 700 others." With the "four July 7 bombers dead, the six July 21 defendants are the first people to face trial on charges relating to a pair of incidents that were the first major Islamic extremist attacks on British soil and created chaos in one of the world's biggest cities."

FBI Assisting In US Embassy Attack Investigation. The AP (1/17, Paphitis) reports FBI agents are "helping investigate last week's rocket-propelled grenade attack on the US Embassy" in Athens, "trying to enhance security camera footage," Ambassador Charles Ries said Tuesday. FBI experts "flew in over the weekend and were working on the security footage," according to the ambassador. The video footage "shows the missile streaking across the street and into the embassy," he told state NET television, noting that "It was dark, it's not as good as we want. We're bringing in some experts to see what they can do in terms of looking at the files, ways to enhance it."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Treasury Says Counterterror Data Collection Program Will Have To Wait. The Washington Post (1/17, D1, Nakashima, 690K) reports the Treasury Department reported to Congress yesterday that the Cross-Border Electronic Funds Transfer Program, which would "give counterterrorism analysts routine access to as many as 500 million cross-border financial transactions a year, could not be implemented until 2010. The department had hoped to implement it by the end of this year. … In a report to Congress to be released today, the Treasury Department concluded that the program was technologically feasible and has value, but said it needs to determine whether the counterterrorism benefit outweighs banks' costs of compliance and to address privacy concerns. The program is opposed by bankers, who view it as burdensome and invasive."

ACLU To Release Pentagon Memo Showing Protestors In Talon Database. The Washington Post (1/17, A8, Pincus, 690K) reports, "A Defense Department database devoted to gathering information on potential threats to military facilities and personnel, known as Talon, had 13,000 entries as of a year ago -- including 2,821 reports involving American citizens, according to an internal Pentagon memo to be released today by the American Civil Liberties Union. The Pentagon memo says an examination of the system led to the deletion of 1,131 reports involving Americans, 186 of which dealt with 'anti-military protests or demonstrations in the US.'" The memo "said that the deleted reports did not meet a 2003 Defense Department requirement that they have some foreign terrorist connection or relate to what was believed to be 'a force protection threat.'" The Post adds that the 1,131 deleted reports "far exceeds the estimate provided to The Washington Post just over a year ago by senior officials of Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), the Defense Department agency that manages the Talon program."

Nighttime Drills Over Washington Test Air Defense. In a front page article, the Washington Post (1/17, A1, Sheridan, 690K) reports on a group of Civil Air Patrol pilots "who pose as nighttime intruders, penetrating restricted airspace over Washington in drills that take place every few weeks. While area residents slumber, the volunteers allow the US military to practice intercepting them -- or worse." Though many details of the "Falcon Virgo" exercises are kept secret, "this much is known: The exercises test Washington's air-defense radar system and the aircraft that might have to confront an intruder. Those include the Air Force jets that fly continuously over the capital, planes that scramble from Andrews Air Force base and Coast Guard helicopters. Participants include officials up the chain of command who must decide whether to intercept or shoot down an aircraft."

Half Of Passengers Using ShoeScanner Forced To Remove Shoes. USA Today (1/17, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports approximately half of the Registered Traveler customers screened by "Orlando International Airport first-in-the-nation ShoeScanner" yesterday "underwent the very hassle the machines were designed to ease — putting shoes through checkpoint X-rays — because the ShoeScanner detected metal in their shoes. … Steven Brill, whose Manhattan company, Verified Identity Pass, operates the ShoeScanners, said 52% of hundreds of passengers using the machine Tuesday morning had to remove shoes." General Electric's GE Security, which makes the ShoeScanner, "is trying to upgrade the machine so it can allow passengers to wear shoes that contain harmless metal. For now, TSA spokesman Christopher White said, if the ShoeScanner senses any explosives or metal, 'it's going to require additional scrutiny.'"

Meanwhile, USA Today (1/17, 2A, Frank, 2.27M) described Tuesday's opening of a Registered Traveler terminal in New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport, the first outside Orlando International Airport, as "a small but dramatic step" for the program. "Indianapolis International Airport plans to start a Registered Traveler program Thursday. Airports in San Jose, Calif., and Cincinnati are scheduled to join next week, said Steven Brill, whose Manhattan company, Verified Identity Pass, will manage the programs. Other airports are likely to follow when they see Registered Traveler grow, Brill said." USA Today adds, "Some Orlando passengers said Tuesday that being able to keep their shoes on while passing through security was a step forward."

NYTimes Sees Wider Uses For Registered Traveler Technology. Under the headline "Keep Your Shoes On, For A Price," the New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) editorializes, "Of all the hassles at the airport in this age of heightened security, perhaps the most annoying is the requirement to take off your shoes to send them through the X-ray screener. That burden will be lifted at some airports shortly — for those willing to pay about $100 a year for the privilege." The Times says the ShoeScanner "is the first important new technology to emerge from the for-profit registered traveler programs." Advances like this "could become the major contribution" of the programs, "which otherwise simply offer those willing to pay an annual fee a designated fast lane to a set of the airport's standard metal detectors and X-ray scanners. … Someday these technologies may trickle down to us all, and the registered traveler companies will have to keep finding new devices to stay ahead."

Islamic Relations "is calling for an investigation to determine why 40 Muslims were not allowed to board a flight from Germany to Detroit after their pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia. Northwest Airlines officials said the passengers arrived too late to catch the flight, but some of the Muslims, appearing at a press conference yesterday" with CAIR "called it religious discrimination. … Imam Sayed Hassan Al-Qazwini of the Islamic Center of America in Dearborn, Mich., told reporters that the travelers, who included two imams, were stranded and left on their own to find flights home." However, Northwest Airlines spokesman Dean Breest "said those who arrived at the gate in time with boarding passes were allowed onto the plane, and that those who could not be accommodated were rescheduled for other flights."

CIFA May Have Broken Law. USA Today (1/17, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "A Pentagon domestic intelligence agency overpaid and might have broken the law in awarding a $100 million contract to lease office space, federal investigators say. The Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA) awarded the no-bid deal in 2003 to TKC Communications. ... Internal watchdogs at the Pentagon and Interior Department, as well as Congress' Government Accountability Office, began questioning the contract last year. Still, federal contracting records show CIFA has paid TKC more than $11 million since Pentagon auditors raised their concerns in May, including more than $6 million in late November." The investigations come "as CIFA faces criticism over its surveillance tactics. Created in 2002, the agency oversees investigations and efforts to block terrorism or espionage against military bases or personnel in the USA. The agency has issued hundreds of 'national security letters' to obtain the banking records of suspects, a practice The New York Times revealed this weekend."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says Previous Iraq Policies Were Leading To "Slow Failure." The Washington Post (1/17, A14, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "President Bush said that his Iraq policy was headed to 'a slow failure' until he changed course last week with the announcement that he was sending more than 21,000 additional U.S. troops to bolster flagging security in Baghdad. The comment, perhaps the president's frankest admission that the previous strategy was not working, came during an interview yesterday with Jim Lehrer of PBS's 'NewsHour,' in which Bush detailed some of his decision-making regarding Iraq." Bush said, "I had a choice to make. Do what we're doing -- and one could define that maybe a slow failure. Secondly, withdraw out of Baghdad and hope for the best. I think that would be expedited failure. And thirdly is to help this Iraqi government with additional forces -- help them do what they need to do, which is to provide security in Baghdad. … I chose the latter because I think it's going to more likely be successful." The interview "was part of an ongoing White House campaign to sell the new Iraq policy in the face of intense skepticism from Congress and the American public. Bush acknowledged this view while sharpening his criticism of the Iraqi government over its handling of the execution of Saddam Hussein and security in Baghdad."

Most media coverage focuses on Bush's comments on the executions. The AP (1/17, Loven) reports Bush said "the unruly execution of Saddam Hussein 'looked like it was kind of a revenge killing,' making it harder to persuade a skeptical US public that Iraq's government will keep promises central to Bush's plan for a troop increase." Said Bush, "I was disappointed and felt like they fumbled the -- particularly the Saddam Hussein execution."

The New York Times (1/17, Rutenberg, 1.16M) says the comments "pointed up the continued tensions between Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki as they try to forge a joint plan to calm the violence plaguing Iraq." USA Today (1/17, 1A, Nichols, 2.27M) notes Bush "has called on al-Maliki…to reach out to disgruntled Sunnis and to help disarm sectarian militias as 21,500 additional US troops begin arriving in Iraq."

Also reporting on the executions, the New York Times (1/17, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "The botched hanging of Saddam Hussein and two lieutenants in Iraq by its Shiite-led government has helped to accelerate Sunni-Shiite sectarianism across an already fragile Middle East, according to experts across the region. The chaotic executions and the calm with which Mr. Hussein confronted the gallows and mocking Shiite guards have bolstered his image among many of his fellow Sunni Muslims." But "something else is happening too: a pan-Muslim unity that surged after the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite militia, is waning." Moreover, "while political analysts and government officials in the region say the spreading Sunni disillusionment with Shiites and their backers in Iran will benefit Sunni-led governments and the United States, they and others worry that the tensions could start to balkanize the region as they have in Iraq itself."

New York Times columnist David Brooks discussed Bush's PBS' Newshour With Jim Lehrer (1/16) interview immediately after it aired, saying he thought "this was the best" he's heard the President "on the past, on the troop deployments, on the inability that we had for a couple of years to hold any territory that we cleared." Brooks went on to say he also found the President "pretty compelling on the future, what would happen if we don't succeed there. … Where I found him less compelling was on the present and on this plan." Americans "have been following this issue for a long time, and they're pretty well-educated about it, especially viewers of this program. They want some details. They don't just want the grand assertions."

Also, show host Jim Lehrer asked syndicated columnist Mark Shields if he thinks the President made any progress in his PBS' Newshour With Jim Lehrer (1/16) interview, in terms of convincing the skeptics about his new Iraq plan. Shields said, "I don't think so, Jim. I think the President put it bluntly himself. The Secretary of State did as well yesterday. And that is that all the words, all the rhetoric, I mean, you could be Churchillian at this point, but it's the reality on the ground…in Baghdad."

Doubts About Maliki Continue. The CBS Evening News (1/16, story 3, 1:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Back in Washington, President Bush finds himself increasingly isolated because of his new Iraq strategy. Democrats and Republicans have voiced their opposition to the plan, and there are new questions about whether the President can depend on Iraq's Prime Minister to carry out his part of the deal." CBS (Axelrod) added "the jury's out on whether Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has the capacity to stop the bloodshed." Bush was shown saying, "No question, there's a headwind. There's a lot of skepticism in Washington, DC. There's skepticism about whether or not there's enough troops, or whether we should be putting any troops, and there's skepticism whether the Maliki government will make the tough decisions necessary to succeed." The President "says he thinks his plan can succeed, if Prime Minister Maliki will support American forces completely." The White House "won't talk about failure before even launching the plan, but foreign policy expert Michael O'Hanlon says Maliki must be thinking about his plan B." Michael O'Hanlon, Brookings Institution: "Maliki probably agrees with us on what the preferred outcome in Iraq would be, of a multi-ethnic Iraq that holds itself together. But he is probably also planning, in a way that we are not, for a backup option, which is civil war in which the Shia win." CBS added, "While the President won't talk about a plan B, inside the White House they feel they've done everything they can to get Maliki on board in what amounts to the President's last best hope for Iraq. Yet still there are doubts that Maliki's the man to get it done."

Fox News' Special Report (1/16, Hume) reported, "The first of 21,000 new US troops are arriving as the US and Baghdad kicked off a new security plan. The no. 2 U.S. Commander here says Iraqis developed the strategy with the goal of moving Americans to a support role." Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno: "It will enhance our training teams with Iraqis and we will move to the perimeter of Baghdad. That could take some time, but it is about sustaining this over a long period of time." Fox went on to report, "A major challenge in securing Baghdad is disbanding militias thought to be responsible for hundreds of execution-style murders each month. The prime minister has repeatedly promised that Iraqi forces will move against militias, but has yet to follow through. Odierno says that he truly believes Maliki will truly meet his commitment this time."

Administration Said To Appear "Off-Stride" Defending Bush Plan. The Washington Post's (1/17, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and national security adviser Stephen Hadley "and others seemed a bit off-stride, less self-assured, last week as they got a bipartisan hammering on the Hill and from the media about the war in Iraq." Instead, "It fell, once again, to Vice President Cheney to show how to take the long view in handling this sniping." On "Fox News Sunday," Cheney told Chris Wallace: "The fact is we've come a long way from where we started in Iraq. Now, no war ever goes smoothly all the way. ... Lots of times you have to make adjustments, and that's what we're doing here."

More Commentary. Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (1/17, 690K), "For the Republicans, there are two ways out of Iraq. They can either go out like Eisenhower or like Nixon." Dwight Eisenhower "could have chosen to divide the public and try to roll back Franklin Roosevelt's handiwork. In fact, he didn't give that option a moment's consideration. Social Security and unions, he concluded, were here to stay; any attempt to undo them, he wrote, would consign the Republicans to permanent minority status. Ike also ended the Korean War without attacking Democrats in the process." Richard Nixon "became president largely because of the public's massive discontent with the Vietnam War. We now know that Nixon and Henry Kissinger had no illusions that the war could be won, and Nixon probably could have withdrawn US troops in a way that didn't polarize the public. Such a stance, however, ran counter to Nixon's deepest instincts. … Today's Republicans now must choose between Eisenhower's way and Nixon's way."

David Ignatius, in the Washington Post (1/17, A19, 690K), writes, "It was axiomatic during the Cold War that presidents should not gamble with matters of national security. The stakes were too high. The Bush administration's Iraq policy has long suffered from a lack of that prudence -- and the misplaced gambler's instinct is especially evident in the administration's plan to send more troops to Baghdad." Bush's "surge" is "a mistake because it is piling more precious chips -- more human lives -- on what so far has been a losing bet."

Maureen Dowd writes in the New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) that Bush "told Jim Lehrer last night that in 20 years, radical Shiites could be warring with radical Sunnis and Middle Eastern oil could fall into the hands of radicals, who might also get weapons of mass destruction. So after scaring Americans into backing the Sack of Iraq by warning that radicals could get W.M.D., now he's trying to scare Americans into supporting the Surge in Iraq by warning that radicals could get W.M.D. So many deaths, so little progress."

Los Angeles Times (1/17, 850K) columnist Max Boot, meanwhile, writes Bush's plan "has not...been well received. But does anyone have a better idea?" The plan "seems worth one final effort to see if we can salvage something from this dire situation."

Wall Street Journal (1/17, 2.04M) op-ed contributor and AEI fellow Reuel Marc Gerecht urges a "revision" of Bush's surge strategy, saying, "Recent remarks by Defense Secretary Robert Gates -- predicting troop reductions within a year, and saying that we might not need an additional five brigades in Baghdad for a successful operation -- are a frightening echo of the self-defeating, undermanned optimism that came from the US military under Mr. Gates's predecessor."

Senate To Debate Biden-Levin-Hagel Resolution Against Bush Iraq Plans. The Washington Post (1/17, A4, Weisman, 690K) reports, "Senate leaders will introduce a bipartisan resolution of opposition to President Bush's new Iraq policy as early as today, taking the lead from House Democrats who are increasingly divided on how far to go to thwart additional troop deployments to Iraq. The resolution -- crafted by Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) -- will not come to a vote before Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday." But "by sending it to Biden's committee this week, Democratic leaders will give senators from both parties multiple opportunities to voice concerns about the president's policy." House leaders "opted to allow the Senate to strike first, reasoning that a strong, bipartisan vote there would splinter Republican support in the House, Democratic leadership aides said. … House leaders are beset by division over efforts to choke off the deployment through Congress's power of the purse. Moreover, antiwar groups are growing uneasy about a nonbinding resolution of opposition."

The New York Times (1/17, Hulse, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports Hagel "said the intent of the resolution was not to 'bash the president' or to call for the immediate withdrawal of United States troops from Iraq, but a responsible way for senators to register their opinion on the increase of more than 20,000 additional troops announced by Mr. Bush last week." The Times adds, "While Senate opponents of the buildup were preparing to move forward, Senate Republicans backing the president were trying to map their own strategy, considering proposals that could appeal to Republicans frustrated with events in Iraq but keep them from supporting the most critical resolution. 'There will be alternatives,' said Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona, the third-ranking Senate Republican." At the White House, "officials were continuing to discuss the new plan with members of Congress, with an emphasis on lining up Republicans behind Mr. Bush's approach. 'We knew this was not going to be an easy policy to explain or one that was going to be met with open arms,' said a White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity." That official "said that the message to Congressional Republicans was similar to the one the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, conveyed Tuesday at his press briefing: that approval of any resolution critical of Mr. Bush's approach, even if nonbinding, would send a damaging message."

Roll Call (1/17, Stanton) reports "aides" said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "is attempting to carefully craft the resolution to appeal to as many Republicans as possible in the hopes of piecing together a truly bipartisan coalition. As a result, the language of the resolution will remain as neutral as possible to allow Republicans to feel comfortable casting their votes with Democrats on such a high-profile issue." While "there has been talk in Democratic circles of holding a vote on the resolution the day of Bush's State of the Union address, a Reid aide said it was unlikely that would occur, since it likely would provoke claims of partisanship."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/17, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "If a nonbinding resolution opposing the surge of 21,500 troops into Iraq is approved, Democrats could quickly move stronger legislation to build a congressional firewall against any future move to broaden the war to Iran or Syria. Others are testing the waters for GOP support for the ultimate weapon in a showdown with the White House – curbs on funding." But "the key to an effective push back – including the 67 votes needed to overturn a presidential veto – is building bridges to Republicans."

Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (1/17, Rogers, 2.04M) notes "Republican votes will decide the coming debate in Congress over the Iraq war, so Democrats are first working to build bipartisan support for nonbinding criticism before taking on the White House over funding. The two-part strategy is on display this week as top Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee expect to announce agreement on a resolution challenging…Bush's decision to increase U.S. troop levels. As those talks proceed, the House Appropriations Committee will also begin hearings this morning to lay the groundwork for tougher fights over war-related spending requests this spring and summer." The Journal adds, "The nervousness among House Republicans is striking after November's losses. 'Two years before the elections, people are worried about their political skins,' said Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.)."

In addition, says The Hill (1/17, Tiron), Democrats want to redirect "attention" from Iraq " to the war in Afghanistan and the search for al Qaeda's leader, Osama bin Laden. Several top Democrats, including 2008 presidential hopefuls Sens. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), said a troop increase should occur in Afghanistan rather than Iraq." Clinton, Sen. Evan Bayh and GOP Rep. John McHugh "returned from a congressional delegation to Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq and are expected to talk about the trip today." But "congressional plans have yet to emerge for keeping a firm grip on Afghanistan, which is dealing with rampant poppy production and is at risk of sliding back into the hands of Taliban insurgents."

Former Bush Counterterror Advisor To Join Biden Staff. The Washington Times (1/17, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "A counterterrorism adviser to President Bush is leaving the White House to join the staff of a prominent Democratic senator gearing up to investigate the administration's war policies. A Senate source said Todd M. Hinnen, a director for combating terrorism on the staff of the president's National Security Council (NSC), will become the chief counsel for Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. … 'Once again, people on the Bush White House staff turn on him while our soldiers and Marines fight to protect the rest of us,' a Republican staffer said."

More Commentary. Former Defense Secretary Mel Laird writes in the Washington Post (1/17, 690K), "Cutting off funding is not a plan. Holding hearings to excoriate the executive branch is not a plan. Emotional oratory about casualties is not a plan." Therefore, "Congress must stop the partisan gamesmanship that feeds on itself and becomes an end rather than a means. … The best thing Congress could do now is look at the bigger picture with civility and bipartisanship. … Defense spending must be substantially increased. … Congress must take the lead in demanding accountability from the Iraqi government," and "Congress must set the tone by admitting who the enemy is -- political correctness be damned."

Over 1,000 Active Duty Troops Sign Anti-Surge Plan. The AP (1/17) reports, "Several anti-war groups that include members of the military on Tuesday delivered petitions against the war in Iraq to US Rep. Dennis Kucinich, a Democrat who's long been against the conflict." Iraq Veterans Against the War, Veterans for Peace and Military Families Speak Out "sponsored the 'appeal for redress' petition, which was signed by more than 1,000 active duty military members, according to Kucinich's office."

McClatchy (1/17, Schoof) reports, "Although they're duty-bound to carry out the president's orders," the troops "have a legal right to use this means to express their views. The statement, carried on the Web site AppealforRedress.org, was signed by 1,080 troops as of Tuesday afternoon, according to the site. It urged Congress to support 'the prompt withdrawal of all American military forces and bases from Iraq," adding, "Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Levey, 850K) also notes the "public opposition from a slice of the American population that rarely speaks out: the military rank and file. A group of service members came to Capitol Hill on Tuesday armed with signatures from more than 1,000 military personnel who oppose the war. 'We will not be silent while thousands die,' said Sgt. Liam Madden, a 22-year-old active-duty Marine and Iraq war veteran who is helping lead the effort to organize resistance to the war from inside the military." The Times adds, "When the campaign began three months ago, White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed the first signatories as '65 people who are going to be able to get more press than the hundreds of thousands who have come back and said they're proud of their service.'"

Troops Express Uncertainty Over Iraq's Future. The AP (1/17, Frayer) reports, "Nearly four years into the fighting, some soldiers say it's getting more difficult to swing their legs over the edge of the cot each morning. With America's Iraq policy in flux, some troops say they're asking themselves for the first time whether the U.S. can win the war — or what winning really means here. ... [Case] Dewinkel and other members of the 1st Squadron, 89th Cavalry Regiment, 2nd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division gathered one recent rainy morning in a schoolhouse south of Baghdad to set up a makeshift medical clinic for villagers. ... [they] finally said they felt a certain apathy and ambiguity." While Web Wright "said he worried U.S. public support for the war was waning and that U.S. troops could be withdrawn prematurely," Fred Morris "said he's grown frustrated with Iraqis, who have become increasingly demoralized and more dependent than ever on U.S. troops."

Bombs Kill At Least 70 Students At Baghdad University.

The CBS Evening News (1/16, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported on "a horrific example of the kind of violence…additional US forces are likely to face as they try to stabilize Baghdad. Two bombs exploded today at a university there that's nearly 800 years old. It was especially brutal, even by Baghdad standards." ABC World News (1/16, lead story, 2:40, Harris, 8.78M) said the victims were "Shiite and Sunni. There were no arrests and no claims of responsibility." The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Daragahi, 850K) notes "at least 70 Iraqi college students were killed and more than 170 others were wounded."

NBC Nightly News (1/16, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It's the exact same situation American troops are about to head right into and today it got even more dire. According to numbers just out today, over 34,000 Iraqi civilians died in the sectarian violence there last year. That's 100 a day."

The Washington Times/AP (1/17, Hurst) reports "a total of 142 Iraqis were killed or found dead Tuesday, in what appeared to be a renewed campaign of Sunni insurgent violence against Shiite targets. The sharp uptick in deadly attacks coincided with the release of UN figures that showed an average of 94 civilians died each day in sectarian bloodshed in 2006." The AP (1/17, Gamel), New York Times (1/17, Cave, 1.16M) and Washington Post (1/17, A1, Partlow, 690K) run similar reports.

Four More US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. ABC World News (1/16, story 2, :10, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "The US military announced the deaths of four US soldiers yesterday in northwestern Iraq."

UN Report Says 34,000 Iraqis Were Killed In Violence In 2006. The New York Times (1/17, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports, "The United Nations reported Tuesday that more than 34,000 Iraqis were killed in violence last year, a figure that represents the first comprehensive annual count of civilian deaths and a vivid measure of the failure of the Iraqi government and American military to provide security." The report was "the first attempt at hand-counting individual deaths for an entire year. It was compiled using reports from morgues, hospitals and municipal authorities across Iraq, and was nearly three times higher than an estimate for 2006 compiled from Iraqi ministry tallies by The Associated Press earlier this month."

Rice Seeks Arab Support For Bush Iraq Plan.

NBC Nightly News (1/16, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Today Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice continued her efforts in the Persian Gulf region to sell this new strategy for Iraq. She met with Arab leaders in Kuwait and came out with a key victory today." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Condoleezza Rice won a critical endorsement today: The backing of the Sunni Arab world for [President] Bush's plan to prop up Iraq's Shi'a government. The exploding crisis got them to issue an unprecedented joint statement."

In contrast to NBC's positive portrayal of the Arab countries' support for Bush's plan, most print coverage describes the final communiqué as mixed and "tepid." The

Washington Post (1/17, A13, Kessler, 690K), for example, says the Arab diplomats offered "only tepid support for President Bush's new plan," while in an analysis, the AP (1/17, Gearan) says the "carefully worded encouragement that Arab allies are offering for…Bush's new Iraq strategy belies deep suspicion among the United States' few real friends in the region that Iraq may already be a lost cause." Secretary Rice "has made sales calls the past several days in Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait," but has received "polite versions of a blunt message: Good luck with that." Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal was "the most upbeat, but his doubts were obvious," as he pinned "success squarely on the Iraq government, saying there is only so much that any outsider can do." Meanwhile, Rice's trip began with an emphasis on rejuvenating the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, but the move was "widely portrayed in the Arab press as simply an attempt to change the subject."

The New York Times (1/17, Shanker, 1.16M) also says that "one of Washington's staunchest partners in the region, Saudi Arabia, indicated deep concerns about whether the Shiite-led government in Baghdad had the capacity and will to halt sectarian violence and protect Sunni Arabs." The Arab diplomats gathered in Kuwait issued a statement that "welcomed the commitment" of the United States to stabilizing Iraq, "but made no commitments to help stabilize or rebuild the country." For her part, Rice "acknowledged the legitimacy of those worries within powerful Sunni-majority states," saying, "After all the years of deep grievance in the region, within Iraq, it's not surprising that that's the case." But at the same time, Rice stressed that each of the Middle Eastern leaders with whom she has met "wants to give this a chance," adding, "That's the position of people in the region, and there is, in fact, a burden on the Iraqi government to perform."

The Washington Times (1/17, Kralev, 88K) calls Arab governments "skeptical" and says they are "not prepared to fully back the proposal" because of its reliance on al-Maliki's performance.

However, the AP (1/17, Gearan) reports that after meeting Tuesday with diplomats from Persian Gulf countries, Rice told reporters, "There is, I think, very good support for the American commitment there, very good support for the objectives the president wants to achieve." Rice "acknowledged the doubts," however, saying that plan "requires now that everybody fulfills the obligations of the plan, particularly that the Iraqis have to carry through on their obligations." However, the AP notes that "many in the Arab world profoundly distrust [Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri] al-Maliki's government, believing it is serving Iran's interests at the expense of Sunnis." Similarly, USA Today (1/17, 10A, Slavin, 2.27M) says the diplomats "voiced support" for President Bush's plan, while Rice "acknowledged, however, that Sunni Arab leaders in the region worry" that the Maliki government "will not deliver on its promises to treat Sunnis fairly and stop the spiraling violence in Baghdad."

The Financial Times (1/17, England) says that "although Arab officials have questioned Washington's emphasis on a military, rather than political, solution, they have also been arguing against an abrupt US withdrawal, fearing it would exacerbate Iraq's civil conflict and destabilise the region."

Communiqué's Apparent Rebuke Doesn't Mention Iran By Name. AFP (1/17, Lanteaume) notes that during Tuesday's meeting, Rice and her "eight Arab counterparts called on Iran not to meddle in Iraq's affairs," Kuwait's foreign minister said. A joint communiqué did not mention Iran by name but said that relations among countries "should be based on mutual respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity of all states, and on the principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of other nations."

NBC Nightly News (1/16, 2:00, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported that Rice "wanted a united stand against Iran, but Arab leaders refused to condemn Iran by name for its support of Iraqi insurgents." Still, the Los Angeles Times (1/17, Richter, 850K) says the joint statement marked "a small step in US efforts to win regional support for pacifying Iraq and resisting Iranian influence."

Similarly, the Washington Post (1/17, A13, Kessler, 690K) says the Arab diplomats issued "a veiled warning to Iran," but the statement was written "in diplomatic jargon and did not mention Iran by name or even cite concerns about Iran's nuclear program." The Post notes that since September, Rice has "prodded the eight nations…to create an informal group to discuss regional issues. Arab officials have said privately they are reluctant participants in the meetings, in part because they are wary of being perceived as an anti-Iran alliance."

Rice Says Diplomacy Not "Dealmaking." The Washington Post (1/17, A17, Kessler, 690K) notes that during an exchange with reporters in Kuwait Tuesday, Secretary Rice "was asked if there were any moments in Arab history, as opposed to European history, that informed her thinking, such as Britain's occupation of Mesopotamia, Britain's experience in Egypt or France's experience in Algeria." The question "spurred Rice to give a six-minute philosophical lecture on her view of diplomatic history." Diplomacy, she said, "is not dealmaking." The Post publishes excerpts from her comments.

NYTimes Urges Bush To Identify Timelines In Iraq. The New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) editorializes, "None of Mr. Bush's ideas -- his plan to send more American soldiers to fight alongside Iraqi units in Baghdad, his program for jump-starting the Iraqi economy, his hope of reconciling rival sectarian communities and heading off civil war -- can possibly succeed without the full cooperation of the Iraqi government. Yet in the days following Mr. Bush's address, as in the days before, Mr. Maliki has demonstrated how far his own goals diverge from America's best interests or any reasonable path for containing Iraq's civil war. ... Unless President Bush insists that Mr. Maliki accept specific and enforceable policy benchmarks and timelines -- starting with the disarming of sectarian militias -- the United States will remain hostage to the Iraqi prime minister and his radical Shiite agenda."

WPost Says "New" Mideast Policy "Betrays" Bush's Freedom Agenda. The Washington Post (1/17, 690K) editorializes that Secretary of State Rice "is trying to solidify an alliance of 'the mainstream' against Iran and in support of U.S. policy in Iraq. ... The new strategy explains a series of reversals of US policy that otherwise would be baffling. ... The administration has decided to seek $98 million in funding for Palestinian security forces -- the same forces it rightly condemned in the past as hopelessly corrupt and compromised by involvement in terrorism. ... [Another beneficiary] is Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, a thuggish autocrat who was on the wrong side of Ms. Rice's previous Mideast divide ... The attempt to divide the Middle East into two opposing camps is nevertheless wrongheaded and dangerous. ... Finally the new US policy betrays President Bush's freedom agenda, giving a free pass to dictators who support the new geopolitical cause."

Ahmadinejad Seeks Saudi Cooperation On Iraq. The AP (1/17, Youssef) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday that he sent a message to Saudi King Abdullah "proposing that they cooperate in helping stabilize Iraq." In an interview with Saudi television, Ahmadinejad said, "We, Saudis and other neighboring countries can help the Iraqi people to take the lead to consolidate their government's capability to stabilize and maintain security in their country." While the AP says Iran's "overture to Saudi Arabia appeared to be an attempt to counter American efforts to rally its allies in the region and isolate Tehran, the Financial Times (1/17, England) notes Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal Tuesday "played down suggestions that his government had been asked to ease tensions between Washington and Tehran." After meetings with his Arab counterparts in Kuwait, Faisal said, "There is no need for mediation. Our relations with the United States are long standing...Iran is a neighbour of Saudi Arabia, so obviously we hope to avoid any conflict."

US Sending Second Carrier To Mideast. The AP (1/17, Krane) reports the deployment of the USS John C. Stennis to the Middle East "will put two US aircraft carriers in the Persian Gulf region for the first time since the 2003 Iraq invasion, in a clear response to Iran's aggressive posture in the region." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said Monday that Iran and other US adversaries believe the US is vulnerable in Iraq, where the Pentagon is preparing to send more than 20,000 additional troops as part of a new security plan that envisions a crackdown on Iranian-backed militias." However, a second US carrier will "significantly boost US air power in the region and serve to remind Iran of American firepower."

Iran Buys Army Gear In Pentagon Sale. The AP (1/17, Theimer) reports, "Fighter jet parts and other sensitive US military gear seized from front companies for Iran and brokers for China have been traced in criminal cases to a surprising source: the Pentagon." In one case, federal investigators said, "contraband purchased in Defense Department surplus auctions was delivered to Iran." In that instance, a Pakistani arms broker "convicted of exporting US missile parts to Iran resumed business after his release from prison," purchasing "Chinook helicopter engine parts for Iran from a US company that had bought them in a Pentagon surplus sale."

French Visit To Tehran Cancelled. The New York Times (1/17, Sciolino, 1.16M) reports, "At a time when most world powers have forged a united front against Iran because of its nuclear program," French President Jacques Chirac "arranged to send his foreign minister to Tehran to talk about a side issue, then abruptly canceled the visit earlier this month in embarrassing failure." Chirac's "troubles stemmed from his deep desire to help resolve the crisis in Lebanon before his term runs out in May." To that end, he "decided to seek the support of Iran, which, along with Syria, backs the radical Shiite organization Hezbollah," three senior French officials said in describing the effort.

Sauerbrey Says US Mulling Options To Help Displaced Iraqis. The New York Times (1/17, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "Senate lawmakers sharply criticized the Bush administration on Tuesday for failing to provide refuge in the United States for the most vulnerable of the Iraqis fleeing the violence at home. The United Nations estimates that two million Iraqis have fled the country and that 1.7 million are currently displaced within the country. Of those, roughly 500,000 have been displaced since February, with roughly 40,000 to 50,000 more fleeing their homes each month. Among them are Iraqis who have been threatened or attacked for working with American troops and companies." In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Ellen Sauerbrey, "an assistant secretary of state, acknowledged that only 466 Iraqis had been admitted as refugees since the American invasion of Iraq in 2003. She said that expanding the resettlement of vulnerable Iraqis in the United States was 'a top priority.'" Sauerbrey "said the State Department was considering several options, including offering the Iraqis refugee or other special status, and expediting the processing of Iraqi religious minorities and of refugees who have worked for the American government." The "bipartisan panel of senators called for prompt action."

The Washington Times (1/17, Ward, 88K) reports Sauerbrey "said the refugee crisis began to develop in February, when the bombing of a prominent Shi'ite mosque in the city of Samarra heightened sectarian fighting. 'I came into my position just about exactly a year ago, and at that time, we were touting the fact that repatriation was so successful because most of the resources that we were sending at that time were to return people. And a very large number of Iraqis were returning to Iraq,' Mrs. Sauerbrey said."

The Washington Post (1/17, A4, Tyson, 690K) notes the US "has allowed only 466 Iraqis to immigrate under refugee status since 2003 -- including 202 out of 70,000 slots for refugees last year -- in part because of…stringent security screenings, officials said at a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee. … 'We should not repeat the tragic and immoral mistake from the Vietnam era and leave friends without a refuge and subject to violent reprisals,' said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the committee's chairman."

The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Gaouette, 850K) says the situation is "drawing comparisons to the refugee problem created after the Vietnam War," and reports "lawmakers framed the issue as one of moral obligation, strategic prudence and opportunity -- particularly to reopen contacts with Syria, where about 500,000 Iraqis have sought refuge, according to UNHCR. … 'We have a special obligation to keep faith with the Iraqis who have bravely worked for us -- and have often paid a terrible price for it -- by providing them with safe refuge in the US,' said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the immigration subcommittee."

Boxer-Rice Exchange Triggers Debate. The AP (1/17, Noveck) reports, "However one interprets Sen. Barbara Boxer's remark last week to Condoleezza Rice that the secretary of state, single and childless, doesn't have a 'personal price' to pay in Iraq, the brief exchange still has people debating." The reference to Rice's personal status was "an instant catalyst for vigorous chatter on blogs, TV and talk radio." Rice herself later told Fox News: "I thought single women had come further than that." Also on Fox News, White House spokesman Tony Snow called Boxer's remark "a great leap backward for feminism."

US Indicts Former UN Oil-For-Food Chief On Bribery Charges. The AP (1/17, Neumeister) reports former UN oil-for-food chief Benon Sevan "was charged Tuesday with bribery and conspiracy to commit wire fraud for allegedly accepting $160,000 to illegally influence the $64 billion program." Sevan "countered through his lawyer that he was a political scapegoat and had accounted for every penny as he successfully ran the largest humanitarian program in U.N. history, helping to save 'tens of thousands of innocent people from death by disease and starvation.'" The AP notes, "U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said the United States has lodged warrants for the arrest of both men with Interpol and will seek their arrest and extradition to the United States. … FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon said the indictment brings to 14 the number of individuals charged in the case and 'strikes at the heart of the corruption that pervaded the oil-for-food program.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A6, 2.04M) runs a truncated version of the AP story, and the New York Times (1/17, Preston, 1.16M) reports Sevan "was accused together with Ephraim Nadler…of taking illegal commissions from an Egyptian oil trader in exchange for helping him secure contracts to purchase Iraqi oil." The Washington Times (1/17, Pisik, Seper, 88K) notes Mershon said, "As executive director of the program and undersecretary-general of the U.N., Benon Sevan was responsible for maintaining the program's probity and propriety. Instead, his administration of the program was marked by profiteering and profligacy."

The Washington Post (1/17, A13, Lynch, 690K) reports, "Federal authorities announced the indictment as the new U.N. secretary general, Ban Ki Moon, traveled to Washington yesterday to shore up U.N. relations with the United States. Ban told a gathering of Washington Post executives, editors and reporters that he has 'a strong and firm commitment' to raise the United Nations to the 'highest level of ethical standards.'"

Escaped Ex-Iraqi Minister Back In Chicago. The Chicago Tribune (1/17, Madhani, 617K) reports, "After spending four months in an Iraqi prison and pulling off an audacious jail break, Aiham Alsammarae flew quietly back into Chicago and was behind the desk of his Downers Grove engineering firm Tuesday. In an hour-long interview, the former Iraqi electricity minister who is still wanted on corruption charges in his native Iraq gave new details of his escape." The Tribune adds, "The dramatic jailbreak included a high-speed run to Baghdad International Airport, a private jet that flew him out of the country and back-channel talks with Iraqi politicians. The Iraqi judge overseeing the case expressed surprise that Alsammarae had turned up in Chicago and vowed to take 'all legal measures' to return him to Iraq." Alsammarae "said he has reached out to officials in the US attorney's office in Chicago and Washington who have assured him, he says, that they are not interested in sending him back to Iraq. A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago declined to comment."

Gates Says Taliban Attacks Rising In Afghanistan. The New York Times (1/17, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "Attacks by militants crossing into Afghanistan from Pakistan have tripled since September along portions of the border, a senior American intelligence official said Tuesday, prompting calls for a greater effort by Pakistan to curb the influx and a larger deployment of American and other NATO soldiers here. Of particular concern, officials said, has been a rise in attacks by Taliban and other militants from remote and largely ungoverned tribal areas in Pakistan in eastern Afghanistan, where most of the American combat forces in the country are based." After meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai Tuesday, Defense Secretary Robert Gates told reporters, "The border area is a problem," warning that "Al Qaeda networks operating across the border."

The Washington Post (1/17, A10, Constable, 690K) says Gates added "his voice to a chorus of US and international officials who have begun taking Pakistan to task for harboring Islamic insurgents." Gates praised Pakistan as a "strong American ally in the war on terror," but he also said there was a "problem" in Pakistan's border areas and that "al-Qaeda networks are operating on the Pakistan side." He said that the United States needed to "work with Pakistan" to reduce the violence and attacks emanating from within its borders. The Washington Times (1/17, Sands, 88K) runs a similar story.

In a report on Gates' visit, the CBS Evening News (1/16, story 6, 1:00 Couric, 7.66M) broadcasted, "US officials blame Pakistan for providing the Taliban and al Qaeda safe haven. Pakistan denies it, and today announced it carried out a missile attack on suspected hideouts. But sources tell CBS News, the attack was carried out by the US, which allowed Pakistan to take credit."

US Commanders In Afghanistan Want More Money, Not Troops. CBS Evening News (1/16, story 7, :50, Assuras, 7.66M) reported last night that Gates "said more US troops may be sent to the region if commanders ask for them." But the Wall Street Journal (1/17, A6, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports from Kabul, "As the Bush administration presses for a surge of US troops in Iraq, military officials in Afghanistan are proposing a surge of their own. Instead of troops, U.S. commanders here, hoping to counter a sharp rise in attacks by Taliban forces, are seeking as much as $6 billion to build roads and speed development of the Afghan army and police forces." The request "comes as the US has quietly increased the size of its force here to about 24,000 soldiers, the highest level yet. Dim prospects for getting substantially more troops are forcing commanders here to take an approach dramatically different from that in Iraq, where the US plans to surge to a force of about 150,000 soldiers focused largely on Baghdad." A "military official" said, "We are talking about a major infusion of money to get things going where they need to go."

Pakistani Strike Against Taliban Coincides With Gates Trip. Reports this morning speculate on whether the Pakistani shelling of the Taliban was intended to coincide with Secretary Gates' trip. The Financial Times (1/17, Bokhari, Dombey) reports, "Pakistan said on Tuesday it had attacked Taliban and al-Qaeda positions in an airstrike that coincided with a visit to Afghanistan by Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary. The attack, in the south Waziristan region, near the Afghan border, comes amid mounting western concerns that Nato's struggle against the Taliban cannot be won without greater co-operation from Islamabad. ... Some diplomats argue that Pakistan is the biggest problem in the Afghanistan conflict ... Pakistan rejects such claims but has stepped up its activities along the border." The Times adds, "The attack came the morning after Mr Gates arrived in Afghanistan, prompting speculation that it was intended to signal Pakistan's commitment in the battle against the Taliban and al-Qaeda. But on Tuesday US officials said Taliban fighters had exploited a peace deal with the Pakistan government last year in north Waziristan to increase attacks in Afghanistan."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/17, Montero, 59K) reports, "For the second time in a week, the Pakistan Army has rained missiles on suspected militant targets, seeming to confirm in deeds what it has denied in words: That a controversial peace deal with Islamic militants has turned Pakistan's tribal belt into a sanctuary for attacks against Afghanistan. ... A peace deal signed with Taliban-linked militants in September of last year, the government said, was supposed to bring peace. Now Pakistani officials appear to be contradicting themselves by targeting the very same militants they were supposed to have appeased." The Monitor adds, "The timing prompted some observers to speculate whether the attacks were meant as a demonstration of Pakistan's continued cooperation in the face of a growing chorus of criticism from US and NATO officials. Pakistani government officials, for their part, rejected suggestions that the airstrikes were anything other than conventional military strategy."

Contractor Profits May Surge As Pentagon Reloads. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Karp, 2.04M) reports, "Defense contractors have enjoyed surging profits in recent years as the government spent heavily to fight wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and combat terrorism in other parts of the world. Recently, some investors have worried that ballooning federal deficits could bring the flush times to an end. But with the makers of warplanes, tanks and battlefield technology expected to report strong fourth-quarter results beginning next week, the latest Pentagon plans suggest that the long-expected spending plateau is still another year away. ... Major defense companies are expected to meet or exceed their quarterly targets, given that federal funds spent to buy and develop weapons in the October-to-December quarter rose 19% from the year-earlier period. ... Record Iraq war funding is likely to boost previously issued conservative profit outlooks for 2007 as well."

Psychologist Says Navy Faces PTSD Crisis. USA Today (1/17, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports, "An experienced Navy psychologist warns that the U.S. military does not have enough mental health professionals to meet the growing number of emotionally damaged war veterans." Cmdr. Mark Russell "says, many of the mental health professionals on staff lack formal training in core therapies for post-traumatic stress syndrome. Russell predicts a 'perfect storm' of dire health care consequences." He "has been speaking out for three years that the U.S. military faces a mental health crisis in the treatment of its combat veterans." Officials "downplay Russell's grim assessment, noting that training is increasing, aggressive mental health programs are being created, and civilian mental health professionals are being hired to provide additional resources."

DOJ:

Lawmakers Concerned About More US Attorney Departures. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Marosi) reports, "The top federal prosecutors in San Diego and San Francisco announced their resignations Tuesday as critics charged the Bush administration with forcing out a growing number of U.S. attorneys without cause." The Times continues, "The U.S. attorneys in San Diego and San Francisco, Carol Lam and Kevin V. Ryan, respectively, did not comment on whether they had been forced to resign. Lam said she would step down Feb. 15; Ryan did not name a date." The Times adds, "Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., in a Senate speech Tuesday, said at least five other U.S. attorneys have been forced to resign without explanation. She accused the Bush administration of trying to circumvent Senate confirmation of their replacements. … Such appointments were subject to Senate review until last year when the Patriot Act was reauthorized with a provision that allowed the U.S. attorney general to appoint longer-term, interim replacements without Senate approval. … The departures, Feinstein said, come at a sensitive time when federal prosecutors are pursuing political corruption cases. … 'The U.S. attorney's job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions, or, worse, any appearance of undue influence,' Feinstein said." The Times notes, "A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, said senators would be consulted before the nomination of replacements, as has been the routine since the law was changed. … 'It is inconceivable for a member of Congress to believe that use of an appointment authority to fill a vacancy is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process,' Roehrkasse said."

The AP (1/17, Kellman) reports, "Senate Democrats want to take away Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' power to replace U.S. attorneys who fall out of favor and return that authority to federal district judges." The AP continues, "Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California and Mark Pryor of Arkansas complained Tuesday that the White House is using an obscure provision in the newly reauthorized USA Patriot Act to reward Republican political allies with jobs as federal prosecutors. … 'The Bush administration is pushing out U.S. attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements,' Feinstein said. … 'It appears that the administration has chosen to use this provision, which was intended to help protect our nation, to circumvent the transparent constitutional Senate confirmation process to reward political allies,' Pryor said in the joint Democratic statement." The AP adds, "Not true, Gonzales told The Associated Press. … 'We are fully committed to ensuring that with respect to every position we have a Senate-confirmed, presidentially appointed U.S. attorney,' Gonzales told editors and reporters during an interview Tuesday. … 'We in no way politicize these decisions,' he added. … U.S. District Court judges, Gonzales said, tend to appoint friends and others not properly qualified to be prosecutors. … Better that judges do the hiring than the White House, say Democrats, who have introduced legislation to return the appointment process to the courts." The AP notes, "The subject is headed for a public airing Thursday when Gonzales appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee for its first oversight hearing of his department since the Democrats took control of Congress. … At issue is whether the administration is using an obscure provision in the terrorism-fighting USA Patriot Act to oust federal prosecutors and replace them for the duration of the Bush administration with White House allies."

The New York Times (1/17, Johnston) reports, "Justice Department officials said Tuesday that Ms. Lam's dismissal had nothing to do with the prosecution of Mr. Cunningham, Republican of California, but was based on her overall record in prosecuting firearms violations and crimes along the California border with Mexico." The Times adds, "Representative Darrell Issa, a Republican from San Diego County who has criticized Ms. Lam's record on illegal immigration, called the Cunningham prosecution 'a credit to her leadership and her office' in a statement on Tuesday, but repeated his call for border enforcement and said her replacement 'will bring new ideas and new strategies that will benefit our area.'" The Times adds, "It is not clear how many United States attorneys are being forced out. Ms. Feinstein said the number was 5 to 10; Justice Department officials said the number was lower but would not provide a specific number. … The Justice Department sent a letter defending its actions on Tuesday to Ms. Feinstein and Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, chairman of the Judiciary Committee. 'That on occasion in an organization as large as the Justice Department some United States attorneys are removed or are asked or encouraged to resign, should come as no surprise,' the letter said. It added that no action had been taken against United States attorneys 'to retaliate against them or interfere with or inappropriately influence a particular investigation, criminal prosecution or civil case.' … Ms. Feinstein said in her statement that she knew of seven United States attorneys who had been dismissed without cause."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/16, Soto) reports, "A national political storm is brewing over the departures of several top prosecutors, including San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam. … Sources told The San Diego Union-Tribune that superiors in the Justice Department are unhappy with decreased prosecutions for gun and immigration violations." The Union-Tribune continues, "With reports yesterday that the Department of Justice has demanded the resignation of another top prosecutor, in Las Vegas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled this week to answer questions from skeptical senators. … Democratic lawmakers have criticized the recent departures from the ranks of top federal prosecutors as worrisome. … 'We have no idea why this is happening,' Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, said in a statement last week. 'The attorney general could have a legitimate reason for asking for specific resignations, or this could be motivated by political concerns or worse, derailing ongoing investigations.'" The Union-Tribune notes, "Both U.S. senators from Nevada said this weekend that U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden had been asked to step down, according to a report published yesterday in the Las Vegas Review-Journal. … Outgoing New Mexico U.S. Attorney David Iglesias also said he was asked to resign, but without explanation. … Other U.S. Attorneys who recently announced they are leaving include John McKay in Seattle and Paul Charlton in Phoenix. Neither has said he was pushed out; McKay said he would 'be returning to the private sector' while Charlton said he was leaving to join a law firm."

The Hill (1/17, McCormack) reports, "Rumor has it that Lam has other cases in which members of Congress have been subpoenaed, Feinstein said. … But she admitted to knowing little of the circumstances surrounding Lam's departure. 'The only explanation I've seen are concerns that were expressed about prioritizing public corruption cases over smuggling and gun cases,' the senator said." The Hill adds, "U.S. Attorney H.E. Bud Cummins, of Little Rock, Ark., recently was replaced by Timothy Griffin, a former White House lawyer who has worked for the Republican National Committee. … Feinstein today plans to question U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the issue at a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee. … However, the DoJ upheld its process, saying that Senate confirmation was a top priority. … 'We are fully committed and it is in our best interest to have a U.S. attorney that is confirmed by the Senate,' DoJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said."

The San Jose Mercury News (1/17, Mintz) reports, "U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan has notified his staff that he is leaving amid reports that he and six other federal prosecutors are being forced out by the Bush Administration." The News continues, "Ryan has been the administration's point person for the Justice Department in Northern California since 2002. … Ryan sent an e-mail to his staff today notifying them that he is leaving, saying 'for some months now I have been considering the possibility of pursuing other challenges for a variety of personal and professional reasons.' The e-mail did not specify the date that Ryan is leaving, just stating that 'it is a good time for me to move on.'" The News adds, "Former prosecutors under Ryan say they've been told he has been asked to leave his post under the cloud of an internal Justice Department probe of his leadership of the 90-plus lawyer office. But most lawyers say Ryan's departure will have little impact on the big ticket cases he has been pursuing, including the Apple stock options probe and Balco. … 'I don't think there's much of a hiccup in terms of already filed cases from one U.S. attorney to another,' said a former federal prosecutor who asked not to be identified. … Ryan's tenure has been marked by internal chaos and controversy within his office balanced against his lead role in some of the nation's most high-profile federal prosecutions, including the Balco steroid scandal, the stock options backdating probe and, more recently, his decision to pursue the Hewlett-Packard spying scandal. … Rumors that Ryan might be planning to resign have circulated within his office for months, particularly since the Justice Department sent a team of auditors to the Bay Area last fall to interview current and former prosecutors about his management. Whether Ryan resigned or was asked to resign, his status has been on shaky ground as a result of a constant stream of criticism from current and former prosecutors who've questioned his insular leadership style."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/17, Soto) reports, "U.S. Attorney Carol Lam announced Tuesday that she is resigning effective Feb. 15. … 'It has been both a great honor and a great privilege to have served the nation and the Southern District of California as United States attorney for the past 4½ years,' she said in a statement. … 'The dedication shown by the men and women of the U.S. Attorney's Office can be seen every day in the important cases they prosecute, including cases relating to terrorism, immigration, narcotics, public corruption, and fraud.'" The Union-Tribune continues, "The San Diego Union-Tribune reported on Friday that Lam was asked to resign because of decreasing prosecutions in gun and immigration matters. … In her statement issued midafternoon Tuesday, Lam did not address whether she was asked to resign. … Lam prosecuted former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, a Republican, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy and tax evasion charges."

The North County (CA) Times (1/17, Bennett) reports, "In a Tuesday phone interview from his Washington office, U.S. Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Vista, said Lam was asked to step down. … Issa declined to name the source of the information, but said 'it was a high-ranking administration official involved in the decision process.'" The Times adds, "For years, Issa has been critical of Lam for what he said was her failure to more aggressively prosecute illegal-immigrant smugglers. … 'And I have had one-on-one conversations with Ms. Lam, urging her to be more aware of the policy priority that the president has given,' he said, referring to Bush's promises to secure the nation's borders. … In an October 2005 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, for example, Issa blasted

Lam's office for failing to prosecute two cases of smugglers who were repeat offenders. In the letter, Issa called her failure to do so the result of 'lax prosecutorial standard.' … On Tuesday, Issa said that Lam, who was appointed to the post by President Bush in 2002, had done a good job in prosecuting white-collar crime and commended her for her successful investigation of the now-imprisoned former 50th District Congressman and conservative Republican Randy 'Duke' Cunningham. … Issa said it would be too strong to say that he was instrumental in Lam's resignation."

KNSD-TV, San Diego, CA (1/16, 4:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney Carol Lam is resigning effective February 5th. It's believed the office of US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asked her to leave the job. Late last week, stories surfaced that Lam and several other US Attorneys had been asked to step down. Democratic Senator Dianne Feinstein's office claims the requests were made by the Republican Administration for political reasons."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former CA Counsel Sentenced To Two Years. The Long Island Newsday (1/17, Wagner, Bernstein) reports, "Choking back tears, former Computer Associates chief counsel Steve Woghin apologized in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn Tuesday for his role in a $2.2 billion accounting scandal at the company before he was sentenced to a two-year jail term." Newsday continues, "Woghin, who pleaded guilty in September 2004 to securities fraud conspiracy and obstruction of justice charges, faced U.S. District Court Judge I. Leo Glasser and said in an emotional voice that he was sorry for the role he had played in the scandal that toppled most of the company's top management, including chief executive officer Sanjay Kumar, who also plead guilty and is to begin serving a 12 year jail sentence next month." Newsday adds, "The Islandia-based company, one of the country's largest manufacturers of software for large banks, insurance companies and airlines, is now known as CA Inc. … Woghin said his part in the affair was 'not a legacy I would like to leave... It was not for personal gain or hubris,' he added, choking back tears as about 15 of his friends and relatives looked on in the courtroom. … In addition to the two-year prison sentence, Woghin was also sentenced to three years supervised release and a fine to be determined at a later date. … Woghin worked at the U.S. Justice Department for 10 years before joining CA in 1992. He was charged with overseeing a team of CA lawyers who 'routinely' drafted software licensing contracts with clients after a quarter had closed and with drafting at least one of the contracts himself. He stepped down from CA in May 2004."

The Wall Street Journal (1/17, C8) reports, "At a hearing in federal court in Brooklyn, U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser also sentenced Mr. Woghin to three years of supervised release, said Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn. … Mr. Woghin pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit securities fraud and obstruction of justice in 2004. Several former executives at the company formerly known as Computer Associates, including onetime Chief Executive Sanjay Kumar, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges in the matter."

Former Refco Head Added To Fraud Case. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, C5, Bray) reports, "Refco Inc.'s former president was indicted on securities fraud and other charges in connection with an alleged scheme to hide hundreds of millions of dollars in trading losses by Refco and its customers from the investing public, prosecutors said." The Journal continues, "The U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan said Tone Grant, 62 years old, has been charged with conspiracy, securities fraud, bank fraud, wire fraud and money laundering. Mr. Grant, of Chicago, is the latest former Refco executive to be charged in the matter. He was the company's president from 1997 to June 1998 and at times held a significant ownership interest in the firm." The Journal adds, "Phillip Bennett, Refco's former chief executive, and Robert Trosten, the commodities broker's former chief financial officer, are already facing criminal charges in the matter. … The superseding indictment adds additional charges of bank fraud and money laundering against Messrs. Bennett and Trosten and wire fraud against Mr. Bennett. … Mr. Bennett, of Gladstone, N.J., previously has been charged with conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud, making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission and making material misstatements to auditors. Mr. Trosten, of Sarasota, Fla., previously had been charged with conspiracy, securities fraud and wire fraud."

Unraveling Case Against Former Westar CEO May Help Him With Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Smith) reports, "The effective unraveling of government efforts to prosecute former Westar Energy Inc. Chief Executive David C. Wittig has given new life to his hope of getting the company to pay him millions of dollars he claims to be owed under an employment agreement." The Journal continues, "Earlier this month, a federal appeals court in Topeka, Kan., vacated Mr. Wittig's convictions in a 2003 indictment springing largely from personal use of corporate aircraft. … Late last week, attorneys for the former Westar chief, who has been in prison in Minnesota for a year, asked a federal court in Topeka to order their client released, arguing there is 'no lawful basis for ... continued imprisonment.'" The Journal adds, "What happens next in the civil and criminal cases will have direct bearing on Mr. Wittig's and the Kansas utility's finances. The company has reserved more than $73 million to cover any adverse decisions. Westar's total potential exposure for legal costs and employment issues related to Mr. Wittig and a onetime subordinate, former Westar Vice President Douglas Lake, is about $94 million. … The company had argued in an arbitration proceeding that it doesn't owe Mr. Wittig severance payments called for under his employment contract because he was let go 'for cause.' … In a separate civil dispute in Topeka federal court, Westar has argued it must pay only 'reasonable' attorney fees and has disagreed with the men about what's reasonable. … To date, the utility has paid $8.4 million of legal expenses for Mr. Witting and co-defendant Mr. Lake, who also was convicted. Westar has declined to pay $12 million more in legal costs."

Former Cendant Chairman To Be Sentenced Today. USA Today (1/17, 3B, Farrell) reports, "The final chapter in one of the longest-running sagas of corporate crime is scheduled to conclude today in a Connecticut courtroom." USA continues, "Walter Forbes, the blue-blooded former chairman of Cendant, is due to be sentenced in Bridgeport, Conn., for his role in a $252 million accounting fraud that was exposed nearly a decade ago. … At the time, the Cendant fraud was the largest on record, and its exposure in April 1998 wiped out $14 billion of the company's market capitalization, nearly half its total, in a single day." USA adds, "Since then, Cendant's scandal has been eclipsed in magnitude by accounting meltdowns at Enron and WorldCom. The CEOs who presided over those companies were convicted of spawning those frauds and given stiff jail sentences, 24 years for Jeff Skilling of Enron and 25 years for Bernie Ebbers of WorldCom. … Forbes' sentence probably will be lighter, but when he stands in front of U.S. District Judge Alan Nevas, he still faces a stretch of more than 10 years. That was the jail term given his top lieutenant, Kirk Shelton, who was convicted two years ago of participating in the same fraud." USA notes, "The reason Forbes might get only half of what Skilling and Ebbers got is that his timing was better. The accounting fraud that occurred at Forbes' company (which was known as CUC International before a merger transformed it into Cendant), took place from 1995 to 1997. That was several years before a harsh new set of mandatory sentencing guidelines was adopted by Congress. … Skilling and Ebbers committed their misdeeds after the new guidelines went into effect. … Still, for Forbes, who was born into an affluent family in Rockford, Ill., attended Harvard Business School and became one of the leading proponents of shopping by computer in the 1990s, any sentence north of 10 years will secure him a place in what has become an infamous group of former CEOs convicted of felonies."

Federal Regulators Examining Commerce Bank's Real Estate Deals With Executives. The New York Times (1/17, Bajaj) reports, "Commerce Bancorp, which calls itself 'America's most convenient bank,' rattled investors yesterday after it disclosed that federal regulators were investigating the bank's real estate deals with executives." The Times continues, "Shares of Commerce fell 8.3 percent, or $2.89, to $31.83, after the bank said the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve were conducting an inquiry." The Times adds, "Commerce has become one of the fastest-growing banks in the nation, thanks in part to its extended branch hours, and has made an aggressive and successful push into New York's crowded banking market. … Commerce, based in Cherry Hill, N.J., said, 'The scope of the investigation will include but not be limited to transactions with its officers, directors and related parties, including transactions involving bank premises.'" The Times adds, "Investors were unnerved by the announcement, in large part, because 'it was so vague,' said Meredith Whitney, an analyst with CIBC World Markets. 'It could be the lightest offense or it could be the most severe offense.'" The Times notes, "Bank executives declined to answer questions about the investigation on a conference call with analysts and reporters yesterday. Commerce said it had appointed a committee of independent board members to oversee the investigation. … Critics have long complained about the bank's business ties with firms that are either owned or controlled by Commerce's chairman and president, Vernon W. Hill II, and his wife, Shirley Hill."

Senate Proposal Would Target Deferred Executive Pay. The Washington Post (1/17, D1, Montgomery, Birnbaum, 690K) reports the Senate Finance Committee "is considering a proposal to sharply limit the earnings corporate executives and other highly paid employees can place tax-free into deferred compensation plans, one of the most popular executive benefits in corporate America." The proposal would permit "an individual taxpayer" to "defer no more than $1 million annually in compensation, beginning this year. The shift in tax policy would be likely to affect top executives at hundreds of corporations and would raise taxes on some of the nation's wealthiest workers by an estimated $806 million over 10 years." The proposal "tracks rhetoric that some Democrats employed during the midterm elections, when they portrayed the Republicans who controlled Congress as being too close to special interests and the wealthy."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Forming Strategy To Curb Increase In Violent Crime. McClatchy Newspapers (1/17, Gordon, Taylor) reports, "Bush administration officials are scrambling to demonstrate that they're addressing sharp jumps in violent crime in some cities, in an attempt to reclaim a traditionally Republican issue amid criticism from some Democrats, mayors and police chiefs." McClatchy continues, "Senior Justice Department officials sought Tuesday to highlight the administration's multipronged programs for combating growing gang violence and outbreaks of juvenile crime. The renewed emphasis comes as some experts, as well as politicians, cite federal cuts in city and state law enforcement funding as a possible contributor to spikes in murders, robberies and assaults in medium-sized cities." McClatchy adds, "While criminal justice experts stress that the jumps in crime over the last 18 months in cities such as Charlotte, N.C.; Cleveland, Ohio; Memphis, Tenn.; Minneapolis and Sacramento, Calif., may not represent a long-term upswing, they're watching to see if President Bush proposes more anti-crime funding in his State of the Union Address next week. … Chuck Wexler, who heads a think tank for police departments across the country that has monitored crime trends in cities, said the data over the last 18 months suggest that the crime surge 'isn't a statistical aberration.' … After 14 years of declines in crime, police in some communities began to report double-digit increases. That left the administration vulnerable to criticism because the crime jumps came after the White House instigated $1 billion in cuts in anti-crime funding since 2001 as it shifted its focus to the war on terrorism. … Among the casualties was a Clinton administration program to hire 100,000 police officers." McClatchy notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that federal anti-crime funding has never made up more than 4 percent of total state and local law enforcement spending nationwide. … Other researchers agree that the reasons for the rise in crime are more complicated than money, and they vary from city to city. They point to factors such as increasing gun-, gang- and drug-related violence; growing juvenile crime; a deep hopelessness among poor, young black men; and an upsurge in prison releases after years of record numbers of incarcerations. … The rise in gang activity, in particular, has drawn the attention of the Justice Department and the FBI. At a briefing Tuesday, Alice Fisher, chief of the department's Criminal Division, Assistant FBI Director Chip Burrus and two other officials described efforts to crack down on gangs, especially national and international gangs, such as the Salvadoran la Mara Salvatrucha, also known as MS-13."

DOJ Helping Georgia Community Deal With Violence. WALB-TV, NBC 10, Albany, GA (1/17) reports from Moultrie, GA, "Representatives from the U.S. Department of Justice came to Moultrie Tuesday to listen to complaints from citizens upset over a fatal police shooting." WALB-TV continues, "The Justice Department held a community forum after Hispanic crimes escalated last year in Colquitt County. In the wake of the recent Willie Banks shooting, the justice department was called in again. … They met with community groups Tuesday afternoon to discuss how the community as a whole can better respond when shootings and violence like those acts occur."

New Orleans Searches For Answers To Rising Crime. The AP (1/17, Foster) reports, "They came by the thousands last week, carrying signs and pictures of the dead and demanding action. … A bloody murder spree that opened the year by littering the city with nine bodies in 10 days galvanized residents from across the city's neighborhoods and class lines." The AP continues, "The dramatic march against crime in New Orleans echoed the outcry that grew in the mid-1990s from the slayings in the French Quarter that became known as the Pizza Kitchen killings. People took to the streets then and public officials developed concrete plans to attack a murder problem that left more than 400 people a year dead. … But in the post-Katrina environment, the decision-makers have many issues to cope with, and a major difference is the lack of a solid plan by either Mayor Ray Nagin or the police department to stem the violence, said criminologist and University of New Orleans professor Peter Scharf." The AP adds, "Mayor Ray Nagin and police superintendent Warren Riley outlined a plan to stop the violence earlier in the week. It included shuffling police officers from administrative jobs and using deputies from the jail to beef up patrols, speeding up delivery of murder cases to the district attorney, stopping cars on the streets between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m., when most of the murders take place."

Jury Selection Begins In Libby Trial. The New York Times (1/17, Lewis, 1.16M) reports the "perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. began Tuesday with his lawyers trying to eliminate as jurors anyone who might have strongly negative feelings about the Bush administration in general and Vice President Dick Cheney in particular." Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, "is facing five felony counts charging that he lied to F.B.I. agents and to a grand jury investigating who leaked the name of a Central Intelligence Agency operative and why." The "first day of jury selection on Tuesday went slowly, with only nine potential jurors interviewed. Two of them were excused by Judge Walton after they made it clear they were critics of the administration and Mr. Cheney." Libby's lawyers, "Theodore V. Wells and William H. Jeffress Jr., also explored whether potential jurors were open to one of their main lines of argument: that if Mr. Libby gave incorrect answers to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the grand jury, it could have been a simple case of faulty memory."

The CBS Evening News (1/16, story 6, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Jury selection began today in the trial of the only person indicted in connection with the CIA leak investigation, Scooter Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby is not charged with leaking the name of CIA agent Valerie Plame, but with lying to Federal agents investigating the case. If convicted, Libby could get 30 years in prison."

NBC Nightly News (1/16, story 5, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, Libby "has said he learned of Plame's identity from NBC News' Washington bureau chief, Tim Russert who says that is not true. Russert is expected by the way to be a key witness at the trial."

The Washington Post (1/17, A3, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) reports defense lawyers are "carefully scrutinizing potential jurors for strong opinions about the Bush administration, the war in Iraq and the fallibility of human memory." Judge Walton "dismissed three of the nine potential jurors interviewed. Two were released after expressing strong feelings about the Bush administration." The "difficulty of finding 12 jurors and four alternates became apparent as jury selection began. Walton started by asking prospective jurors 38 pre-screening questions, telling them the inquiry would help determine whether they had 'certain sympathies or prejudices' that could interfere with their responsibility to be impartial."

The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "Libby's lawyers signaled Tuesday that even though the case was about perjury and obstruction, they were concerned that strong feelings among the jurors about the war — and whether President Bush misled the public about it — could influence their verdict. Two potential jurors were dismissed after expressing strongly negative feelings about administration officials." The questioning 'about the Bush administration and the Iraq war drew repeated objections from prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who said that the defense lawyers were engaged in 'an open-ended Rorschach test,' alluding to the famous ink-blot test in which people are believed to project their feelings onto ambiguous stimuli."

The Washington Post (1/17, A17, Goldstein, 690K) reports Judge Walton "read aloud 38 questions that lawyers for both sides had agreed on to help screen potential jurors. They included mundane questions about whether potential members of the jury panel knew the people involved in the case, had ever been a victim or perpetrator of a crime, had read news about Libby's alleged crime. And then there were four intriguing questions exploring potential jurors' beliefs about human memory." The four questions include, "Is there anyone who believes that it is impossible for a person to mistakenly believe that he or she was told something by one person when in fact the person was actually told the information by someone totally different several months earlier?"

Charges Against Libby Seen As "Paradoxical." The New York Times (1/17, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "paradox seems to define" Libby, "who remains a bit mysterious even to close colleagues. He is the White House policy enforcer who also wrote a literary novel; a buttoned-down Washington lawyer who likes knocking back tequila shots in cowboy bars and hurtling down mountains on skis and bikes; and a 56-year-old intellectual known to all by his childhood nickname, Scooter." But "now comes the most baffling paradox of all." By "all accounts a first-rate legal mind and a hypercautious aide whose discretion frustrated reporters, he is charged with repeatedly lying to a grand jury and to the F.B.I. about his leaks to the news media in the battle over Iraq war intelligence."

Background Checks Of Jurors Becoming More Common. The Legal Times (1/17, Schwartz) reports, "The case involved the largest single drug bust in D.C. history, and after eight weeks of trial, the last thing a defense attorney wanted to hear was concerns about the jury. … But just after closing statements in a drug-conspiracy trial last month at the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Judge Ellen Huvelle thought there could be a problem. … Only then had she run the jurors' names through criminal-background checks. The system flagged four jurors -- something none of them had disclosed during jury selection." The Times continues, "Had they lied? Or were the data -- run by the FBI and notoriously unreliable -- incorrect? … The question was hardly incidental. Last year, Chicago-based U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer dismissed two jurors during deliberations in the corruption trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, after the Chicago Tribune found that they had concealed their arrest records during jury selection. Ryan is free on bail while an appeals court looks at whether the jury problems merit a reversal." The Times adds, "The Ryan case drew attention across the legal world. Convicted felons are barred from serving on federal juries. But most courts rely on individual jurors to tell the court about any convictions, rather than run criminal-background checks on the jury pool. Indeed, the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, which oversees the federal judicial system, keeps no data on which courts run background checks. … But that may be changing. At the upcoming trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby Jr., Judge Reggie Walton will check the criminal backgrounds of potential jurors before lawyers make their final selections. The move comes at the request of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, who specifically noted the Ryan incident during a recent court hearing."

More Commentary. Investor's Business Daily (1/17) editorializes, "Like the Duke lacrosse players, Scooter Libby faces jail for alleged involvement in a crime that was never committed, pursued by a vindictive prosecutor. And also like the Duke case, it's a national disgrace." IBD continues, "If lying to law enforcement, officers of the court or Congress warrants jail time, then both Bill Clinton and Sandy Berger might still be writing their memoirs in Leavenworth. For that's what Libby is charged with -- lying to investigators. Not stuffing secret documents in his pants, not even outing a secret agent, but simply having a recollection that is different from reporters of what he said when and to whom." IBD adds, "Like District Attorney Michael Nifong in the Duke case, Fitzgerald knew early that he had no real crime and no real criminal. But he had to come up with something. So he charged with lying someone who in his job got hundreds of phone calls every day and talked to dozens of reporters because his memory of earlier conversations differed with those reporters' notes. … Duke lacrosse players still twist in the wind, as does Libby, who stands accused of lying about a crime that never occurred in an investigation that never should have happened. Justice should be blind, not those administering it. That's the real crime in both cases."

Prosecution Of Hackers Often Hindered By Legal Codes. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A8, Bryan-Low) reports, "As police around the world become more skilled at tracking down criminals who spread computer viruses, they are realizing there are some bugs in their own system: hurdles to trying their cases in court." The Journal continues, "The problems lie in both building cases and securing stiff sentences, say legal and security experts. Prosecutors can have a hard time explaining the complex crimes to the courts. It often is difficult for law enforcers to quantify the damage caused by a virus that infects computer networks. And judges often hand down light sentences to the culprits, who typically are young, first-time offenders, among other factors. … 'The main obstacle in any complex computer-crime case is convincing a judge or a jury about the seriousness of the case,' says Arif Alikhan, a former federal prosecutor in Los Angeles. 'It's a lot harder than a bank robbery or other crimes.'" The Journal adds, "As a result, some countries -- including the U.S., United Kingdom and Germany -- are reviewing their laws. The British Parliament in November passed the Police and Justice Act which, among other things, updates the country's cybercrime laws by raising the maximum prison penalty for unauthorized access to a computer to two years from six months. It also seeks to plug a loophole by criminalizing so-called denial-of-service attacks, by which one party attempts to knock another party's computer system offline by bombarding it with data via the Internet. Perpetrators now face as many as 10 years in prison; previously, such cases typically were prosecuted for unauthorized modification of a computer, which carries a maximum five-year sentence. … In the U.S., legislation proposed last year advocated raising the maximum sentence for most computer crimes to 30 years in prison. Current penalties for computer crimes vary and generally reach up to 20 years in prison."

DOJ Manuel Helps Local Police In Cybercrime Probes. CNET News (1/17, McCullagh) reports, "Police trying to learn how to use the Internet to investigate everything from cyberstalking to spam and illegal hacking have some new advice, thanks to the U.S. Department of Justice." CNET continues, "The department's Office of Justice Programs on Tuesday published what amounts to a manual for tech-challenged gumshoes, covering everything from how to track suspects through an Internet Relay Chat network to targeting copyright thieves on peer-to-peer networks." CNET adds, "Local and state law enforcement have bungled some high-tech investigations recently. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court rejected prosecutors' attempts to seize newspaper reporters' hard drives, and the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that police illegally seized a computer in a methamphetamine investigation. A federal judge permitted an Internet service provider to sue police after it was raided because of Usenet posts its employees knew nothing about. … The new 137-page manual appears to represent the Justice Department's attempt to offer at least some basic technical and legal tips to law enforcement agencies that may not have computer experts on the payroll."

Two Neteller Founders Arrested On Illegal Gambling Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/17, Neumeister) reports, "Two founders of a company that processes Internet gambling transactions were arrested and charged with funneling billions of dollars in gambling proceeds to overseas betting operations, federal prosecutors announced Tuesday. The charges mark the latest in a series of crackdowns by the federal government against the online gambling industry." US Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement yesterday that former Neteller PLC directors John David Lefebvre and Stephen Eric Lawrence "knew when they took their company public that its activities were illegal. FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon said the multibillion-dollar online gambling industry is 'a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business.'" The Daily Independent (1/17, Attwood) also notes "Mershon said that the multibillion-dollar online gambling industry was 'a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business.'" The Times of London (1/17, Doran) adds, "The pair were arrested on Monday after an FBI sting operation discovered that Neteller was being used to allow Americans to place illegal bets on sporting events via internet gambling companies based in foreign countries."

The Financial Times (1/17, Wilson, Smith, Warwick-Ching, Pimlott) reports, "The US attorney's office in the southern district of New York said the men, who are Canadian, had been charged with conspiring to transfer funds with the intent to promote illegal gambling." Garcia "said the arrested men 'knew when they took their company public that its activities, as well as those of the internet gambling companies it assisted, were illegal in the US'." The FT notes, "Simon Holliday, partner at Global Betting and Gaming Consultants, said: 'It could mean anyone . . . ever . . . involved in the online gambling industry faces the possibility of arrest if they travel to the US.'"

The New York Daily News (1/17, Zambito) reports, "In recent months, the Justice Department has used money laundering laws to charge two offshore gambling operations. And in 2003, Pay-Pal and parent company eBay forfeited $10 million to settle a lawsuit, that claimed t the company aided illegal online gambling activities."

Arrests "Bode Ill" For Other Internet Gambling Sites. BusinessWeek (1/17, Holahan) reports that the arrests "demonstrate how far the U.S. government is prepared to take its crackdown on gambling, and they bode ill for the closely held Internet gambling sites that continue to cater to U.S. clients even after October. 'In the eyes of the U.S. Justice Dept., what Neteller is doing is even worse [than the gaming companies] because they are acting like a bank and helping all this money leave U.S. accounts,' says Christopher Costigan, president of the online gaming industry publication Gambling911.com, which initially reported the arrests. He speculates that Neteller will withdraw from the U.S. market." BusinessWeek adds, "Even if Neteller chooses to leave the U.S. market, however, it would not spell the end for all gambling companies. … Indeed, several U.S. land-based casinos have expressed interest in starting their own online poker sites that would be regulated by U.S. law, in a sign that not all hope is lost for the cause of U.S. online gambling."

Tennessee Lawmaker Seeks Dismissal Of Fraud Charges. The AP (1/17) reports, "Indicted state Sen. Jerry Cooper contends in court filings aimed at getting his federal mail fraud, bank fraud and conspiracy case dismissed that law enforcement officials coached grand jury witnesses. Cooper, D-Morrison, is accused of using a fraudulent appraisal and political influence to help an Alabama businessman get a loan from a bank co-owned by then-Lt. Gov. John Wilder in a borrowing scheme involving the 1999 sale of Cooper's lumber mill in Warren County." Cooper lawyer Jerry Summers "has requested government evidence that he believes is grounds for dismissing the charges because of prosecutorial misconduct, court records show."

Federal Investigators Examining Defunct Pirro Jewelry Business. The AP (1/17, Fitzgerald) reports, "The federal investigation of former Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro has branched out to include the jewelry business she set up while she was in office, a Pirro spokesman said Tuesday. The spokesman, Pirro family friend Michael Edelman, said agents have begun questioning some of the people who bought the bead jewelry she made several years ago in what he said was an attempt to raise money for charity. … He said he did not know specifically what interested the investigators, but he said Pirro was cooperating and had turned over all requested records." The AP adds, "Edelman said Pirro's stab at the jewelry business 'was a flop.'"

Potential Coke Formula Theft Trial Jurors Complete Questionnaires. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/17, Weber) reports, "One hundred potential jurors filed into a federal courtroom Tuesday for the start of the conspiracy trial of a former Coca-Cola secretary accused of stealing trade secrets from the world's largest beverage maker in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi. The potential jurors answered questions from U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester about whether they work for or have relatives who work for Atlanta-based Coca-Cola, then filled out a questionnaire drafted by the lawyers in the case and were sent home for the day." The AP notes, "The questionnaire also asks potential jurors what magazines and newspapers they read, what television shows they watch regularly, whether they own Coca-Cola stock and what they know about this case."

Philadelphia Strip Club Owners To Surrender To FBI Today. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/17, Sullivan, 385K) reports Philadelphia strip club owners Kevin Rankin and Bishop Krabsz "agreed to turn themselves in to authorities this morning to face federal charges that they sought to avoid paying more than $300,000 in federal taxes, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office and a defendant's attorney. The case grew out of the federal corruption probe into convicted City Councilman Rick Mariano," who "was sentenced last summer to 61/2 years in prison for taking bribes to help navigate tax and regulatory issues. At some point during the two-year investigation, agents thought Mariano had an interest in the club, but he did not, court documents say." Rankin lawyer Chris Warren "questioned prosecutors' motive for going after his client. … 'They went after them because they thought Mariano was involved, then for guns, and now, for tax evasion,' Warren said. … Warren said Rankin and Krabsz would surrender to the FBI this morning."

Comptroller Of Currency, Fed Investigating Commerce Bancorp. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/17, Brubaker, 385K) reports, "Shares in Commerce Bancorp Inc. fell more than 8 percent yesterday after the Cherry Hill company said it was under investigation by federal banking regulators. The Office of the Comptroller of Currency and the Federal Reserve are looking into the company's transactions with directors, officers and related parties, 'including deals involving banking premises,' Commerce said deep in its fourth-quarter earnings report." The Inquirer notes, "Commerce is no stranger to federal investigations, having been caught up in Philadelphia's pay-to-play scandal starting in June 2004. … Also, in the summer of 2005, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said the FBI had seized Commerce records to determine whether the bank had given municipal officials in the suburbs preferential treatment to win government business. But the company said Nov. 1 that it was no longer being investigated."

Two Arrested In Separate California Child Porn Cases. The Los Angeles Times (1/14, 850K) reported, "Authorities have announced arrests in separate child molestation and child pornography cases, one involving a website bulletin board used to trade illicit images of minors. Jeffrey Blaine Hall, 51, subscribed to 'North American Man Girl Love Assn.' website, where he downloaded and posted child pornography, a federal criminal complaint alleges.

Authorities announced the arrest Friday. … In the second case, a Lancaster man was facing dozens of felony counts in state court after being accused of repeatedly molesting and taking explicit photographs of a young girl in his neighborhood. Christopher Jarold Hoff, 41, also could face federal charges based on evidence seized from four home computers. Authorities also took dozens of movies and computer discs."

Federal Prosecutors Say Ryan Trial Judge Was Fair. The AP (1/17, Robinson) reports, "The judge who presided over former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial took "superlative care" to see that the proceedings were fair, prosecutors told a federal appeals court Tuesday." The AP continues, "In a 97-page response to Ryan's appeal, the government said U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer had worked hard and effectively to see that the former governor got a fair trial, and succeeded in doing so. … 'During these proceedings, Judge Pallmeyer expressed no fewer than 12 times her view that the defendants' right to a fair trial was paramount and that, if fairness could not be achieved, she would not hesitate to declare a mistrial and start the trial over, despite the amount of time that had gone into the trial,' prosecutors said." The AP adds, "Ryan, 72, was convicted in April along with longtime friend Larry Warner of racketeering and other offenses. … Ryan was accused of steering lucrative state leases and contracts to Warner and other cronies and receiving rewards ranging from vacations in Jamaica to a free golf bag. He also was accused of using state money and workers to operate his campaigns and burying an investigation of bribes paid in exchange for drivers licenses when he was secretary of state. … Ryan still maintains nothing he did was illegal. His appeal focuses heavily on the dismissal of two jurors, Evelyn Ezell and Robert Pavlick, who were found to have omitted mention on a pre-trial questionnaire of their encounters with police. … Pallmeyer replaced them with alternates after the jury already had deliberated eight times. But she did not replace other jurors when it was discovered that they too had brushes with the law on their records."

CIVIL LAW:

SCOTUS Signals Backing For Insurers On Credit-Reporting Law. Bloomberg (1/17, Stohr) reports, "U.S. Supreme Court justices signaled they may limit the duty of insurance companies to tell consumers about flaws in their credit histories, questioning a ruling that insurers say would open them to billions of dollars in damages." Bloomberg continues, "More than half the court's nine members today in Washington voiced support for arguments by Safeco Corp. and Berkshire Hathaway Inc.'s Geico Corp. The insurance companies are fighting class-action lawsuits by consumers who sought price quotes, weren't offered the lowest rates and now say they should have been told the insurer relied on their less-than-perfect credit histories. A federal appeals court let the case go forward." Bloomberg adds, "Several justices questioned whether Congress intended for the Fair Credit Reporting Act to require notification of every consumer who doesn't get the best rate. Justice Stephen Breyer said an Internet search he conducted indicated that only 1 percent of Americans have the highest possible credit score. … 'There will be tens of millions of these notices going out,' Breyer told Scott A. Shorr, the lawyer for the consumers. Breyer predicted the notices 'will become meaningless' to consumers and most will go 'right in the wastebasket.'" Bloomberg notes, "Justice Antonin Scalia was even more blunt in questioning a Justice Department lawyer who offered partial support for the consumers' position. … 'I find it hard to shoehorn your case into that language,' Scalia told the government lawyer, Patricia A. Millett."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Demurs On Probe Of Duke Lacrosse Prosecutor. The AP (1/17) reports, "Officials from the Department of Justice have told a North Carolina congressman that it's too early to launch a federal investigation into the handling of the Duke lacrosse case, a spokeswoman said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Rep. Walter Jones wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last month, asking that the Department of Justice investigate whether the district attorney prosecuting three Duke lacrosse players charged with sexual assault has violated the athletes' civil rights." The AP adds, "The department's Office of Legislative Affairs responded last week that it was premature to initiate a federal investigation while criminal charges and other investigations at the state level are ongoing, said Cynthia J. Magnuson, a Department of Justice spokeswoman. … Jones' spokeswoman Kathleen Joyce said Tuesday that the congressman still planned to meet next week with the head of the department's Civil Rights Division.

… 'He doesn't consider the letter received as a final response,' Joyce said. 'He's still pushing forward.'" The AP notes, "In the letter to Gonzales, Jones asked that the conduct of Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong be reviewed. … Nifong turned the case over to state Attorney General Roy Cooper last week. The North Carolina State Bar has filed ethics charges accusing Nifong of making misleading and inflammatory comments about the lacrosse team. … Cooper's office took possession of all the files in the lacrosse case late Tuesday afternoon." WITN-TV, NBC 7, Greenville, NC (1/17) also reports this story.

FNC Studio B with Shepard Smith (1/16, 3:41 p.m.) broadcasted, "Mike Nifong, officials from the Department of Justice have apparently told a North Carolina Congressman that it's too early to launch a Federal investigation in to the handling of the Duke Lacrosse case. A representative wrote the Attorney General last month, asking that the Department of Justice investigate whether the District Attorney prosecuting the lacrosse players have violated the athletes' civil rights. Alberto Gonzales says not yet. But Jones' spokesperson says he does not consider the letter as a final response and he is still, at this moment, at least, pushing forward. Too early, because all fed oversight is based on the trial." There are many local broadcasts of this story in Raleigh and Durham, NC. An example is: WNCN-TV, Raleigh, Durham, NC (1/16, 11:00 p.m.).

DOJ Ends Probe Of Santa Clara County Juvenile Hall. The San Jose Mercury News (1/17, Ostrom) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has closed its three-year investigation into allegations of abuse and excessive force at Santa Clara County juvenile hall." The News continues, "The department wrote in a letter, dated Tuesday, to Board of Supervisors Chairman Don Gage that after reviewing updated policies -- which give youth offenders due process when they file complaints or are disciplined for misbehavior and include improving the reporting of child abuse – 'the county has satisfactorily addressed the deficiencies identified over the course of our investigation.'" The News adds, "In September, the department had signaled that the county was on the right track, pending final review of the new policies. … The Justice Department also praised the county for working hard to resolve the original complaints and in the letter said the county is 'dedicated to providing the appropriate care for youth in their custody.' … The original abuse investigation, launched in early 2003, led to sweeping changes and dramatic reductions in use of force at juvenile hall and created more independent oversight."

Mississippi Student Seeks Federal Charges Against Officer After Scuffle. The AP (1/17, Mohr) reports, "A lawsuit seeking damages from a Greenwood (MS) police officer and others after school security cameras captured the officer twice drawing his weapon on a teenager in front of classmates has been doubled to $2 million." The AP continues, "Carlos Moore, the attorney for 18-year-old James Marshall, had earlier sought $1 million in damages after obtaining the school videotapes that show a portion of the Dec. 6 encounter between the white officer, Casey Wiggins, and the unarmed black teenager." The AP adds, "The case has sparked accusations of racism and calls for Wiggins' dismissal. Wiggins' attorney says the officer did 'nothing wrong.' … Moore obtained copies of the tapes on Jan. 5, after filing a motion with the court. The tapes show Wiggins, who was on a security detail at the predominantly black school, twice pointing his gun at Marshall - once in a crowded school hall - before putting the teen in a choke hold." The AP notes, "The Mississippi chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union on Monday issued statement supporting legal action 'in seeking justice for the Marshall family.' … Moore also filed a federal criminal complaint this week with the U.S Justice Department, accusing Wiggins of violating Marshall's civil rights with excessive force and false arrest under the color of law. … State charges had already been filed in the case, but Moore said those were only misdemeanor simple assault charges and did not fit the crime. The federal charges are felonies."

Delaware Family Demands Answers In Inmate Death. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (1/17, Williams) reports, "Family members of the 24-year-old Dover man who was found dead in the state's newest prison infirmary last week are demanding answers about the death, and getting nothing but silence from the Department of Correction." The Journal continues, "Demetrius Caldwell had been undergoing unspecified treatment for a month in the prison infirmary at the Delaware Correctional Center in Smyrna before he was found dead, laying on a mattress on the floor of his cell. … A medical staffer had checked on him 25 minutes before he died." The Journal adds, "The Department of Correction has released Caldwell's body to his family, who plan to bury him Saturday, but they have not told them what caused the young man's death. … Prison officials ruled out meningococcal meningitis as the cause of death late last week, after naming it as a possibility. They've said doctors from the prison's medical provider, St. Louis-based Correctional Medical Services, the Department of Correction, Public Health and the Medical Examiner's Office are still trying to determine a cause of death." The Journal notes, "Last month, the U.S. Justice Department found 'substantial civil rights violations' in four Delaware prisons. The federal investigation was prompted by a series of articles in The News Journal that revealed inadequate health care and questionable treatment within the prisons."

Texas District Challenges DOJ Voting Oversight. The Legal Times (1/16, Schwartz) reports, "The small utility district on the outskirts of Austin, Texas, had a simple wish: to move its polling place from a residence to a school. … It may have been simple, but it wasn't easy. The move needed approval from the Justice Department in Washington." The Times continues, "As it happens, the Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District No. 1 (population 3,500) is one of the areas of the country required by federal law to get permission from the government before making any changes to its voting rules. … Now the utility district — with the help of some conservative legal firepower — has decided to mount the most significant assault on the Voting Rights Act in a quarter of a century." The Times adds, "The case, filed last year in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, argues that the federal government's oversight of local voting rules is unconstitutional. And it was selected and prepared with one goal in mind, to get the issue before the Supreme Court. Unsurprisingly, it's drawing attention from civil-rights groups, who fear the wolf is at the door. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, for instance, has hired former Clinton administration solicitor general Seth Waxman to fend off the challenge. … The suit targets the section of the act — which Congress overwhelmingly voted to reauthorize last summer — that requires certain counties and states to seek federal approval before making changes to their voting rules. Known as 'pre-clearance,' the section was one of the ways the federal government prevented Southern states from continuing to discriminate against African-Americans after the landmark civil-rights legislation passed in 1965. … But the federal government only oversees certain states and counties, the ones that most egregiously suppressed minority voting during the 1964 election. The jurisdictions under such federal authority have remained virtually unchanged, except for a few additions in the 1970s."

Push Continues To Save Convicted Border Agents From Jail. Fox News (1/17) reports, "Two Texas Border Patrol agents who shot a Mexican drug runner in the backside on the U.S. side of the border are hoping a last-ditch pardon from President Bush will save them from serving more than a decade in prison." Fox continues, "Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean are scheduled to turn themselves in to authorities Wednesday to begin serving 11 and 12 years, respectively, for the February 2005 non-fatal shooting. … Several groups, including Friends of the Border Patrol, The Minutemen and Grassfire.org, have been trying through petitions to keep the agents out of prison — through either a motion to U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone to allow them to remain free on bond during an appeal or through a presidential pardon from Bush. About a dozen rallies took place across the country in support of the agents last week." Fox adds, "Several lawmakers, including Reps. Ted Poe, R-Texas; Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif.; Walter Jones, R-N.C.; Tom Tancredo, R-Colo.; and Duncan Hunter, R-Calif. last week sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to allow Ramos and Compean to remain free on bond pending the appeal of their convictions. … Petitions with more than 225,000 signatures will be delivered to the White House Tuesday afternoon, Poe told FOX News. … Earlier this month, a letter circulated by Poe and signed by 24 lawmakers requested that the Justice Department not oppose a motion filed to allow the men to remain free pending the appeal. … But Poe said he hasn't heard much from the Oval Office. … 'We have been getting some information from low-level members of the attorney general's office,' he said. 'The White House has not contacted us directly, even though we corresponded with them several times and have called. I'm a little concerned about that.'"

High Court Rules For IBM In Pension Case. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Anderson, 2.04M) reports, "The US Supreme Court let stand a lower court ruling that said International Business Machines Corp.'s switch to a cash-balance pension plan didn't discriminate against older workers, ending a lawsuit that could have cost the company $1.4 billion." The Supreme Court's decision "adds additional certainty to the legality of corporate shifts from defined-benefit pensions to so-called cash-balance retirement plans." Congress "last year also clarified the legality of the plans, but the IBM case could have bearing on a number of corporate retirement plans altered prior to the June 29, 2005 effective date in the legislation."

The New York Times (1/17, Walsh, 1.16M) reports the decision "saves I.B.M. a significant amount of money." But "it resolves almost nothing for the many other companies that made similar changes to their own pension plans."

The AP (1/17, Rugaber) reports, "In the pension case, a former IBM employee named Kathi Cooper served as the lead plaintiff in a class action suit brought on behalf of 250,000 current and former IBM workers. The suit argued that IBM's "cash balance" pension plan was discriminatory because it allowed younger workers to accrue benefits in the plan at a faster rate than older workers. … IBM switched to a cash balance plan in 1999. Such plans provide workers with individual accounts that can be cashed out when they leave the company and are intended to appeal to younger workers who are more likely to switch jobs." The AP notes, "The IBM case has been closely watched, as roughly 1,500 companies have adopted cash-balance plans. The company earlier agreed to settle the case for $1.4 billion if it lost in the courts. … But the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, based in Chicago, sided with IBM in August, ruling that the 'terms of IBM's plan are age-neutral.' … In addition, Congress passed legislation, also in August, that clarified that cash-balance plans complied with the age discrimination provisions of ERISA, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act."

Two Freed In Probe Of LA Girl's Killing. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Winton, Abdollah) reports, "A few days after a bullet from a gang shooting tore into an Angelino Heights home last month, killing a 9-year-old girl, police announced with much fanfare that they had arrested the two gunmen. … But the suspects — Cesar Zamora, 23, and Steven Castanon, 20 — are now out of jail and back in their old neighborhood, to the dismay of residents who held candlelight vigils to memorialize Charupha Wongwisetsiri." The Times continues, "Police released the men without filing charges after determining that Zamora or Castanon fired the shot that killed Charupha in self-defense when a rival gang member pulled up in a car and tried to shoot them in front of their apartment complex next to Charupha's home. … The situation has shaken and angered residents of Angelino Heights, a diverse neighborhood with commanding views of downtown Los Angeles. The area includes rows of grand Victorian houses restored by television writers and downtown office workers side-by-side with apartments housing working-class families." The Times adds, "Legal experts said the circumstances of the shooting would make it difficult to build a murder case against Zamora and Castanon. … According to police, the men were sitting outside an apartment on East Kensington Road when a car pulled up. One man got out, walked onto the apartment property and pulled out a gun. Witnesses said he tried to shoot but his gun apparently jammed, according to law enforcement sources. … Zamora and Castanon pulled guns of their own and fired several times. None of the shots hit the gunman, who fled in the car. But one bullet traveled down the street and into Charupha's home." The Times notes, "The issue of self-defense in gang shootings in which bystanders are killed or wounded has been a matter of debate for years in Los Angeles. … In 2003, a mother decorating her Christmas tree in South Los Angeles was killed by a stray bullet fired during a gun battle between two gangs. … The LAPD eventually arrested the two suspects who fired the shots after someone in a passing car sprayed bullets in their direction. But prosecutors decided not to pursue the case, agreeing with investigators that the men apparently acted in self-defense."

LA Violence Fuels Racial Rivalry. The New York Times (1/17, Archibold) reports, "The Latino gang members were looking for a black person, any black person, to shoot, the police said, and they found one. Cheryl Green, perched near her scooter chatting with friends, was shot dead in a spray of bullets that left several other young people injured." The Times continues, "She was 14, an eighth grader who loved junk food and watching Court TV with her mother and had recently written a poem beginning: 'I am black and beautiful. I wonder how I will be living in the future.' … Cheryl's killing last month, which the police said followed a confrontation between the gang members and a black man, stands out in a wave of bias-related attacks and incidents in a city that promotes its diversity as much as frets over it." The Times adds, "Ethnic and racial tension comes to Los Angeles as regularly as the Santa Ana winds. Race-related fights afflict school campuses and jails, and two major riots, in 1965 and 1992, are hardly forgotten. But civil rights advocates say that the violence grew at an alarming rate last year, continuing a trend of more Latino versus black confrontations and prompting street demonstrations and long discussions on talk-radio programs and in community meetings. … Much of the violence springs from rivalries between black and Latino gangs, especially in neighborhoods where the black population has been declining and the Latino population surging. A 14 percent increase in gang crime last year, at a time when overall violent crime was down, has been attributed in good measure to the interracial conflict. … This month, the authorities reported that crimes in the city motivated by racial, religious or sexual orientation discrimination had increased 34 percent in 2005 over the previous year. Statistics for 2006 have not yet been compiled."

California Hate-Crime Trial Relies On Questionable Identification Tactic. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Mozingo) reports, "With closing arguments set to begin today, the case against 10 Long Beach youths accused of beating three white women Halloween night hinges almost entirely on identifications made in a Ralphs parking lot the night of the attack." The Times continues, "In a procedure known as a field show-up, police told the victims and a reputed witness that the youths — nine girls and a boy, ages 12 to 17 — were suspects and asked if they recognized them from the melee. In several subsequent police interviews, witnesses were never asked to pick the juveniles out of a lineup that included non-suspects: a means to test their memory that experts say is a standard and crucial procedure. Nor were they asked to identify them in open court." The Times adds, "Long Beach Police Cmdr. Jeffry Johnson said the field show-up is the most accurate form of identification in a case like this. 'Especially when you talk about numerous suspects, you have to go with immediate recollection,' he said. … But experts say field show-ups are inherently fallible and rarely used in isolation. … 'I can't remember ever seeing a case go to trial in which the only identification is a field show-up,' said Kathy Pezdek, a professor at Claremont Graduate University and expert witness in the area of eyewitness identification, in an interview. 'It's extremely unusual.'" The Times notes, "Much of what has occurred in the Long Beach courtroom of Judge Gibson W. Lee, however, is unusual. The mild-mannered jurist has let attorneys deliver long fiery speeches, make objection after objection that all but stopped the testimony and ignore his orders to stick to the facts of the case. … Deputy Dist. Atty. Andrea Bouas has accused the youths of having gang connections, of orchestrating the destruction of a witness' car, of calling the witness 'a stupid bitch' outside of court to intimidate her. None of Bouas' accusations are based on evidence in the case, and they normally would have been heard out of the presence of a jury. … But the Long Beach hate-crime case highlights a critical — and many experts say troublesome — difference between adult and juvenile court: There are no juries in juvenile court; a judge decides the minors' fate."

Attorney Sues Law Firm For Anti-Gay Bias. The New York Times (1/17, Creswell) reports, "An associate at one of the country's most prestigious law firms, Sullivan & Cromwell, filed a state lawsuit in Manhattan yesterday accusing the firm of a systematic campaign of discrimination and retaliation against him because of his sexual orientation." The Times continues, "Aaron B. Charney, 28, who is a fourth-year associate, asserts in the lawsuit, filed in New York State Supreme Court in Manhattan, that several partners in Sullivan & Cromwell's highly regarded mergers and acquisitions practice subjected him to 'lewd and illegal conduct,' beginning in the fall of 2005. He is seeking a jury trial and unspecified compensatory and punitive damages." The Times adds, "In his lawsuit, Mr. Charney accuses members of the firm of demanding he be terminated for carrying on an "unnatural" gay relationship with another Sullivan & Cromwell associate; Mr. Charney denies the relationship. The suit also contends that after he filed a formal internal complaint, members of the firm suggested that he move to a foreign office and then fabricated reviews to accuse him of overbilling clients, among other things. … While Mr. Charney has not been terminated, he says he was told he should not come to the office while an internal investigation is continuing." The Times notes, "In an e-mailed statement, the firm's chairman, H. Rodgin Cohen, said the firm "categorically denies Mr. Charney's allegations of discrimination and retaliation.' … Another of the firm's partners, David H. Braff, said that the firm had a strong culture of acceptance and that it had handled several landmark cases over the years that protected gay and lesbian rights."

ANTITRUST:

Possible XM-Sirius Merger Would Face DOJ, FCC Hurdles. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A3, McBride, Schatz) reports, "With speculation on the upswing about a possible merger between satellite-radio rivals Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., the companies face a serious obstacle: Federal Communications Commission regulations that appear to specifically forbid a merger." The Journal continues, "Winning approval for any deal, from both the FCC and the Justice Department, may rest in persuading regulators that the two companies face many more competitors than just each other. Competing technologies that have helped damp satellite radio's growth -- like iPods, podcasts and Internet radio -- may give the companies ammunition to persuade regulators that a merger of the only two satellite-radio players isn't a threat to competition." The Journal adds, "Merger rumors involving the companies have surfaced periodically over the last year, stoked by Sirius officials like Chief Executive Mel Karmazin, who has said he would be interested in buying XM. Officials at XM typically dismissed the possibility. … But in recent weeks, XM has notably softened its stance. While XM still stops short of saying it is exploring a deal, it no longer rules out the possibility. That has given new life to hopes for a deal. Since the beginning of the year, XM's stock has risen almost 19% and Sirius's 17%. … An XM-Sirius merger is gaining more urgency in the industry as both companies struggle to win consumers. While both firms add new listeners each quarter, neither is reaching the lofty subscriber levels that were expected a few years ago. … The merger talk, to some, seems like a trial balloon intended to gauge the reaction of both investors and regulators. Such advance work may be necessary given that any deal would face significant hurdles." The Journal notes, "The companies would need to persuade the Justice Department that a merger wouldn't be anticompetitive, even though it would likely result in higher subscription rates and less consumer choice. The companies, however, say thinking about satellite radio on its own defines the options too narrowly."

Localities Can Be Burned With Risky Municipal Bond Swaps. Bloomberg (1/17, Braun) reports, "The third-poorest city in Pennsylvania is a lot poorer because of a 28-year bet on interest rates that already has gone awry." Bloomberg continues, "The Reading, Pennsylvania, school district, which has 18,323 students, this week must pay $230,000 to Deutsche Bank AG, Germany's largest bank, because it's on the losing side of a wager that long-term interest rates will rise faster than short- term interest rates. In April, the board rushed approval of the so-called interest rate swap in eight days after its adviser said the transaction may earn the district $16 million by 2034. … While Reading's taxpayers are liable for the loss, bankers and advisers already have pocketed $1 million in fees for arranging the swap, enough to buy 11 Mercedes-Benz S-550 sedans. This week's payment to Deutsche Bank would have covered the school district's monthly utility bill." Bloomberg adds, "Local governments from Augusta, Georgia, to Oakland, California, are being lured by similar opportunities to speculate with derivatives created by the world's biggest banks. Most of the $400 billion of private agreements sold to municipalities escape taxpayers' notice and are little understood by the public officials and administrators who approve them. … While financial firms often promote the agreements as a way for municipalities to lock in borrowing costs for future projects, the swap bought by Reading amounts to a bet on the relationship between short-term and long-term interest rates. If long-term rates rise higher than short-term rates, the municipalities will profit from the agreement and vice-versa. … Reading, like most municipalities, borrows with long-term bonds. The most recent bond the school district sold in December 2005 has a final maturity of 2036. The interest-rate swaps that Reading and other borrowers are purchasing are typically matched to the maturities of bonds that have been issued. … The swap market is unregulated and trading occurs over the counter, so municipalities can't be sure they are getting the best price on contracts. In Jefferson County, Alabama, one of the tens of thousands of borrowers in the municipal bond market, officials have bought $5.8 billion of swaps. Officials there have received subpoenas from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission asking about the swaps. … The Internal Revenue Service has probed whether the mispricing of municipal swaps has allowed advisers and banks to make excessive fees, depriving the federal government of earnings from the investment of tax-exempt bond proceeds. The U.S. Justice Department and SEC have asked for information on swaps as part of an antitrust investigation into alleged bid-rigging in the $2.3 trillion municipal market."

Writer Weighs Proper Level Of Judicial Review Of Mergers. In an op-ed for the Deal (1/17), David T. Blonder, an associate in the antitrust practice in the Washington office of Chadbourne & Parke and formerly an attorney with the Antitrust Division of the United States Department of Justice, writes, "The controversy surrounding Judge Emmet Sullivan's review of the merger consent decrees entered into among Verizon Communications Inc.,

AT&T Corp. and the U.S. Department of Justice is shining the spotlight both on the boundaries of independent judicial review in assessing the impact of antitrust consent decrees on market competition, and on the implications of a more stringent evaluation of future mergers." Blonder continues, "Sullivan, of the U.S. District Court in Washington, has delayed a ruling on whether to grant his required approval of the SBC Communications Inc.-AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications-MCI Inc. mergers. The judge recently took umbrage at comments from a Verizon attorney who said that company's merger would not be undone by the court, and he vowed to finish his independent review. … Commentators claim that increased judicial scrutiny may alter how merging parties negotiate settlement agreements with the DOJ. If the prospect of settlement dims due to increased oversight, the parties' negotiating tactics may change, and the incentives for either side to make early concessions may be eliminated. This might further create a perception that the DOJ has to litigate cases even though a structural settlement is available to remedy competitive harm. … The facts, however, seem to belie the inference that settlements are less likely. Judicial review of the decrees that have followed the Tunney Act amendments suggests that Sullivan's role in these proceedings is anomalous to that of other courts. Since the amendments, courts, including the D.C. court, have approved at least eight merger settlement agreements. Of these, no court engaged in the type of review that Sullivan is contemplating." Blonder concludes, "The current judicial hullabaloo likely is limited to the confines of Judge Sullivan's courtroom. Only time, and possibly a decision from an appeals court, will tell whether Sullivan is ushering in a new era for merger settlement review or whether this exercise was simply much ado about nothing. This interested spectator thinks it will be the latter."

CVS Boosts Caremark Bid In Battle With Express Scripts. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A4, Berman) reports, "Challenging a rival bid from Express Scripts Inc., drugstore chain CVS Corp. bumped up its offer for pharmacy manager Caremark Rx Inc. by $2 a share, to be paid in the form of a dividend, while also agreeing to a large share buyback that would shrink the combined companies' shares about 10%." The Journal continues, "The moves ratcheted up the competitive dynamic between Express Scripts and CVS, which are battling for the allegiances of Caremark shareholders in an increasingly caustic battle of words and takeover tactics." The Journal adds, "The Express offer put CVS in an increasingly untenable position, particularly as it headed on the road to sell its deal to shareholders. The question now is how well the $2-a-share dividend -- coupled with a $5 billion share buyback -- will placate shareholders. … As recently as last year, Express and Caremark explored a deal of their own, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings. That deal never led to anything substantive, and at least by Express's reckoning, faltered primarily on valuation. … That undercuts Caremark's contention that the two would be unworthy partners because of antitrust concerns and strategic fit, said Express Chief Executive George Paz in an interview yesterday."

Bloomberg (1/17, Rapaport) reports, "Express Scripts' unsolicited offer was rejected last week by Caremark's board. Buying Caremark would make Express Scripts, based in Maryland Heights, Missouri, the largest manager of drug benefits in the U.S. CVS, based in Woonsocket, Rhode Island, wants Caremark to help give it more bargaining power in negotiating the price of medicines." Bloomberg continues, "Express Scripts on Jan. 3 asked U.S. antitrust regulators to approve both its proposed tender offer and its takeover bid, the company said in the filing. The deadline for the U.S. Federal Trade Commission to review these proposals is midnight Feb. 2, unless regulators extend the waiting period by seeking additional information, Express Scripts said. … Caremark may lose contracts that would generate more than $8 billion in revenue because of a threatened proxy fight, Caremark Chief Executive Officer Mac Crawford said Jan. 10 at a meeting with investors in San Francisco."

Market Watch (1/17, Moore) reports, "Express Scripts, which announced its intention to bid for Caremark in December, has said it would nominate four members to Caremark's board and has asked a Delaware court to void the $675 million breakup fee protecting the Caremark and CVS combination. … 'CVS remains in the driver's seat in this contest with this latest effort no more likely to succeed than the others that have preceded it,' Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel wrote in a note to clients. … Heinbockel said key factors are the spread between the two bids as well as antitrust approval and how combining with Caremark would transform the winner's business. The spread on the Express Scripts offer has narrowed from 16% to 7%, he said. … In other words, the bid by Express Scripts 'is no longer notably superior' to what CVS has offered, Heinbockel said."

Search Engines Use Spinoff Sites To Test New Features. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, D1, Vascellaro) reports, "Kevin McCarty, long a devout Google user, recently discovered a search engine he often finds more helpful. It's called SearchMash.com, and unlike Google and other major search sites, it pulls up video, images and text all at the same time. … It turns out, though, that SearchMash is Google. In recent months, the top search engine and its main rivals have stealthily set up a new generation of search engines where they try out new tools and features on consumers -- without putting their tried-and-true formulas at risk. If something proves to be a hit -- the combined search results that Mr. McCarty likes so much, for instance -- it could eventually be folded into the parent site. For now, though, these sites provide an entertaining and even useful glimpse into the evolution of Web, and in particular, search engines, which in their basic operation haven't changed much in years." The Journal continues, "Google Inc. launched SearchMash.com in September without the Google name, although it is mentioned in the site's privacy policy. SearchMash displays a subset of the normal Google search results in an entirely different interface with collapsible menus for video, blog and image results on the same screen. In December, IAC/InterActiveCorp.'s Ask.com launched Ask X, which chops up the results page into an unconventional three-panel format. Standard search results are flanked on the left by suggested terms to help you narrow or expand your search and, on the right, by results broken down by categories such as news and dictionary results." The Journal adds, "All of the leading search brands have operated their own internal test sites and labs for years. They frequently test layout and formatting tweaks on their main sites, often without users knowing. But now they are making their bold new ideas more public and asking users for feedback. Ask X links to a feedback form where users can submit random thoughts about the quality of the results."

Hackers Attack DVD Copy Protection. The New York Times (1/17, Stone) reports, "Last weekend, a loose-knit coalition of hackers around the world defeated the antipiracy software protecting several high-resolution movies in the HD DVD format. They then began distributing copies of the films…using BitTorrent, a popular file-sharing tool. … The move could send the technology companies behind the new wave of advanced DVDs scrambling back to the drawing board to improve their copy protection, and prompt Hollywood studios to rethink their alliances in the war between the HD DVD and Blu-ray formats." The Times continues, "The HD DVD standard is backed by Toshiba, Microsoft and Intel and uses copy protection technology known as the Advanced Access Content System. The rival Blu-ray format, supported by Sony, Hewlett-Packard and Dell, uses the same system but adds a level of software that acts as a backup when the first level is compromised, so it is considered to be slightly more secure. … The new intrusions came less than a month after a programmer calling himself Muslix64 announced in a Web forum that he had unraveled at least part of the HD DVD protection system. Muslix64 released free software that allows users to insert HD DVDs into their computers and make copies of those films without the original encryption. However, to make it work, users still needed a special title key, generated by the A.A.C.S. software, for each movie they were trying to copy." The Times adds, "Bill Rosenblatt, president of the consulting firm GiantSteps which specializes in content protection issues, said the intrusion was less of a crisis than the 1999 defeat of the encryption that protects standard DVDs, which allowed movie files to be freely copied and shared online. … However, some security experts said the intrusions were more serious. Bruce Schneier, the chief technology officer of the security company BT Counterpane, said it was unclear what effect revoking licenses would have. If new discs of the movies are updated with new title codes, the old discs in stores will still be vulnerable. And hackers will surely redouble efforts to crack the new discs."

Nike Poised To Seek Acquisitions. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, B3C, Stepankowsky) reports, "Nike Inc. hasn't made an acquisition since it bought the Starter brand in 2004. But with a lot of cash on its balance sheet, and fast growth in its niche brands, the Beaverton, Ore., athletic footwear and apparel company appears poised to pounce when the time is right." The Journal continues, "During the past two years, Nike has focused on internal reorganization and developing its core Nike brand. During its fiscal second-quarter conference call, however, executives appeared more open to the acquisition idea than they have been recently." The Journal adds, "While Nike continues to see steady growth globally in its Nike brand, the potential for faster growth comes from some of the smaller brands it has bought over the years. … These include Cole Haan for upscale dress shoes, Bauer Nike Hockey, Hurley International for the surf/skate market, Converse, and Starter, which has been renamed Exeter Brands, for the discount market. Nike developed its golf business internally."

Cablevision Board Rejects Dolans' Offer. The New York Times (1/17, Sorkin) reports, "The board of the Cablevision Systems Corporation rejected an $8.9 billion offer yesterday to sell the company to the Dolans, its founding family." The Times continues, "The rebuff was a rare example of a board standing up to and denying a request by a controlling shareholder." The Times adds, "The rejection by the board, which set up a special committee to review the Dolans' proposal, is the second time it has refused to sell the company to the family. … In 2005, the Dolans, led by the founder, Charles F. Dolan, and his son James, offered to break the company in two and buy Cablevision's cable television assets. But they were forced to withdraw the offer before the board formally rejected it." The Times notes, "The Dolans' latest effort, though, was much more public, and at times it appeared acrimonious. Rather than withdraw its offer when told it would be rejected, the family increased its bid last Friday by about $1 billion and tried to put pressure on the board by setting a deadline tomorrow, declaring that the proposal was its 'best and final' offer. … In rejecting the bid, the board said in a letter to the family that the offer 'does not represent fair value for the company's public shareholders nor does it contemplate a transaction that is in their best interest.'"

Report Says Interior Official Was Told Of Oil And Gas Royalties Error. The New York Times (1/17, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "A top Interior Department official was told nearly three years ago about a legal blunder that allowed drilling companies to avoid billions of dollars in payments for oil and gas pumped from publicly owned waters, a report by the department's chief independent investigator has found." The report "suggested that Interior officials could have fixed the mistake far more easily if they had taken action when they first recognized it." The report "contradicts statements by the official, Johnnie M. Burton, the director of the department's Minerals Management Service, who told a House hearing last September that she first learned about the royalties problem in January 2006." The Times adds, "Confronted by e-mail messages from subordinates from early 2004, the report said, Ms. Burton conceded that she probably had been told earlier, but 'did not remember putting a great deal of thought into the matter.'"

White House Denies Plans For Carbon Caps. The Financial Times (1/17, Daniel) reports the White House "denied it was planning a U-turn on its climate change policy by embracing a system of formal caps on greenhouse emissions, despite rising pressure from European governments to change its stance." Although energy security "will be a key theme in President George W. Bush's State of the Union address next week, the White House issued an unusually public rebuttal of rumours about its climate change policy." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "I want to walk you back from the whole carbon cap story...The carbon cap stuff is not accurate. It's wrong."

The Washington Times (1/17, Dinan, 88K) reports Snow said Bush "will lay out his new climate-change policy in his State of the Union address next week, but sources familiar with the drafting of the speech said the president will argue that global warming can be better addressed through technology and greater use of renewable energy sources than through caps imposed on businesses and industries." Analysts and observers "have speculated for months that Mr. Bush is due for a change in his global-warming policy, not least because some of his top advisers, including Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., support such a move." In addition, "reports from London this week said British officials were predicting Mr. Bush would adopt mandatory carbon caps, the type of solution called for in the Kyoto Protocol negotiated by President Clinton but rejected by Mr. Bush." Snow said that Bush "has committed $29 billion to climate science and clean-energy technology, and that although funding for climate research at NASA is falling, the budget for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration is increasing."

State Of The Union Expected To Address Energy, Social Security. The AP (1/17, Riechmann) reports President Bush, "already facing fierce opposition to his decision to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, will confront a tough audience next Tuesday when he delivers his State of the Union address to the first Democratic Congress in 12 years." Among the "prominent themes in the speech" will be "reducing U.S. dependence on foreign oil and supporting alternative fuels," and Bush "also will challenge Congress to fix Social Security's long-term solvency problem, find a way to compromise on immigration and preserve tax cuts.

Lawmakers also will be listening for hints of what he might veto." Republicans "see the speech as a chance for Bush to put a wide-angle lens on the nation's problems, taking the focus away from Iraq. Still, the war's shadow will hang over the joint session of Congress when Bush speaks."

Webb To Deliver Democratic Response. The AP (1/17) reports, "Freshman Sen. Jim Webb, a Vietnam War veteran, will deliver the official Democratic response to President Bush's State of the Union Address, where the war in Iraq is expected to be a central topic."

CQ Politics (1/17, Benenson) reports Webb is "an early opponent of the Iraq war, a critic of President Bush's current proposal to increase troop strength there, and a vocal advocate of economic populism." Webb's "political credentials and background in the military surely were the major factors in the decision by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada to choose Webb for the role." Webb's remarks "will mark the second consecutive year that a Virginia Democrat will be delivering the party's official response to Bush's annual message to Congress. In 2006, Democratic Gov. Tim Kaine — elected to his office in 2005 — delivered the party's response."

The Washington Post (1/17, A4, Craig, 690K) reports the "selection of Webb by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) underscores the party's efforts to counteract Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq at a time when opinion polls show most Americans want to begin exploring ways to bring more troops home." Several Democrats "said the decision to have two Virginia lawmakers in a row give the speech highlights the party's efforts to continue to make inroads into what has long been a conservative-leaning state. Some political observers believe Virginia could be competitive in the 2008 presidential race, even though the state has not voted for a Democrat for president since 1964."

The Washington Times (1/17, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Webb said "he was honored to deliver the response and hoped Bush would discuss 'fresh, creative solutions' that would 'move the country forward.'" Webb's "selection to deliver the response also has fueled further speculation that Democrats plan to push harder to win Virginia, known as a 'red state,' in the 2008 presidential election."

The Hill (1/17, Schor) reports Webb "will bring a unique vantage point on the war as a military expert who served as Navy secretary under President Reagan and did not flinch from challenging Bush to begin troop withdrawal during a visit just after Webb unseated Sen. George Allen (R)."

Report Cites BP With Failure To Emphasize Safety At US Plants. The AP (1/17, Porretto) reports, "British oil company BP failed to emphasize safety at its U.S. refineries before the 2005 Texas City explosion that killed 15, according to a report released Tuesday by an independent panel led by former U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III." The AP continues, "The panel, in a statement summarizing its 300-plus page report on BP PLC's operations, said the company had made strides in personal accident prevention but came up short on the bigger picture. … 'The panel maintains a central theme that prior to the Texas City tragedy BP emphasized personal safety and had achieved significant improvements in personal injury rates, but the company did not emphasize process safety,' the statement said. 'BP mistakenly interpreted improving personal injury rates as an indication of acceptable process safety performance at its U.S. refineries.'" The AP adds, "The 11-member panel made 10 recommendations, including that an independent monitor report to the company's board of directors for five years. … 'BP gets it and I get it, too,' BP CEO John Browne told reporters by video link from London. 'I recognize the need for improvement.'"

The Houston Chronicle (1/17, Belli, Clanton) reports, "The report says BP's board should appoint an independent monitor to routinely report back over the next five years on progress the company is making toward implementing 10 recommendations being made by the panel. … The panel found no evidence, though, that BP purposely turned a blind eye toward operational safety or intentionally short-changed safety. … Instead, it found that BP chiefs were focused on personal safety statistics concerning such minor accidents as slip and falls and vehicle collisions. Meanwhile, they were oblivious to the broader problems brewing in operations, which the panel refers to as 'process safety,' at all five of their domestic refineries." The Chronicle notes, "The Texas City explosion occurred as workers were restarting a unit after a maintenance shutdown. Federal investigators looking into causes of the blast have said that malfunctioning equipment, poor communication between workers and managers, outdated or nonexistent safety plans, even worker fatigue were contributing factors. … Although their final report isn't due out for two months, the U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board last year urged BP to create an independent panel to review the corporate safety culture after finding evidence that management may have a lax attitude toward process."

BP CEO Denies Putting "Profits Above Safety." The Financial Times (1/17) reports, "BP on Tuesday night hit back at suggestions it put profits over safety after a damning independent report found 'material deficiencies' and systemic problems in stewardship of all five of its US refineries." The Times notes that a panel led by former US Secretary of State James Baker "identified a series of weaknesses in BP's safety practices." BP CEO Lord Browne "denied cost-cutting was responsible for failings: 'We've never focused on profits above safety.'" The Times adds, "The report made 10 recommendations that BP is expected to follow in full." BP "expects to fund the recommendations from within the US safety, compliance and regulatory affairs budget which it increased last July from $6bn to $7bn."

The Washington Post (1/17, Mufson) notes that in a "347-page report, the panel…said that the London company failed to provide 'effective' leadership to make the safety of its industrial equipment 'a core value' at its five U.S. refineries." The Post adds, "BP said it would adopt all the recommendations and noted that it had already taken many steps to fix the problems that led to the blast at its Texas City, Tex., refinery, which killed 15 workers and injured more than 170 others."

The New York Times (1/17, Timmons) says the report "concluded that weak leadership at BP and a lack of attention to effective safety helped create a dangerous setting that led to 15 deaths at the oil giant's Texas refinery." BP's "departing chief executive, John Browne, denied that there were fundamental problems with BP's structure or that a succession of problems were related. But he said he 'has a responsibility to implement these findings' and a 'moral responsibility' to make sure the company is improved." The Times adds, "BP has had a succession of diverse problems in recent years, including leaks in its Alaska pipeline and accusations of market manipulation at its trading desks, leading some to re-examine a once highly praised company and its longtime chief executive, Mr. Browne."

USA Today (1/17, Iwata) reports, "Led by…Baker, the panel's report comes two years after an explosion and fire at BP's refinery in Texas City, Texas, killed 15 people and injured 170 in one of the worst U.S. workplace disasters in history." The panel, which was appointed by Browne in 2005 at the urging of the U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, "said BP had improved 'personal safety' procedures and lowered the injury rates for workers in recent years. But BP failed to create company-wide safety performance systems and oversight that could prevent fatal serious blasts, fires and spills."

Report To Test BP's Next Chief Executive. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Cummins) reports, "The London-based oil titan, reacting to the review released yesterday by an independent panel, promised to embrace a number of sweeping changes at its U.S. oil refineries, including engaging an independent body to monitor safety practices at the company." The report "is the most recent rebuke to longtime BP CEO John Browne," who last week "said he would step down about a year and a half earlier than expected." BP's "effort to minimize damage from" the report "presents the first big test for BP's next chief executive, Tony Hayward." Hayward, currently BP's head of exploration and production, "will take over as CEO in August."

FTimes Says Other Companies Should Pay Attention To What Happened At BP. In an editorial, the Financial Times (1/17) says that "the management of BP, the oil giant, must not ignore yesterday's report from a panel chaired by" former US Secretary of State James A. Baker "into the safety and management of the company's US operations." The "panel looked at safety culture across BP Products North America, not just at Texas City, reflecting other accidents, including some at BP's Alaskan operations." The "panel's conclusions suggest that BP's executives were most at fault, but the board of directors does not escape. The board relied on information about safety given to it by management. But, implies the report, the board did not question that information." BP's boardroom, "where many non-executives have been in place for almost a decade, needs to be revamped." The Times adds that other industrial companies also face grave safety risks, and non-executives "need to start asking the right questions."

Justices Sidestep Eminent Domain Case. The New York Times (1/17, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "The Supreme Court on Tuesday bypassed an opportunity to revisit or limit its much-disputed 2005 ruling that upheld governmental power to use eminent domain to foster economic development. Without comment, the justices declined to hear a case from Port Chester in Westchester County, N.Y., that challenged the village's use of eminent domain in a dispute between a property owner and a private company designated as the developer of a run-down 27-acre urban renewal area."

High Court Declines To Review 9th Circuit's Diablo Canyon Dry Cask Decision. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/17, B2, Davidson) reports, "The US Nuclear Regulatory Commission and PG&E were issued a major legal setback Tuesday when the Supreme Court declined to consider a lower court decision requiring that a nuclear power plant near San Luis Obispo be analyzed for terrorist risk. The high court's refusal to take up the case means the Nuclear Regulatory Commission," must "now formally study the environmental impacts of potential attacks on the Diablo Canyon plant, said an attorney for San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, an anti-nuclear group that brought the lawsuit. But officials with the regulatory commission and PG&E, which operates the plant, said they were looking at what legal options might remain open to them." The Chronicle adds, "Dave McIntyre, NRC spokesman, told The Chronicle that the agency has acted 'aggressively since Sept. 11, 2001, to enhance security at nuclear facilities. It would be dishonest and inappropriate for me to speculate on what the commission will decide as the best way forward,' he said."

The New York Times (1/17, Greenhouse) reports that Pacific Gas and Electric, wants "a 20-year license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to build and operate a spent-fuel storage installation there." The Times adds, "The utility's appeal, Pacific Gas and Electric v. San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, No. 06-466, argued that the ruling was a misinterpretation of federal environmental law that would place unnecessary burdens on license applicants. The government itself did not file a Supreme Court appeal, however. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement told the court in his brief that while the decision was incorrect and potentially 'disruptive,' it was too soon to know how disruptive it would prove to be in practice."

Decision Seen As Blow To NRC And PG&E. Under the headline, "Order For Diablo Review Stands Up," the San Luis Obispo Tribune (1/17, Sneed) reports, "The court announced Tuesday it will not hear the case. Doing so exhausted all review of the lawsuit, forcing the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission and plant owner Pacific Gas and Electric Co. to comply with a ruling of the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. That ruling will likely force the agency and PG&E to redo the environmental analysis of the dry-cask storage facility, complete with more public hearings to specifically address how the environment could be harmed if terrorists attack the facility. NRC officials do not yet have a timeline for fulfilling the court ruling, said Dave McIntyre, NRC spokesman." The Tribune adds, "Mothers for Peace spokeswoman Jane Swanson said the group is elated by the Supreme Court's decision. It will force the NRC and the nuclear industry to more openly consider health and environmental risks associated with terrorist attacks when designing and building nuclear facilities, she said. 'Now, after years of resistance, the NRC and PG&E are forced to address these concerns,' she said."

An advance version of the San Luis Obispo Tribune's (1/16, Sneed) coverage noted, "Construction is continuing on the dry casks and is not expected to be delayed as the NRC decides how to respond to the court ruling. PG&E may not be able to load spent fuel into the casks before the NRC decides how to act."

The Lompoc (CA) Record (1/17, Charlton) reports, "Jeff Lewis, PG&E Diablo Canyon spokesman, said the utility company is disappointed but plans to proceed with the dry-cask project while the NRC decides how it will comply with the Supreme Court's ruling. 'To this point, we've spent $74 million on this project,' Lewis said, 'and we're on schedule to start the initial loading (of the casks) late this year, pending any other developments.' Lewis added that to keep the dry-cask project on schedule, 'PG&E expects the NRC to clearly define the issues to be resolved to address the Ninth Circuit's concerns, the procedures to be followed and the schedule for resolution.'"

Greenwire (1/16, O'Driscoll) reports, "The federal government" fought "the appeals court decision, charging that the Atomic Energy Act is the appropriate tool for protecting nuclear facilities against nuclear attack. NRC officials say the agency has used its AEA authority aggressively since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to enhance security at nuclear facilities. NRC spokesman David McIntyre said today that the federal government's view is that the NEPA terrorism issue, while decided incorrectly by the appeals court, was not ready for Supreme Court review. 'There may be opportunities for the NRC to raise the issue again in future court cases,' he said."

Platts Commodity News (1/16) reports, "PG&E called on NRC to clearly define the issues that must still be resolved, the procedures to be followed, and a schedule for completing the work. PG&E is building a dry cask storage facility because Diablo Canyon's spent fuel pool is running out of space. The utility hopes to begin loading dry casks by the second quarter of 2008."

Decision Expected To Have National Implications. KSBY-TV Santa Barbara, CA (1/16, Musada) reported on its Website that the decision was "a major victory for the local watchdog group, Mothers for Peace, and nuclear opponents nationwide. 'Today's ruling is a real triumph,' says Mothers for Peace spokesperson Jane Swanson. The 'triumph' to which Swanson is referring is a setback for PG&E, which operates Diablo Canyon." Swanson "says her local group has finally prevailed over nuclear giants. Swanson hopes the ruling will be applied to nuclear operators nationwide."

Ruling May Affect Oyster Creek Relicensing Application. In an early version of it story, the Press of Atlantic City (1/16) reports, "Although that ruling was aimed at the storage of spent nuclear fuel rods at Diablo Canyon Power Plant in California, the ruling by the Supreme Court could force a re-evaluation of Oyster Creek's ongoing attempt at license renewal. The Oyster Creek plant stores spent nuclear fuel rods in a pool which is 119 feet above the ground and holds about 375 tons of highly radioactive fuel rods. The state of New Jersey last year filed a contention nearly identical to the one filed with the 9th Circuit Court by the San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace."

The Cherry Hills Courier Post (1/17) reports, "The US Supreme Court on Tuesday may have strengthened New Jersey's case to have federal regulators consider the impact of a terrorist attack on the Oyster Creek nuclear power plant in Lacey before renewing its operating license. The justices, without comment, turned away an appeal by a California utility, which had unsuccessfully argued that regulators should not have had to evaluate an attack's impact before approving a storage site for radioactive waste." The arguments "presented by the plaintiff in the California case, a citizens' group, and those presented by New Jersey officials in seeking a federal administrative hearing on the terrorism issue were nearly identical."

NRC Maintains That 9th Circuit's Ruling Limited To Diablo Canyon. The Asbury Park Press (1/17, Clunn) reports, "Neil Sheehan, a spokesman for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, said it is now up to the NRC to decide what additional action must be taken in regards to the California waste site proposal for the agency to comply with the appellate court ruling. The winning arguments presented by the citizens' group San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace and then by New Jersey environmental officials seeking a federal hearing on the terrorism issue were nearly identical." The Press adds, "Before Tuesday's ruling, the Nuclear Energy Institute, an advocacy group for the industry in Washington, said a terrorism review triggered by the policy act might impede the licensing of nuclear power plants and delay important federal projects. But Sheehan said the appellate decision only applies to the 9th Circuit. 'If the Supreme Court would have taken this up and ruled on it, then it could have had national implications,' he said. Sheehan said it is now up to the NRC to decide what additional action must be taken in the California waste site case to comply with the appellate court ruling." According to the "NRC, renewal reviews do not currently include terrorism because that threat is evaluated regularly through drills and inspections. State officials want to change that, and have a hearing request on the issue pending before the top five officials at the NRC.

Amid Abramoff Probe, Former Interior Official Resigns From Jamestown Commission. The AP (1/17, Barisic) reports, "The Interior Department's former No. 2 official has resigned from a federal commission for Jamestown's 400th anniversary amid reports that he is a target of a probe involving imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff. … 'As you have no doubt seen, recently there have (been) published reports concerning investigations of actions involving me,' J. Steven Griles wrote in a letter to Frank Atkinson, chairman of the Jamestown 400th Commemoration Commission. … 'Without commenting on those reports, I have come to the conclusion that it would be better for the commission that I withdraw my membership,' Griles wrote in the letter, dated Jan. 10 and provided to reporters by the commission on Tuesday." The AP adds, "The commission works with the state agency planning events for the 400th anniversary of Jamestown, America's first permanent English settlement. Its responsibilities include a series of conferences on the future of democracy. … Griles, former deputy interior secretary during President Bush's first term, was notified by letter and told of possible charges - including lying to Congress - at a meeting this month with Justice Department prosecutors, The Associated Press reported last week, citing people familiar with the probe who spoke on condition of anonymity. … The charges involve questions about whether Griles falsely testified in 2005 before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee about Abramoff's attempts to hire Griles away from Interior."

SCOTUS Rejects Appeal Of Anacostia River Pollution Limits. The Washington Post (1/17, B3, Fahrenthold) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court let stand yesterday a lower court's ruling that would set stricter pollution limits for the Anacostia River, giving environmentalists a victory in a long-running battle over the river's gluts of raw sewage." The Post continues, "The court's decision means that there will be daily caps on the amounts of various pollutants dumped into the Anacostia, although federal officials said it could take until next year for the details to be worked out." The Post adds, "Previously, the Environmental Protection Agency had required only annual or seasonal pollution caps, which can be easier to meet. A panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit rejected that approach in April, and yesterday the Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal from the EPA and the D.C. Water and Sewer Authority. … The river has fecal bacteria, trash and toxic chemicals that make it one of the most unhealthy streams in the region." The Post notes, "The most significant effect of the decision probably will be on the District's antiquated sewer system, which dumps out raw sewage and rainwater during storms. Environmentalists had argued that the damage done by each one of these "overflows" was so severe that an annual limit was not adequate. … Although the environmental groups celebrated yesterday's decision as a victory, it was unclear what the immediate impact on the river's pollution would be. Participants in the case said the EPA might not have the details of the daily limits ready until next year."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Figliuzzi Says Counter-Terrorism Top FBI Priority. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (1/16, Tobin, 352K) reported, "The new head of the Cleveland FBI just bought a house in Bay Village and is moving his family here. That might not sound like much, but it's a leap of faith for C. Frank Figliuzzi, who last month became the fourth man in five years to head the local FBI office." The Plain Dealer added, "Figliuzzi said he will follow the priorities outlined by the FBI's leaders, which puts counter-terrorism at the top. … 'The threat is very real,' Figliuzzi said. 'The fact that there hasn't been an attack since Sept. 11 is not the result of luck.' Figliuzzi repeats the mantra of local law enforcement, that cooperation among the various agencies is paramount." Cleveland Police Chief Michael McGrath said, "We've never had a better relationship with our federal partners, and we'll continue moving forward." The Plain Dealer noted, "Figliuzzi is proud that he was able to forge relationships with Arab and Muslim groups in Florida while investigating terrorism there. … Altaf Ali, director of the Florida chapter of the Council on American Islamic Relations, said Figliuzzi often visited and met with leaders at mosques while working in Miami. Muslims will find him a good working partner, Ali said."

Israeli Drug Kingpin Reaches Plea Deal With US. The Miami Herald (1/17, Weaver) reports, "International narcotics kingpin Ze'ev Rosenstein pleaded guilty Tuesday in federal court to conspiring to import and distribute hundreds of kilos of the popular nightclub drug Ecstasy -- but he will serve his sentence in his native Israel." The Herald continues, "U.S. District Judge William Dimitrouleas of Fort Lauderdale sentenced Rosenstein to 12 years in prison. But under an extradition agreement with Israel, he will be allowed to return home to serve the sentence -- and could qualify for parole in five years and four months with time off for good behavior. … Under federal sentencing guidelines, he faced 11 to 14 years in prison." The Herald adds, "Rosenstein, 52, listed among the top 50 traffickers worldwide by the Justice Department, agreed to the plea deal on conspiracy charges of peddling and smuggling about 850,000 pills of MDMA, a synthetic drug commonly known as Ecstasy. … The notorious Israeli criminal, who had initially pleaded not guilty, was scheduled for trial next week. He has been in custody in Israel and Miami since late 2004, so at the minimum he would end up serving a total of about 7 ½ years. … His plea agreement Tuesday is bound by conditions in Rosenstein's extradition agreement between the United States and Israel, which initially paved the way for him to be prosecuted in South Florida. … Those conditions, approved by the Israeli Supreme Court, allow Rosenstein to serve his prison sentence in his homeland, where there is a provision for early release for good behavior. There is no parole of any kind today in the federal criminal justice system. … 'To the extent that system differs from ours, I cannot comment,' said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta in Miami. 'He would be serving [his prison sentence] under the Israeli rules.' … Acosta said Rosenstein's conviction marks the end of his worldwide organization – 'his organization is no more.'"

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/17, Blum) reports prosecuting the case "grew more complicated for government lawyers in November after [Judge] Dimitrouleas refused to permit Israeli undercover agents to testify using false names. … Defense lawyers opposed the request, saying it would prevent them from thoroughly investigating the agents' backgrounds." The Sun-Sentinel adds that Rosenstein "admitted he took part in a plot to import 850,000 Ecstasy pills into the United States in 2001 to be sold in Miami and New York." This Sun-Sentinel story has been picked up by the Myrtle Beach Sun News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, Contra Costa Times, Kansas City Star, and other news outlets.

Haaretz.com (1/17) writes, "Once in Israel, Rosenstein will admit in court...to hiring Colombian mercenaries to target members of the Alperon family, also seen as crime kingpins. For that crime, Rosenstein will be sentenced to three years in prison, to be served concurrently with his 12-year sentence."

Local TV Coverage. WSCV-TV, Telemundo-Miami-Ft. Lauderdale, Florida (1/16. 6:00 p.m.) aired, "An Israeli citizen pleaded guilty today in a court in Fort Lauderdale to conspiracy to import thousands of Ecstasy pills into the USA. Zeev Rosenstein, also known as 'the fat man' is considered to be one of the top drug traffickers in the world, and part of the agreement with the authorities includes a sentence of 12 years, as oppose to one of 40 years had he been found guilty in a court of law."

WTVJ-TV, Miami-Ft. Lauderdale (1/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "One of the world's biggest drug traffickers pleads guilty to charges to conspiring to export thousands of Ecstasy pills into the United States. A plea by a top organized crime figure comes a week before the trial was to begin. He was sentenced to 12 years in prison to be served in Israel as part of the deal."

More Charged In "Operation Death Merchant." The AP (1/17) reports the federal government "continued its attack on a large Colombiabased heroin trafficking organization yesterday by announcing that 10 more people were charged in Manhattan and 20 others face charges in Colombia. The charges bring to 110 the number of people charged internationally in an investigation nicknamed Operation Death Merchant." The AP story was used by the Wall Street Journal, Newsday, the New York Sun, and Detroit News.

New York Daily News (1/17) reports federal agents "dismantled a Colombian heroin ring by arresting several couriers who stitched packets of drugs into their britches and then took cruise ships to the United States, authorities said yesterday. 'Drug traffickers have never lacked creativity in trying to smuggle in their drugs,' said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York office. 'But smuggling drugs aboard cruise ships is a new twist, as traffickers try to do an end run around airport security.'" Yesterday's charges "bring to 110 the number of people charged internationally during the three-year probe."

On its Web site, WNBC-TV, New York (1/16) reports charges "were unsealed Tuesday naming 10 members of an alleged heroin and cocaine trafficking organization accused of smuggling more than $7.5 million worth of heroin into the United States from Colombia. … Describing the overall results of Operation Death Merchant, DEA Special Agent in Charge John Gilbride said, 'Over 117 members have been arrested. Over 170 kilograms of cocaine and 55 kilograms of heroin seized and destroyed.'" Authorities said the smuggled drugs "were destined for the eastern part of the United States and distributed throughout New York, Baltimore and Detroit."

Reputed Norte Del Valle Cartel Leader Arrested In Colombia. UPI (1/16) reported, "An alleged Colombian drug kingpin wanted on charges of smuggling tons of cocaine into the United States has been captured, Caracol Radio reported. Eugenio Montoya was arrested after a prolonged police shootout in which no one was injured, police said. Montoya's Norte del Valle cartel is believed to be one of the largest in Colombia and responsible for smuggling a large portion of the cocaine that reached U.S. shores."

BBC News (1/16) reported Montoya, who "also is known as Don Hugo, is alleged to be a leader of the Norte del Valle group. He denies being a drug trafficker." Montoya's capture "has ended a lengthy manhunt in which the US had offered a $5m reward for his arrest."

Former Chicago City Worker Gets 5-Year Sentence For Dealing Heroin. The Chicago Tribune (1/16, Bush) reported a former city laborer "was sentenced to five years in federal prison Tuesday for dealing heroin as part of a drug ring run by a former city hoisting engineer. Michael Hart, who worked for the city's Water Management Department, was hooked on heroin when he turned to dealing to support his habit, said his attorney Eugene O'Malley." Hart "pleaded guilty in August to dealing large quantities of heroin through the drug ring run by George Prado, a veteran water management employee."

Los Angeles Police Chief Seeks Moratorium On New Marijuana Dispensaries. The Los Angeles Times (1/16, Mcgreevy) reported Police Chief William J. Bratton is calling for a moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries until strict rules can be adopted governing them. Bratton "said the number of dispensaries increased from four in November 2005 to 98 a year later. 'This has fostered an increase in … crime problems and caused quality-of-life issues for families and communities, as evidenced by the 110 complaints received from neighbors, business owners and concerned citizens concerning these dispensaries,'" Bratton said.

Police Commission Supports Moratorium. The Los Angeles Times (1/17) reports the Police Commission "voted Tuesday to support a moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries and tougher regulations of existing enterprises, even as…Bratton promised to work with federal authorities to prosecute businesses found to be violating the law."

On its Web site, KNBC-TV, Los Angeles (1/17) reports the Los Angeles Police Commission "agreed Tuesday to a moratorium on the issuance of permits for new medical marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles. Without discussion, the commission agreed with police Chief William Bratton's report that new dispensaries cannot be opened until new rules are adopted in governing where and when they can operate."

ATF Agent Infiltrates Michigan Robbery Ring. The Detroit News (1/17, Perkins) reports, "Authorities announced today that an undercover federal officer infiltrated an alleged robbery conspiracy, leading to the arrest of a man and teenager charged with plotting a series of heists Downriver." The News continues, "The Lincoln Park Police and federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives learned of the plan when a federal agent working another case was informed about the alleged conspiracy. … Authorities claim 19-year-old William Musser of Lincoln Park, and a 16-year-old Dearborn Heights male conspired to rob businesses by targeting employees at gunpoint. They were arrested Friday. … 'So often law enforcement is successful at solving crimes after the fact,' ATF Special Agent in Charge Valerie Goddard said in a statement. 'However in this instance, we prevented this violent crime from ever occurring.'" The News notes, "The duo was arrested in a parking lot in Lincoln Park the morning they allegedly planned to commit armed robbery of a tavern in that city, followed by a second robbery of a Taylor restaurant, said Vera Fedorak, public information officer for the ATF. … Musser was charged with conspiracy to commit robbery armed and attempted robbery armed. He remains jailed on a $30,000 bond. The juvenile is in the Wayne County Youth Home until prosecutors determine whether he will be charged as an adult."

IMMIGRATION:

US Indicts 148 Immigrants Captured In Swift Plant Raids. The AP (1/17) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says 148 illegal immigrants have been indicted for allegedly acquiring other peoples' Social Security numbers and other information to get jobs at Swift meat packing plants." The AP continues, "The indictments, issued in Iowa and five other states, follow federal raids on the plants last month in the largest-ever workplace crackdown on illegal immigration. The raids led to the arrests of nearly 13 hundred employees and temporarily halted operations for the meat processor." The AP adds, "Gonzales says the Bush administration is studying ways to curb identity theft, including better ways for police to report the crime, and to reduce the access that thieves have to Social Security numbers.The federal indictments include: 53 in Texas, 30 in Iowa, 26 in Nebraska, 20 in Minnesota, 18 in Utah and one in Colorado."

WOI-TV, Des Moines, IA (1/16, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "A total of 148 illegal immigrants have been indicted on identity theft charges stemming from last months' immigration raids at six swift plants. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the suspects got people's social security numbers and other information to get their jobs. On top of the 30 identity theft charges filed in Iowa more than 100 were charged in Texas." There were other local broadcasts in both Texas and Iowa.

Border Fence Cost Estimates Create Split In Congress. The Washington Times (1/17, Hurt, 88K) reports on Rep. Duncan Hunter's defense of plans to construct a fence along the US-Mexico border, and his designation of those who estimated that it "could cost about 25 times the roughly $2 billion he estimated. 'I call them the 'Mission Impossible' crowd,' the California Republican said, referring to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service and others who predict that the fence will cost nearly $50 billion." Hunter "might lump into that crowd Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, who told reporters yesterday that he thinks "the fence will be revisited." The Times adds that "President Bush might fall into that group as well. The administration, Mr. Hoyer noted yesterday, 'has not been enthusiastic' about implementing the Secure Fence Act of 2006."

IG Report Finds Mistreatment Of Illegal Immigrants In US Detention. The Washington Post (1/17, A8, Hsu, 690K) reports a DHS IG report released yesterday has found that illegal immigrants were mistreated "at five prisons and jails nationwide, violating federal standards meant to ensure safe and humane custody." The report said ICE "officials and contractors denied timely medical treatment to some of the immigrants, failed to disclose and justify disciplinary actions against them, and improperly limited access to relatives, lawyers and immigration authorities." The Post adds, "The report comes amid a sharp increase in illegal immigrants in US detention as Congress and the Bush administration debate an overhaul of immigration laws and promise tougher enforcement of existing laws." Responding to the report, DHS Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers concurred at least partly with nine of 13 findings and promised changes," but said "they 'do not indicate any systemic failure' at nearly 400 facilities where ICE is authorized to house as many as 27,500 people a night, because they were based on individual allegations at a small sample of sites."

In a brief article, the New York Times (1/17, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "Homeland security officials said the study was too small to be representative of the country's detention centers."

Georgia Town Provides Insight Into Question Of Effect Of Illegal Labor Force. In a 2,791 word article, the Wall Street Journal (1/17, A1, Pérez, Dade, 2.04M) reports from Stillmore, Georgia, where "a wave of raids by federal immigration agents on Labor Day weekend" resulted in a local chicken-processing company called Crider Inc. losing "75% of its mostly Hispanic 900-member work force. The crackdown threatened to cripple the economic anchor of this fading rural town. But for local African-Americans, the dramatic appearance of federal agents presented an unexpected opportunity. Crider suddenly raised pay at the plant. … For the first time since significant numbers of Latinos began arriving in Stillmore in the late 1990s, the plant's processing lines were made up predominantly of African-Americans." Though the situation "initially appeared" to back the notion that "illegal immigrants take jobs from low-skilled American workers," the issue "has become more complex" over time. "The plant has struggled with high turnover among black workers, lower productivity and pay disputes between the new employees and labor contractors. The allure of compliant Latino workers willing to accept grueling conditions despite rock-bottom pay has proved a difficult habit for Crider to shake, particularly because the local, native-born workers who replaced them are more likely to complain about working conditions and aggressively assert what they believe to be legal pay and workplace rights."

Judge Petitions 2nd Circuit Over Ancillary KPMG Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, B13, Lattman) reports, "New York federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan, a former litigator, is getting to play lawyer again. Judge Kaplan recently filed a brief with the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals -- on behalf of himself." The Journal continues, "The filing came as part of a high-profile case the judge is overseeing, the indictment of 16 former partners of accounting firm KPMG LLP and two others on criminal tax-fraud charges. Judge Kaplan got the bar buzzing when he ruled in June that prosecutors violated the constitutional rights of the KPMG defendants by pressuring the firm not to pay their legal fees." The Journal adds, "The ground-breaking decision was followed by another unusual one: Judge Kaplan created a separate civil proceeding, under his watch, about the legal-fee dispute between the firm and the defendants. … When KPMG appealed, the appeals court wanted to know what Judge Kaplan was thinking when he ordered a side proceeding, and did he have the authority to do it? Ralph Winter, one of the appeals judges, called the move 'extremely dubious.' … Injecting yet another twist in the case, the appeals court invited the judge to defend himself. … In his 47-page response, Judge Kaplan acknowledged his move was unusual but said the complex issues surrounding this case are unlikely to recur again, if ever. "

IRS Opens Doors For Most Electronic Filings. In his "Tax Report" column for the Wall Street Journal (1/17, D1), Tom Herman writes, "Opening day for e-filing your federal income-tax return for 2006 generally was this past Friday, the IRS said. But you can't e-file until Feb. 3 if you're claiming key tax provisions enacted last month. Both e-filed returns and paper returns claiming these provisions -- deductions for state and local sales taxes, higher education tuition and fees, and educator expenses for classroom supplies -- won't be processed if submitted before Feb. 3." Herman continues, "Tax returns filed on paper will be accepted but won't be processed until after IRS systems are updated Feb. 3, the IRS said. … IRS officials strongly urge taxpayers to file electronically. E-filing is "the fastest, safest and most accurate way" to file, said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson. He said people will get their refunds more quickly that way than filing the old-fashioned paper way. E-filing also "greatly reduces the chances for making an error." … Last year the IRS received more than 73 million returns electronically, up 7% from the prior year. A spokesman said almost 54% of all returns were filed electronically."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Withdraws Appeals Court Nominee. The AP (1/17) reports President Bush "withdrew a controversial federal appeals court nominee, a nod to the Senate's new Democratic leadership." Bush had "just resubmitted Norman Randy Smith of Idaho to the Senate last week for a seat on the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. At the time, Bush also withdrew four nominees." Last February, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., "blocked a vote on Smith, saying the nomination would give Idaho undue weight on the West's top appellate court."

Democrats Launch Campaign To Prebut Bush Speech. Roll Call (1/17, Billings) reports Democratic leaders "are launching a broad counteroffensive on issues ranging from Iraq to energy policy in advance of President Bush's State of the Union address next week, hoping to separate the president from the typical popularity boost that comes with the nationally televised speech." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) "are still putting in place the specifics of their plan, but senior Democratic sources say the new leaders are orchestrating a 'strong push-back' beginning today on some of Bush's major proposals." The Democrats will "hold numerous events on both sides of the Capitol to try to ensure they go into Tuesday night's speech with an upper hand on the issues they believe Bush is set to address, including the Iraq War, balancing the budget, global warming and energy independence. Democrats already are fanning out to the rank-and-file Members, urging them to set expectations high, so that the onus is on Bush to measure up."

After First 100 Hours, Democrats Have Work Cut Out. In her Washington Post column (1/17, A19), Ruth Marcus says, "The first 100 hours agenda gave Democrats the framework to avoid that befuddlement at the start of the 110th Congress. But when the clock runs out, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) may start to wonder whether Newt Gingrich had a point in pacing his Contract With America agenda over days, not hours." Marcus notes the "first 100 hours agenda will quickly collide with Senate and White House reality," and having "picked the low-hanging legislative fruit, Democrats have far more back-breaking work ahead" on issues such as climate change, healthcare, and farm subsidies. In addition, the "fissures, internal and external, in the Democratic Party, will start to emerge, like cracks in the Arctic ice shelf."

House Expected To Approve Repeal Of Oil Industry Tax Breaks. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Simon, 850K) reports, "[W]ith Democrats in charge, perhaps no industry will find the new Congress less hospitable than the oil industry. That will be underscored Thursday when the House is expected to approve a bill that would repeal billions of dollars in oil industry tax breaks passed by the GOP-controlled Congress." The Times adds, "The measure would raise about $14 billion over 10 years by repealing the tax breaks and by closing a loophole that allowed royalty-free offshore oil leases. The money would be used to promote energy conservation and develop alternative fuels." The "measure is expected to easily pass the House but is likely to face a tougher time in the Senate. And it could run into trouble at the White House." President Bush "opposed the tax breaks for the oil and gas industry that were included in the 2005 energy bill. But the administration has been cool to the idea of forcing oil companies to renegotiate drilling leases."

Six Utilities Endorse Bill To Limit Carbon Dioxide Emissions. The Hill (1/17, Snyder) reports, "Six electric companies plan to support a Senate bill to cut greenhouse-gas emissions to curb global warming. The bill, cosponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Tom Carper (D-Del.), would establish a national 'cap and trade' program to limit power-plant carbon-dioxide emissions by 25 percent by 2020 from current projections." The Hill adds, "The companies are members of the Clean Energy Group, which has advocated for a carbon cap in the past." The "companies supporting the bill are Calpine, Entergy, Exelon, Florida Power & Light, PG&E Corp. and Public Service Enterprise Group."

WPost Gives Democrats' Energy Policy Mixed Rating. The Washington Post (1/17, A18, 690K) says in an editorial, "The House Democrats plan to pass an energy bill Thursday that combines the good, the bad and a large dose of missed opportunity. Thankfully, it faces an uncertain future in the Senate. Energy policy deserves more serious treatment." The "good part of the bill revokes tax breaks for oil and gas production in the United States that should never have been granted." The "bad part of the bill would effectively revoke lease contracts granted in 1998 and 1999 for offshore drilling." The House bill "would break this deadlock by imposing heavy penalties on firms that do not renegotiate on terms imposed by the government. This heavy-handed attack on the stability of contracts would be welcomed in Russia, Bolivia and other countries that have been criticized for tearing up revenue-sharing agreements with private energy companies." The main "problem with the House bill is that hitting up oil companies is a poor substitute for a real energy policy. The nation needs to accelerate the development of less-carbon-intensive fuels by capping or taxing carbon consumption."

Judges Seek More Experienced Clerks. The Legal Times (1/17, Palmer) reports, "Julia Kiraly doesn't fit the profile of a judicial clerk, the Ivy Leaguer who jumps directly from law school to a judge's chambers. After hopscotching from Venable to Hogan & Hartson and back to Venable in her first four years of practice as a litigator in Washington, D.C., Kiraly did the unthinkable for many young lawyers looking to scale the law firm ladder: She passed up a growing six-figure salary to clerk for Chief Judge Thomas Hogan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia." The Times continues, "However unconventional, Kiraly, now entering her second year clerking for Hogan, is emblematic of a growing number of lawyers leaving private practice to clerk on one of the most competitive circuit courts. … Though the graying of Supreme Court clerks has been well documented (think Justice Samuel Alito Jr.'s first-term pick of Adam Ciongoli, former senior vice president and general counsel of Time Warner Europe, as his clerk), the increasingly older talent pool applying for federal circuit court clerkships has risen over the past couple of years as lawyers seek to boost their résumés. The trend also reflects the growing number of federal judges who have done an about-face by requiring, or strongly preferring, law clerks who draft opinions and research questions of the law to obtain some real-world experience beyond school." The Times adds, "Applying for a clerkship after entering the marketplace hasn't always been in vogue. For decades, judges relied on the nation's top law schools to fill clerk positions. Even five years ago it was almost unheard of at most Washington firms to clerk after becoming an associate. But in-house recruiters and hiring partners say they have seen a distinct change in the number of associates exiting for clerkships. … Instead of viewing associates departing for clerkships as a negative trend, law firms have framed it as a recruiting tool to lure clerks back to firms with incentive packages."

House Expected To Approve Student Loan Interest Rate Reduction. The Washington Times (1/17, Fagan, 88K) reports, "Democrats, trying to deliver on expensive campaign promises, are offering a slimmer version of legislation to cut interest rates on student loans." The College Student Relief Act of 2007 "would cut interest rates gradually on need-based federal loans for college undergraduates from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent by 2011." The reduction could "save the average student borrower about $4,400 over the life of a loan." The bill is estimated to cost "$5.85 billion over five years." The Bush administration opposes the bill, arguing that it "won't help current students or their families and that encouraging more student debt can fuel higher tuition costs."

The AP (1/17, Zuckerbrod) reports the bill "would help an estimated 5.5 million students." And "to avoid increasing the deficit, the bill's cost would be offset by reducing the yield on college loans the government guarantees to lenders and cutting the guaranteed return banks get when students default. Banks also would have to pay more in fees." The House "was expected to approve the bill, though its future is uncertain beyond that."

McClatchy Newspapers (1/16, Barrett) reports the bill "falls short of a proposal" Democrats "pitched nearly a year ago when the Republicans controlled Congress." It "doesn't cover all student loans…and it will take five years to phase in. And though education advocates praise the effort as a nice start, they say it won't do much to boost college access at a time of soaring tuition increases."

Bloomberg (1/16, Basken) reports the Bush administration "preferred that Congress concentrate on funding direct-aid programs." The plan "also has drawn criticism from banks, which oppose provisions that would make them pay the estimated $6 billion cost of the lower rates, and congressional Republicans, who want more pressure on colleges to reduce costs."

WSJournal Says Bill Mostly Benefits Professors And Administrators. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, 2.04M) in an editorial criticizes the bill arguing that it "isn't really about making college more affordable for low-income families. It's about expanding federal subsidies for college grads." In addition, "colleges will raise tuition to capture the additional funds." So "the biggest winners from this latest subsidy will be the relatively well off professors and administrators who run higher education."

Boehner Says GOP Needs New Ideas. Roll Call (1/17, Davis) reports that for "all the hurdles House Republican leaders face in the minority, the biggest one simply may be getting their rank-and-file Members to accept the realities of their new deflated status." Minority Leader John Boehner said, "I had a Member one night last week moaning and groaning about the schedule. And I just had to look at him and say, 'Why don't you go talk to Mr. Hoyer?' It is what it is." Roll Call adds Boehner "makes no excuses for the electoral losses of the party he now leads." Boehner said, "We've got to work harder, we've got to work smarter, and probably the biggest thing we need to do is energize our Members to create new ideas for solving the problems the American people sent us here to solve." While Democrats "continue to tick off a list of early legislative accomplishments, most with considerable Republican support, Boehner is quick to dismiss speculation that there are rifts in the GOP ranks."

Boehner Criticized For Booting Flake From Judiciary Panel. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, 850K), in an editorial, criticizes Minority Leader John Boehner's "decision to remove Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona from his seat on the House Judiciary Committee. Flake has made a name for himself with his long-standing effort to eliminate excessive congressional 'earmarks' — not through any complex new ethics legislation but by publicly fighting individual earmarks on the House floor. It's not certain that this was the reason he lost his Judiciary Committee job. Flake believes that he's being punished for supporting comprehensive immigration reform. Other D.C. observers say Boehner (R-Ohio) is making good on his promise last year to punish 'bad behavior' by Republicans who vote against the party's leadership. What is clear is that Flake, the kind of fiscal conservative who has the potential to reverse the GOP's woes, is being held back not for his behavior but for his beliefs."

McConnell, Kyl Plan New Communications Strategy. The Hill (1/17, Bolton) reports senior aides "to Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Senate Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) met with Senate Republican press secretaries yesterday to address last year's communications shortcomings under former Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.)." McConnell and Kyl "have decided that more members of their conference must actively voice the GOP's vision both in the national media and to constituents. Senate Republicans have felt increasing pressure to reform their communications strategy following the success of Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) war room, which is part of a 20-person Democratic communications team that specializes in rapid response." Kyl said, "This week alone we're already seeing progress in the effort to promote small business growth, restrain wasteful spending, and prevent government from price-fixing prescription drugs."

Senate To Vote On Banning Lobbying By Spouses. The Washington Post (1/17, A1, Solomon, 690K) reports in a front page story that "at least half a dozen congressional spouses have jobs as registered lobbyists and several more are connected with lobbying firms, but reining in the practice to prevent potential conflicts or the appearance of them has not been a priority among congressional leaders. Even modest proposals such as banning wives and husbands from lobbying their spouses or using their spouses' floor privileges for lobbying have gone nowhere." Democrats made "ethics reform a major issue in last fall's congressional elections, but the ethics package the House approved earlier this month didn't address the issue and neither did the one proposed by Senate Democrats. Last week, however, Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) proposed banning spouses of senators from lobbying any part of the chamber. The lone exception is for spouses who were lobbying at least one year before their husband or wife was elected." The Senate is "scheduled to vote on the legislation as soon as today. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) called Vitter and said he would support the proposal with one caveat: It should exempt spouses who are already lobbyists."

Senate Passes Bill To Disclose Earmarks. The AP (1/17, Abrams) reports the Senate "voted Tuesday to shine more light on thousands of expensive pet projects buried in legislation every year after the new Democratic majority bowed to a successful push by Republicans to make new disclosure rules even tougher than originally planned." The vote "was 98-0 to require senators to reveal the water projects, hiking trails, defense contracts or tax breaks for specific industries they insert in legislation. That unanimity came five days after Democrats, holding a slim majority, were thwarted by a GOP-led rebellion in advancing their own version of 'earmark' reform."

The Washington Times (1/17, Miller, 88K) reports the Senate "voted unanimously yesterday to adopt a Republican-backed measure to limit pork-barrel spending despite initial opposition by Democratic leaders." Majority Leader Reid "changed course and embraced the bill last week after delaying a final vote when the proposal unexpectedly survived a procedural vote to kill it." The amendment "would mandate public disclosure of all earmarks for federal projects and require members of Congress seeking earmarks to provide written information -- which also must be made available on an Internet database -- 48 hours before the legislation is considered."

Record 16 Women Serving In Senate. ABC World News (1/16, story 5, 1:05, Snow, 8.78M) reported Sen. Hillary Clinton "was part of an extraordinary gathering today. There are a record 16 women in the Senate this year. 15 of them sat down with ABC's Diane Sawyer this afternoon in Washington." ABC (Sawyer) added, "This group, this gathering." Sen. Diane Feinstein: "You know, when we were nine, and we would gather at the well of the Senate. I think people remember. The men would come over and say, what are you up to now? And, you know, there was a curiosity that we must be plotting something. I don't think that exists anymore."

Unlikely Coalition Forms To Urge Healthcare Reform. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A10, Solomon, Maher, 2.04M) reports an "unlikely coalition of business, labor and consumer interests plans to prod lawmakers to tackle health-care overhaul, but agreement among the group so far extends only to a consensus that the lack of affordable health care is a critical problem." Rather than "coalesce around a single idea for how to overhaul health care, leaders of the Business Roundtable, AARP and the Service Employees International Union said yesterday that they plan to force lawmakers to address the issue of health-care overhaul through a mix of advertising, lobbying and public outreach." The "likelihood of these three groups -- which have vastly different constituencies and political leanings -- agreeing on a single approach is unlikely. But the fact that they're looking to coordinate their efforts shows how dominant the issue of overhauling health care is becoming." Later this week, "another group of 16 disparate organizations, including health insurers, physician associations, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and health advocacy groups, plans to introduce its own bipartisan approach to address the plight of uninsured Americans."

In his Washington Post column (1/17, D1), Steven Pearlstein says, "There, at the National Press Club, stood the president of the Business Roundtable, representing the country's largest corporations; the president of the Service Employees International Union, the country's most vibrant union and one of its fastest-growing; and the president of AARP, the formidable seniors lobby. They put aside their usual differences to deliver a clear, simple message to President Bush and congressional leaders of both parties: We stand ready to give you the political cover you need for a centrist, bipartisan fix for a broken health-care system. Or, if you refuse, we stand ready to embarrass you and run you out of office." The "outlines of a genuinely comprehensive reform plan are coming into focus." It "starts with universal coverage, accomplished either through a mandate on everyone to purchase basic health insurance or a mandate on all employers to offer it. It includes subsidies for families with incomes up to 300 percent of the poverty level to help defray the cost of that insurance and the deductibles and co-payments that go with it."

Bill Would Authorize $3.2 Billion Annually For Amtrak. The Washington Post (1/17, A4, Weiss, 690K) reports Sens. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) and Trent Lott (R-Miss.) "introduced legislation yesterday that would authorize $3.2 billion a year for Amtrak over six years in exchange for greater efficiency and increased investments by states." Supporters said the plan "would place Amtrak on a firm financial footing after years of instability." A similar bill "was passed by the Senate in November, 93 to 6, but was not taken up by the House of Representatives. Lautenberg said prospects were much improved with Democrats now in control of both houses of Congress."

Federal Workers Support More Options For Thrift Savings Plan. The Washington Post's (1/17, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "TIPS. Bonds. Roth 401(k) accounts. These are among the investment options that government employees would support adding to the Thrift Savings Plan, according to a survey released yesterday." The Post adds, "The survey, released at a meeting of the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, found that thrift plan participants are generally more satisfied with the plan than private-sector employees are with their 401(k) plans," but the "thrift board has been considering new rules and investment options for the TSP for much of the past year, in part because of recent changes to pension law and because some members of Congress and the National Association of Real Estate Investment Trusts have pushed for adding a real estate fund as a way of helping government employees diversify their portfolios." The Post adds, "Sixty percent said providing a Roth 401(k) account would make the TSP a better program, and 46 percent said offering a wide selection of investment options would improve the plan."

Bush Honors Baseball's Cardinals At White House. The AP (1/17, Feller) reports President Bush "said Tuesday that even in a losing streak, it is possible to win by sticking with your goal and showing character no matter what the doubters say about you. He was talking, of course, about baseball." Bush "honored the World Series champion St. Louis Cardinals by commending them for winning the hard way. To be sure, the Cardinals were not a powerhouse on their way to the White House." Bush "lauded the team's entire operation — its management, coaches, players and fans. He had plenty of nice words for his old business partner, Cardinals Chairman Bill DeWitt Jr., who worked with Bush when the president was managing partner of the Texas Rangers."

WSJournal Says Deficit Picture Brightening. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "The myth persists in some media circles that the federal budget deficit is 'surging' or ballooning or something terrible -- all of which is served up as ammunition for those in Congress who want a tax increase. At the risk of being drummed out of the guild, we thought you'd rather have the real story." The deficit "has in fact declined by some $165 billion over the past two fiscal years, and according to the most recent data has continued to fall in the first quarter of fiscal 2007." All in all, "despite huge outlays for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the nation's fiscal picture is brightening. We hate to ruin the press corps's day with such cheerful news, but there it is."

Census Bureau Urged To Count Inmates At Home Addresses. The New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The Census Bureau typically uses the decennial census to test data-collection methods that become routine later on. The 2010 census should include a test run at counting the nation's 1.4 million prison inmates at their permanent addresses instead of in prisons. That would help bring an end to a corrosive but little known practice that distorts the political process in virtually every corner of the country." State lawmakers treat inmates "as residents of the prisons when drawing legislative maps, to inflate the head count in lightly populated rural areas where prisons are typically built. This creates legislative districts where none would ordinarily be, shifting political influence from the heavily populated urban districts where inmates live. Once inflated, these towns and counties siphon an outsized portion of state and federal aid."

OTHER NEWS:

Plunge In Oil Prices Continues. ABC World News (1/16, story 6, :20, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "Oil prices continued to plunge today, dropping to an almost two-year low with no sign that a cut in production is coming anytime soon. Oil closed down almost $2 a barrel [to $51.21 per barrel]. That's the lowest since May 2005. There's also been a slide at the pump, with the average price of a gallon of gas down 8 cents last week [to $2.23 per gallon]." The CBS Evening News (1/16, story 5, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "[T]he news about oil and gas prices lately just keeps getting better and better." CBS (Mason) reported, "Gas is falling because crude is plummeting. The price of oil down $10 since the end of last year, has plunged $25 a barrel since its high last July, a 33 percent drop." CBS added, "The era of cheap gas isn't coming back. Mother Nature is just giving us a break. Gas prices are expected to head back up in the spring."

Saudi Energy Minister Rejects Call For Further OPEC Production Cut. The Financial Times (1/17, Hoyos) reports Saudi Energy Minister Ali Naimi said OPEC "did not need to further reduce its production. The oil price fell sharply following the remarks." The news "dimmed the prospect of an imminent emergency meeting of the group and prompted international oil prices to fall $1 to $52 a barrel, a 19-month low. Mr Naimi said: 'Do not panic. Actually there is no reason for a meeting.' He added: 'The market is in a healthy condition and moving in the right direction.'" The Times adds, "Edmund Daukoru, Nigeria's energy minister, was less sanguine about the market, believing it to be oversupplied. But he said: 'I think we have to take a wait-and-see [approach]. After we implement 500,000 barrels a day [cut], we have to see how the market responds.'" The Saudi and Nigerian "positions contradict the view expressed by other Opec members, including Iran and Venezuela, who have recently publicly backed further action."

Dow Soars To New Record Closing. USA Today (1/17, 4B, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Investors returned from the long weekend Tuesday in the mood to buy blue-chip stocks and pushed the Dow Jones industrial average to another high. Cheered by another fall in the price of crude oil and encouraging corporate earnings reports, the Dow added 26.51 points to 12,582.59, its third-consecutive record close. The Dow is up 1.0% this year." The Standard & Poor's 500 "gained 1.17 points to 1431.90, thanks largely to stocks in the fertilizer, railroads and retail real estate investment trust industries. The S&P 500 is up 1.0% this year." The Nasdaq "fell 5.04 points to 2497.78. The index is still up 3.4% this year, though." The Wall Street Journal (1/17, C1, McKay, 2.04M), NBC Nightly News (1/16, story 8, :10, Williams, 9.87M) and ABC World News (1/16, story 7, :10, Snow, 8.78M) also noted the market numbers.

Forecasts Suggest Housing Market Still Struggling. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Wei, Hagerty, 2.04M) reports, "Mortgage lender IndyMac Bancorp Inc. slashed its forecast for fourth-quarter earnings and home builder Centex Corp. projected a loss from continuing operations for its latest quarter as the US housing industry struggles with slow sales and rising loan defaults." The Journal adds, "Though some economists say the worst of the housing slump is over, the latest developments show that bad news from lenders and builders can still jolt the market. Steeper discounts from builders desperate to unload excess homes could add further downward pressure on prices, as could rising foreclosures, which dump more properties on the market."

Obama Enters Presidential Fray To Glowing Reviews. Sen. Barack Obama announced yesterday the formation on a exploratory committee with an eye on a 2008 White House run. Obama's move is being treated as a major news story, with all three networks running extensive reports on it, and major newspapers devoting front-page headlines to Obama and what his entry into the race could mean. In general, the coverage is markedly laudatory of the Illinois senator, with pieces noting his quick rise and the diversity of the emerging Democratic field. The Washington Post (1/17, A1, Balz, 690K), for example, runs a front-page piece titled "Race And Gender Make Democrats' Field Historic," in which it says "Democrats moved a step closer yesterday to what shapes up as one of the most historic and compelling contests ever for their party's presidential nomination." The news media, adds the Post, "will find the story line" of a contest between Obama and Sen. Hillary Clinton "irresistible, and Democrats around the country are eagerly anticipating the competition." In a similar story, USA Today (1/17, 4A, Lawrence, 2.27M) also notes the "historic Democratic nomination race dominated by a black man and a first lady-turned-senator."

The Chicago Tribune (1/17, Dorning, Parsons, 617K) reports Obama would be "the most formidable African-American candidate ever, offering a call to common purpose as a remedy to bitter partisan divisions and marking a potential turning point in the nation's race relations." The CBS Evening News (1/16, story 4, 3:15, Borger, 7.66M) described Obama as "the candidate who says it's time for a younger generation to change America's future," and notes that "just two years ago, Obama was a novice mounting the national stage, a young Illinois state Senator with a great story. … His message is twofold, that American politics is too divisive, and the baby boomers, who have been fighting the same old fights for years, need to move over." NBC Nightly News (1/16, story 3, 1:40, Reid, 9.87M) showed the senator saying, "I certainly didn't expect to find myself in this position a year ago. But as I've spoken with many of you in my travels across the states these past months, I've been struck by how hungry we all are for a different kind of politics." The AP (1/17, Pickler) praises him this morning, calling him a man of "uncommon political talents," and McClatchy (1/17, Thomma) reports his decision "propels him into the top tier for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination and puts him in position to test how much his party and his country hunger for change."

Even what commentators view as his greatest weakness – his lack of experience – is seen as a possible advantage this time around. ABC World News (1/16, story 3, 2:55, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Obama's message, his charisma, and his personal story, he's the son of an African father and white mother from Kansas, have found an audience. In recent trips to Iowa and New Hampshire, Obama drew raves for presenting fairly traditional liberal views at fresh and inspiring." Obama "has few legislative accomplishments. But he's aggressively trying to turn his inexperience into an asset, by arguing those with the most experience created an ugly partisan atmosphere -- and led the nation into the war in Iraq."

The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A12, Calmes, 2.04M) reports Obama "now will test just how eager voters are, in the wake of his Democratic Party's recent takeover of Congress, to further shake up Washington. … For many in his party, and some independents, the freshman senator has come to personify a hopeful prospect of change from the polarizing politics of recent years." Democratic strategist Stephanie Cutter, "a top adviser to Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign and now neutral in Democrats' 2008 contest, said Mr. Obama is 'perfectly positioned to run against Washington,' and that theme also serves 'to defuse the experience argument' against him." Likewise, the Los Angeles Times (1/17, Hook, Finnegan, 850K) says Obama "is gambling that voters will see his lack of national governing experience as an asset, not a liability," and adds "the electorate is seething with discontent with the Washington establishment."

The Washington Post (1/17, A1, Murray, Cillizza, 690K), meanwhile, reports, that "despite all the hype about his potential candidacy, some of Obama's closest associates worry that the senator remains untested. After winning a tough Senate primary in 2004, he sailed through the general election, aided by a Republican nominee with extensive personal travails. 'There will be bumps; there always are,' said one senior Obama adviser, speaking on the condition of anonymity. 'He's going to have to manage expectations and show he has the strength and endurance for the long haul.'" However, says the AP (1/17, Pickler), "for all those historians and political naysayers…Obama's allies like to point out that Abraham Lincoln served just two years in the House before becoming president. It's a comparison certain to be repeated as Obama, with slightly more than two years in the Senate, continues to align himself with the Civil War president." The AP adds, "The senator's expected campaign kickoff is scheduled for Feb. 10 in Lincoln's hometown of Springfield, Ill. -- where both men served in the state legislature."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/17, Feldmann, 59K) says that with his exploratory committee, what Obama is "really testing, political analysts say, is the strength of his fundraising ability. To make a serious play for a major-party nomination, a candidate needs to raise tens of millions of dollars in the next few months – a task that…Clinton should accomplish easily." But "the Illinois Democrat may begin to see the downside of being a media darling. In his latest book, 'The Audacity of Hope,' he describes President Bush warning him just after he joined the Senate about life in the spotlight – especially for a senator who practically waltzed into his seat (after his competition imploded). The media are notorious for building people up, only to tear them down."

Yet USA Today (1/17, Keen, 2.27M) notes Obama "wouldn't be the youngest presidential nominee or chief executive. … Nor would Obama be the least experienced nominee or president. Wendell Wilkie had never been elected to any office before he became the Republican presidential nominee in 1940. Woodrow Wilson had been New Jersey's governor for two years when he was elected in 1912. George W. Bush served six years as Texas governor before being elected president." However, "some Democrats say they need a more seasoned nominee who's prepared to tackle foreign policy issues such as the war in Iraq and dangerous relationships with Iran and North Korea. Obama's inexperience is 'the big question mark' about his candidacy, says Rep. Beth Arsenault, a Democrat who was just elected to the New Hampshire Legislature." USA Today also reports, "None of the Democratic activists interviewed about Obama's chances suggested that his ethnicity matters, and the fact that he is black has not been a dominant factor in his campaigns."

George Stephanopoulos, on ABC World News (1/16, story 4, 1:20, Snow, 8.78M) noted the last ABC News poll showing that Sen. Hillary Clinton "was pretty far ahead of Senator Obama" nationally, 39% to his 17%." Said Stephanopoulos, "Not to worry if you're…Obama yet. Here's why. … Democratic primary voters like" Clinton "a little more than they like Obama, 56% (have favorable opinion of Clinton) compared to 44% (who have a favorable opinion of Obama). But she's a known quantity. Look at that 'no opinion,' only 4%

(have no opinion of Clinton). 33% of voters don't know who Barack Obama is yet. As they learn more, he's going to close that gap. Here are his three, big advantages versus Hillary Clinton. Number one, he is the face of change. Number two, the war, as Jake said, the only candidate who is against the war from the start. Number three, he's going to cut into her support among African-American voters." Obama's entry into the race, added Stephanopoulos, "starves" less known candidates "of oxygen. It's going to be more difficult if you're a senator like Joe Biden or Chris Dodd or John Kerry to get media attention. Or a governor like Tom Vilsack or Bill Richardson. Going to be very, very difficult for them to raise money." Similarly, the Boston Herald (1/17, Ratliff, 184K) says Obama's move puts "more heat on…Kerry to decide whether he'll stay on the sidelines or step onto the stage."

The Baltimore Sun (1/17, West, 257K) reports Democrats "active in other campaigns, or watching from the sidelines, said Obama's candidacy poses a significant threat to the other leading candidates." Clinton, "widely regarded as the early front-runner, is counting on support from African-Americans, who strongly backed her husband, Bill, in his two presidential runs and who historically cast about one of every four votes in Democratic primaries. 'Now, all of a sudden, she has a competitor,' said Democratic pollster Paul Maslin, an adviser to Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, who abandoned the 2008 race last month shortly after being out shone in New Hampshire by Obama."

The New Hampshire Union-Leader (1/17) says that "during his much-publicized 'Obama-mania' visit on Dec. 10, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama looked, acted and sounded like a Presidential candidate when he spoke to a 1,500 people at a state Democratic Party rally in downtown Manchester. So it was no surprise to New Hampshire yesterday that Obama announced the formation of an exploratory committee to raise money in preparation for a Presidential run." Jim Demers, a lobbyist and former state representative "who said he expects to be an unpaid volunteer for Obama in the First-in-the-Nation Primary state," said yesterday, "I'm in the process of helping them find some staff. I have more than 35 resumes, and they hope to have a campaign manager very soon." Demers "said Obama called him yesterday morning, and 'he was extremely pumped. The call came after the announcement at 10 a.m. and I could feel the energy and excitement.'" The Hill (1/17, Schor) reports Kathy Sullivan, chairwoman of New Hampshire's Democratic Party, said yesterday, ""Obama could do quite well in New Hampshire. … [He] has a message of hope and unity, which I think is a good message. People are very tired of the divisiveness that's been a hallmark of the Bush administration." Sullivan "has spoken with Obama about his nascent bid in recent days, though she declined to give details"

In a piece titled "Obama Starts '08 Bid, Reshaping Democratic Field," the New York Times (1/17, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports that "in Washington, Mr. Obama's announcement caused a stir among Democratic political operatives, who rushed to make inquiries about joining his campaign. A list of telephone numbers for local offices in Iowa, New Hampshire and Chicago -- none of which have even opened yet -- were being circulated via e-mail."

The Washington Times (1/17, Bellantoni, 88K) notes Obama made his announcement in a Web video found at www.barackobama.com and "touted in an e-mail titled 'My plans for 2008.'"

Morris Says Obama's Recent "Pro-Nepotism" Vote May Come Back To Haunt Him. In a column in The Hill (1/17), political analyst Dick Morris writes that Obama "made his first misstep a few days ago when he joined only a handful of Democrats in opposing a Senate reform banning the increasingly widespread practice of legislators hiring their family members on their campaign or PAC payrolls." New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "who opposes wives cashing in on their husbands' positions, voted righteously in favor of the reform and will probably use the Illinois senator's vote against him in the presidential primaries. When a legislator hires his or her spouse on the campaign or PAC payroll, he is effectively converting contributions to his campaign committee into personal income that flows into the family's checking account, blurring the line between contribution and bribe." Morris adds, "Obama's inexplicable pro-nepotism vote may have been cast in sympathy with Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr. (D-Ill.), whose hiring of his wife, Sandi, to work on his campaign prompted an FEC ruling allowing the practice. … But whatever the reason for his vote, Obama has screwed up. The public will not take kindly to a senator who pledged to clean up the political process voting to allow wives to be hired with special-interest campaign funds."

McCain Says He'd Like To Mend Ties With Dobson. The AP (1/17, Davenport) reports that Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) "said Tuesday he hopes to patch things up with conservative Christian leader James Dobson, who recently said he wouldn't support the Republican's presidential bid under any circumstances. In a radio interview with KCBI, a Dallas Christian station, Dobson argued that McCain didn't support traditional marriage values and complained that the campaign finance legislation he co-authored hurt Christian broadcasters. 'Speaking as a private individual, I would not vote for John McCain under any circumstances,' Dobson said on KCBI." The AP notes, "During a campaign stop" yesterday "in Columbia, S.C., McCain said: 'I'm obviously disappointed and I'd like to continue and have a dialogue with Dr. Dobson and other members of the community.' … 'I'm happy to say that I've established a dialogue with a number of other leaders,' including the Rev. Jerry Falwell, 'Purpose Driven Life' author Rick Warren and Dr. Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention."

Tancredo Says He Will Form Presidential Exploratory Panel. The AP (1/17, Talhelm) reports that CO6 Rep. Tom Tancredo (R), "an outspoken opponent of illegal immigration, said Tuesday he will form an exploratory committee this week for a possible presidential campaign. After making a weekend trip to Iowa, home to the first nominating caucus in January 2008, Tancredo said voters there told him other presidential candidates don't share their views. 'They believe that there is a void in this race that none of the other candidates are willing or able to fill,' said Tancredo, who plans to remain in the House. Tancredo has said immigration would be a central issue if he does run. Campaign spokesman Tim Haley said on Tuesday that Tancredo would also push opposition to abortion and other conservative themes as well."

NBC Nightly News (1/16, story 4, :20, Williams, 9.87M) made brief mention of Tancredo's announcement that he would form a presidential exploratory panel, noting that the Congressman, "who admits he is a long shot, is running on one issue here for the most part, against illegal immigration."

The Washington Post (1/17, A6, 690K) reports that Tancredo, referring to Iowans he spoke with during his visit to the Hawkeye State this past weekend, said, "The one thing I heard over and over is that they don't believe the other contenders care about the same things that they do." No other presidential candidate, Tancredo "added, 'reflects the grass-roots, majority belief of Americans that our borders must be secured, that employers who hire illegals must be prosecuted, and that no one who has broken our immigration laws should ever be put on a 'pathway to citizenship.'"

CQ Politics (1/17, Horrigan) reports, "Though little known to most of the nation's voters, the five-term congressman from suburban Denver has a following among some conservative activists -- particularly those who favor his leadership role in efforts to crack down on illegal immigration and also limit the numbers of legal immigrants in the United States. The 61-year-old Tancredo's ostensible reason for visiting Iowa was to promote his book on his trademark issue, 'In Mortal Danger: The Battle for America's Border and Security.'"

The Washington Times (1/17, Dinan, 88K) reports that Tancredo "on Monday ruled out a run for the U.S. Senate seat that will open in 2008 with the retirement of Sen. Wayne Allard. … Bay Buchanan, a friend and confidante of Mr. Tancredo's who runs his political action committee, Team America, said that immigration is the issue that will help Mr. Tancredo stand out from the pack of candidates. She also said his record, consistently conservative up and down the line, will go over well with Iowa's pro-life, conservative caucusgoers. 'He is an across-the-board social conservative -- one that the Christian right can feel completely comfortable with, that he has been with them on those issues for his whole life,' she said."

The Denver Post (1/17, Mulkern, 256K) reports, "A Tancredo presidential bid would be a quixotic quest, analysts said." However, political observers also said that "Tancredo's position on immigration would grant him credibility with some conservative caucus voters in Iowa and elsewhere. 'I wouldn't underestimate the power of this immigration issue to become one of the litmus tests' for Republican candidates, said Chuck Todd, editor of the Hotline, a nonpartisan political blog attached to National Journal." The Post adds, "Tancredo's presence in Iowa would put pressure on" Arizona Sen. John McCain (R), "who would have a hard time appeasing the wing of the Republican Party that agrees with Tancredo on immigration, said Norman Ornstein, political analyst with American Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank. Tancredo also could boost" ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) "by allowing him to withhold criticism of McCain and let Tancredo voice it instead."

Gingrich, Gordon Call For More Investment In Defense Technology. In a Washington Times op-ed (1/17), Newt Gingrich and Rep. Bart Gordon, Chairman of the House Committee on Science and Technology, say, "Unfortunately, the nation has forgotten one of the most important ways our economic prosperity and national security are linked — investment in fundamental scientific research. Investments made in fundamental scientific research after World War II and during the Cold War have been essential to making our fighting men and women today the best equipped in the world." But our "commitment to that defense-oriented fundamental research — the kind of research that pays off not in a year or two but in the long run, sometimes decades in the future — has eroded. If we do not renew this commitment, it will harm our global economic competitiveness as well as the effectiveness and safety of our troops."

Fundraising Race Among Presidential Hopefuls Well Underway. USA Today (1/17, Schouten, 2.27M) reports, "The competition among presidential contenders for the Democratic Party's most influential donors and fundraisers grew more intense Tuesday with Sen. Barack Obama's decision to raise money to explore a 2008 race. The move by the Illinois senator comes as many of the party's top-tier fundraisers sit on the sidelines and size up the potential rivalry between Obama and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton." USA Notes, "Chicago investment banker Lou Susman, a major Democratic fundraiser, said just hours after Obama's announcement that he would work with the Illinois senator." On the GOP "side, financial backers of President Bush have started to migrate to" Arizona Sen. John McCain, whose PAC "raised more than twice the amount from Bush's 2004 donors than the PAC of a potential rival," ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R), according to The Arizona Republic." Meanwhile, ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) "recently raised $6.5 million in one day and has attracted several big Bush fundraisers, including Mel Sembler, former ambassador to Italy." Ex-DNC Chairman Steve Grossman said of key Democratic fundraisers eyeing the '08 presidential field: "People are playing their cards very close to their chests."

Frist Plans 2010 Gubernatorial Run In Tennessee. The Hill (1/17, Youngman) reports former Majority Leader Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) "is seriously considering a gubernatorial run in Tennessee in 2010, possibly setting up a White House bid further down the road." Sources "in Washington and Tennessee say Frist, who will turn 55 next month, is leaning heavily toward a run for the governor's office, where he could gain executive experience that might position him to try for the presidency in either 2012 or 2016." The Hill adds, "Waiting three to eight years before making a gubernatorial or presidential bid would provide Frist needed distance from his unenviable tenure as Senate majority leader, a period that culminated in the Democrats' takeover of Congress last November. Such a significant layoff would also allow Frist to distance himself from allegations of conflict of interest involving his ownership of stock in Hospital Corporation of America, a company founded by his brother and father, allegations that could have further derailed his White House hopes this year."

Speculation Grows About Elway Senate Run. The Hill (1/17, Blake) reports whether Hall-of-Fame quarterback John Elway "has the drive to score a big win for Colorado Republicans in 2008 is another matter, and it's the subject of growing speculation now that Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) is not running." Elway's office "at the Colorado Crush of the Arena Football League said yesterday that Elway 'has no intentions of running,' and observers say a 2008 Senate bid that could muddy his popular image is unlikely, though attractive to the party." But a "candidate with top name recognition and a golden image like Elway's would have a serious leg up." Former Rep. Scott McInnis (R-Colo.), "who said he will run if former Gov. Bill Owens doesn't, told the Associated Press last month that if Owens bows out, the major parties would also likely search for celebrity candidates such as Elway. He said he thought 'Elway could clear the field.'"

Samuelson Says Both Parties Failing To Make Hard Choices. In a Washington Post (1/17, A19, 690K) op-ed, Robert J. Samuelson writes that the House's vote to increase the minimum wage is "a metaphor for what ails our politics: It's mostly about gestures and giveaways; it's not about hard choices." Republicans and Democrats alike "are long on self-promotion and short on self-discipline. ... Let me engage in a fantasy. Let me assume that Democrats and Republicans actually intended to address two serious national problems: first, our huge dependence on insecure sources of foreign oil; and second, the persistent mismatch between public resources (taxes) and public obligations (spending)." On oil dependence, Samuelson proposes an energy tax, increased fuel-efficiency standards, and opening the ANWR to oil production. On the budget imbalance, Samuelson calls for a tax increase on dividends and capital gains, restraints on Congressional spending, and an increase in the eligibility age for Social Security and Medicare. Samuelson adds, "That something like this won't soon be proposed -- let alone passed -- speaks volumes about our politics."

Virginia Lawmaker Draws Fire For Criticism Of Slavery Apology. The Washington Post (1/17, B1, Gardner, 690K) reports, "A veteran Virginia lawmaker from suburban Richmond ignited a hot exchange in the House of Delegates on Tuesday after criticizing a proposal for the state to issue an apology for slavery and likening it to requiring Jews to apologize for 'killing Christ.'" Republican Del. Frank D. Hargrove Sr. "told lawmakers that his comments were intended only to make the point that 'not a soul in this legislature' had anything to do with slavery -- and that there is no point in dwelling on a chapter of U.S. history that all agree was repugnant." The Post adds, "Hargrove's remarks, first made in a newspaper interview on the holiday honoring civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., prompted a blistering censure from the 17-member Legislative Black Caucus. The Anti-Defamation League condemned Hargrove's comments about Jews." His statements "caused further consternation for Virginia Republicans, who are recovering from the defeat of U.S. Sen. George Allen last year and who are preparing for a tough election year in which all 140 General Assembly seats will come open."

TV Programs Portraying Several Conservative Women. In a USA Today op-ed (1/17, 13A), Melana Zyla Vickers, a columnist for TCSDaily.com, says, "Long neglected, often stereotyped, red-state America can see a glimpse (or two) of hope emerging on the small screen. And that's good news for all viewers. It's no exaggeration to say that conservative female characters have been rarer on prime-time TV than either space aliens or same-sex kissing." This season, "there's Harriet Hayes (Sarah Paulson), the socially conservative Christian comedienne on NBC's Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip, a drama about the making of a weekly comedy show. There's also Kitty Walker (Calista Flockhart), the Republican aide on ABC's Brothers & Sisters, a California family drama. Vague hints of the new diversity came in 2005-06, with Bree Van De Kamp (Marcia Cross) owning a gun on ABC's Desperate Housewives, the muscular if apolitical patriotism of Sidney Bristow (Jennifer Garner) on Alias, and patriotic, God-referencing dialogue from the soldiers' wives on CBS' The Unit."

Hill, North Korean Officials Meet In Germany. The AP (1/17, Lim) reports Assistant Secretary Christopher Hill and his North Korean counterpart Kim Kye Gwan will meet Wednesday in Germany for a second day of talks, South Korea's foreign minister said. Hill and Kim Kye Gwan met in Berlin "for several hours Tuesday," according to the State Department. South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-soon told reporters the two would meet again Wednesday. Song said the "meeting should produce the groundwork for reaching agreements on measures to implement the initial steps of" an accord reached in September 2005. Hill and Kim were trying "to set the groundwork for the next round of six-party talks, to ensure those talks will be productive," State Department spokesman Tom Casey told reporters in Washington Tuesday.

AFP (1/17) notes that Hill "was reportedly in the German capital to attend a forum and the meeting was not expected." The assistant secretary is scheduled to begin visits Friday to South Korea, China and Japan to continue consultations on the six-party talks, the State Department said last week.

South Korea Denies Report It Neglected Refugees From North. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (1/17, 2.04M), Kim Heung-soo, director of press relation at South Korea's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade, writes, "In response to the article 'Defections Tweak Seoul' (Jan. 9), Evan Ramstad made a number of incorrect assertions about the South Korean government's handling of Mr. Choi Wook-Il, a South Korean citizen who recently escaped 31 years of captivity in North Korea." The article "claims the South Korean consulate in Shenyang refused to assist Mr. Choi, until public pressure forced officials to provide refuge for the 67-year-old." However, Kim says the consulate began "working to secure Mr. Choi's protection…ever since it became aware of his defection from the North."

DIA Director Says Moscow, Beijing Eyeing Space Weapons. The Washington Times (1/17, Gertz, 88K) reports, "China and Russia are developing space weapons and are among several nations working on systems to threaten U.S. satellites with lasers or missiles, says the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency." Lt. Gen. Michael Maples last week, in Senate Intelligence Committee testimony, "for the first time raised Pentagon concerns about secret Chinese and Russian space weapons programs." Maples "did not discuss the reported testing of a Chinese anti-satellite laser against a U.S. satellite, which triggered high-level Bush administration worries about Beijing's growing space-weapons program. ... Russia developed anti-satellite weapons during the Cold War, and U.S. officials think the Russian military is continuing work on the weapons, which include both anti-satellite missiles and ground-based lasers."

Egypt Refuses To Shutdown "Offensive" TV Station. The Christian Science Monitor (1/17, Gauch, 59K) reports Egypt's Al Zawraa television station is broadcasting "blatant anti-Americanism…24/7… Even though Iraq and the US have asked Egypt to pull the plug, the station remains on the air." While Nilesat, which broadcasts Al Zawraa, "argues that it's airing the channel for purely commercial reasons, analysts point to the political benefits for Egypt. Some say the country's reluctance to shut down the channel shows that Egypt, predominantly Sunni, may be taking a stand against what it sees as the unjust aggressiveness of Iraq's Shiite-led government and the dangers of Iran's influence there." American officials have reportedly called the station "utterly offensive," saying that closing it down is "a priority." But one Egyptian government official "reiterated Nilesat's stand that the station remains on air purely for commercial reasons."

Daniel Pearl's Father Urges US To Scrutinize Content Of Al Jazeera English. Judea Pearl, father of slain Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, writes in the New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) that the "influential Qatari cleric Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi," the host of a weekly program on Al Jazeera called "Sharia and Life," uses his program "to preach his new morality" supporting suicide attacks against Israelis and American civilian in Iraq "to millions of Arabic-speaking viewers, including Hamas operatives, Al Qaeda recruits, schoolteachers and impressionable Muslim youths." However, Pearl writes, "None of this might seem to matter much to Americans except that for two months now Al Jazeera has been taking its mixture of news coverage and extremist propagandizing to our front door through an English-language station." Although he says he "wouldn't call for banning Al Jazeera English in the United States even if that were possible," Pearl says "it is important to extend a hand to the network because it can become a force for good; but it is as important for our news organizations to scrutinize its content and let its viewers know when anti-Western wishes are subverting objective truth."

Israeli General Resigns Following Criticism Of Lebanon War. The New York Times (1/17, Myre, 1.16M) reports the Israeli military's chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, "submitted his resignation after facing months of fierce criticism over the military's performance in last summer's war in Lebanon," officials said early Wednesday. In a separate development, an Israeli prosecutor on Tuesday ordered a criminal investigation "to determine whether Prime Minister Ehud Olmert exercised improper influence in the privatization of the country's second-largest bank in 2005." The two developments were "the latest blows to a political and military leadership that have been tarnished by its collective handling of the Lebanon war and a number of scandals." The Israeli public has "widely blamed" General Halutz, along with Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz, "for mismanaging" the war in Lebanon.

The Washington Post (1/17, A10, Wilson, 690K) says Halutz resigned "abruptly" after one of his predecessors "presented findings of an internal review that sharply criticized the military's leadership during the war with Hezbollah last summer." However, the Washington Times/AP (1/17, Teibel) notes that he has been "under pressure to step down since the end of the 34-day war."

UN's Ban Pledges To Work With US. AFP (1/17, Knox) reports President Bush and UN chief Ban Ki-moon "worked to push past any lingering US-UN ill will and vowed to work together on issues like Middle East peace and violence in Darfur." During "an hour-long meeting" Tuesday, the two also discussed "Iran, Iraq and climate change," according to UN sources. After the meeting, Ban told reporters he would push "vigorously" for UN reforms and urged the world community to give war-torn Iraq "all possible assistance." He also said the Middle East "is a source of grave concern. This deteriorating situation in Iraq and Israel needs (the) urgent attention of the international community."

On its front page, the Washington Times (1/17, A1, Curl, 88K) reports Ban also "pledged to complete much-needed reforms at the United Nations and urged all nations to make efforts to secure Iraq, saying the war-torn nation 'is the whole world's problem.'" After meeting with President Bush in the Oval Office yesterday, Ban said, "The United Nations should change with much more efficiency and effectiveness and mobility, and highest level of ethical standard."

The Washington Post (1/17, A13, Lynch, 690K) says Bush "welcomed Ban with a slap on the back and urged him to 'pick up the phone' and call whenever he wanted to discuss political affairs, according to U.N. sources."

Russia Placed On High Terror Alert. The AP (1/17, Gutterman) reports Russian authorities have ordered security forces "on high alert after receiving information from foreign officials pointing to the threat of a terrorist attack on public transportation," officials said Tuesday. Authorities are verifying information about the potential threat, they said. A federal anti-terrorism headquarters received information "from foreign partners...about the possibility a subversive terrorist act could be committed on ground transport and in the metro," according to a statement confirmed by a Federal Security Service official. It was "unclear what country the information about the potential threat came from," and the statement "did not say whether the threat was limited to any particular location in Russia."

The New York Times (1/17, Chivers, 1.16M) adds, "Russian intelligence officials placed the country on an unusual high alert on Tuesday night, appealing to citizens for vigilance and saying that the government had been informed by 'foreign partners' of a possible terrorist act."

Castro Seen Preparing For Transition Of Power. The AP (1/17, Shrader) reports Cuban President Fidel Castro "has been meeting with a trickle of international guests in recent months," a US government official said Tuesday. The official "declined to say with whom Castro was meeting," but the meetings, "generally with visitors from Latin America, suggest he may be setting the stage for a transition of power that he hopes will protect the government he has built over four decades." Meanwhile, last week National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said that Castro and his brother Raul "are trying to create a 'soft landing' during the transfer of control," but stressed that "from the point of the United States policy, we don't want to see that happen. We want to see the prospects for freedom in that country enhanced as a result of the transition" from Fidel Castro.

However, the Washington Times (1/17, Hirsch, 88K) reports Castro's "exit from Cuba's political scene is unlikely to spur major changes in the situation there, two House members who recently visited the country told reporters yesterday." Reps. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat, and Jo Ann Emerson, Missouri Republican, were part of a 10-member congressional delegation that visited Havana last month. McGovern insisted, "There's no indication at all that what this administration's been telling people for a long time, that there's going to be this massive uprising, is going to happen -- that's not going to happen." Both House members said that "without a shift in US policy, political changes are not likely in Cuba."

Separately, the AP (1/17, Cheng) reports the intestinal disease Castro is reportedly suffering from is "usually easy to treat -- but if complications develop in an elderly patient like the Cuban leader, it can quickly become a death sentence." The Spanish newspaper El Pais reported Tuesday that t Castro is suffering from diverticulitis, which the AP says has a mortality rate "as high as 90 percent" in the elderly.

UN Says Global AIDS Effort For Children Falls Far Short. The New York Times (1/17, Altman, 1.16M) reports, "Some countries are making progress in treating children with AIDS and preventing others from becoming infected, but the overall global response is 'tragically insufficient,' Unicef said yesterday." In a report, the UN agency found, "Children affected by AIDS are now more visible and are taken more seriously in global, regional and national forums where they had received little consideration before." Better testing to find children with HIV and "simpler formulations of the antiretroviral drugs that combat the infection have increased the number of children under treatment," Unicef said.

Scotland Consider Independence Move. The Washington Times/AP (1/17, Ben McConville) reports, "The anniversary yesterday of the Scottish Parliament's vote for the Treaty of Union is focusing attention more on the perennial discord than the ties that bind these two members of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland." Polls show advocates of Scottish independence "are gaining strength in their campaign for a referendum on breaking the union." British Prime Minister Tony Blair, however, "said any attempt to split England and Scotland would be a 'crazy' idea."

Defense, State Departments Urged To Coordinate Military At Embassies. The Washington Times/UPI (1/17, Waterman) reports, "A report by Senate Republican staffers urges the departments of Defense and State to better coordinate the role of military personnel in US embassies and warns that a growing military presence is causing anxiety among some host governments." A report last month by the outgoing Republican majority on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said, "Blurred lines of authority between the State Department and the Defense Department could lead to interagency turf wars that undermine the effectiveness of the overall US effort against terrorism." The report also recommends that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "pursue a more systemic solution" and negotiate "a global memorandum of agreement" with the new defense secretary.

WSJournal Criticizes Dodd, Delahunt's Defense Of Chavez. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/17, A18, 2.04M) writes, "We've known for some time that Hugo Chávez is a menace to the economic well-being of his own people. But the question that seems increasingly urgent is whether he's becoming a threat to US security interests -- both in the Western Hemisphere and beyond. Specifically, we'd like to know what Senator Chris Dodd and Congressman Bill Delahunt make of Mr. Chávez's weekend summit with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad." Chávez, the Journal continues, "has had American enablers who excused his growing repression, or blamed it on a reaction to US policy. Foremost among them has been Mr. Dodd," who has defended Chávez as "democratically elected" despite his "clear trend toward authoritarianism." Other politicians, such as Delahunt, "embraced and flattered Mr. Chávez for his PR stunt of offering cut-rate oil to poor Americans. Perhaps it's time these Americans paid attention to the kind of 'socialism' and 'revolution' that their support is helping Mr. Chávez to build in Venezuela."

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Prepared Remarks, Gonzales Criticizes Judges For Terror Rulings. The AP (1/17, Jordan) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says federal judges are unqualified to make rulings affecting national security policy, ramping up his criticism of how they handle terrorism cases." The AP continues, "In remarks prepared for delivery Wednesday, Gonzales says judges generally should defer to the will of the president and Congress when deciding national security cases. He also raps jurists who 'apply an activist philosophy that stretches the law to suit policy preferences.' … The text of the speech, scheduled for delivery at the American Enterprise Institute, was obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press. It outlines, in part, what qualities the Bush administration looks for when selecting candidates for the federal bench. … 'We want to determine whether he understands the inherent limits that make an unelected judiciary inferior to Congress or the president in making policy judgments,' Gonzales says in the prepared speech. 'That, for example, a judge will never be in the best position to know what is in the national security interests of our country.'" The AP adds, "Gonzales did not cite any specific activist jurists, or give examples of national security cases, in his prepared text. The Justice Department is appealing an August decision by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit, who ruled the government's warrantless surveillance program unconstitutional and ordered it stopped immediately. … The Justice Department appealed her decision and the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati has ruled that the administration can keep the program in place during the appeal."

Gonzales Says Legal Challenges Are Cause Of Guantanamo Trial Delays. The AP (1/17, Jordan) reports, "Trials for detainees at Guantanamo Bay have been delayed because of numerous challenges by their own lawyers, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday in defending the Bush administration's treatment of terror suspects. … A leading human rights attorney called the attorney general's comments 'a convoluted view of the world.'" The AP continues, "Gonzales, meeting with Associated Press reporters and editors, said the trials of terror detainees may begin as early as this summer, and that rules for military commissions in carrying them out will be sent to Capitol Hill this week. … But he acknowledged the delays, of up to five years in some cases, in deciding the legal fate of detainees being held at the military facility in Cuba. … 'It's not for lack of trying,' Gonzales said. 'We are challenged every step of the way.' … 'A lot will depend on the courts and the legal challenges brought by detainees at Guantanamo,' he said. 'But we are trying as hard as we can to bring these individuals to justice.'" The AP adds, "Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, called Gonzales' remarks 'a convoluted view of the world.' … 'We've been trying for five years to get the majority of the detainees in federal court,' Ratner said. 'They've resisted from the first day, when they took people to Guantanamo.' … The Guantanamo issue was one of several topics during the hourlong AP interview that had Gonzales on the defensive over Bush administration policies criticized by Democrats and civil libertarians as overstepping legal boundaries. … Others included: … Little-known but recently revealed powers authorizing the Pentagon to examine banking records of Americans suspected of terrorism or espionage. Congress authorized such investigations decades ago, and recently affirmed them in the USA Patriot Act, but some lawmakers question whether it is an improper expansion of the Defense Department's domestic role. … 'If Congress gives them the authority, I think they probably ought to be exercising that authority in connection with national security investigations,' Gonzales said." The AP (1/17) distributes excerpts of the interview with Attorney General Gonzales.

FNC On the Record with Greta Van Susteren (1/16, 10:38 p.m.) broadcasted, "Alberto Gonzales blamed delays on attorneys, 'We are challenged every step of the way.' Military officials saying 60 to 80 detainees will be charged and brought to trial. Gonzales says the trials May start sometime this summer."

Stimson Apologizes For Gitmo Remarks. The Washington Post (1/17, White, 690K) reports that deputy assistant secretary for detainee affairs Cully Stimson, "who criticized large U.S. law firms for representing terrorism suspects at the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has apologized for his comments, saying that his discussion on a local radio program does not reflect his 'core beliefs.'" Stimson's letter to the editor appears in the Washington Post (1/17, 690K).

Law Deans Blast Stimson's Remarks. The New York Sun (1/17, Gerstein) reports, "More than 130 deans of American law schools have signed a letter deploring a Pentagon official's statement criticizing major law firms for representing detainees at Guantanamo Bay." The Sun continues, "The law deans wrote that they were 'appalled' by an interview last week in which the Pentagon's point man on detainee affairs, Charles Stimson, said corporations should be disturbed by the law firms' pro bono work for detainees and might want to reconsider sending business to the firms involved. … 'We find Secretary Stimson's statement to be contrary to basic tenets of American law,' the deans wrote.

'Our American legal tradition has honored lawyers who, despite their personal beliefs, have zealously represented mass murderers, suspected terrorists, and Nazi marchers…. In a free and democratic society, government officials should not encourage intimidation of or retaliation against lawyers who are fulfilling their pro bono obligations.'" The Sun adds, "A Pentagon spokesman said Friday that Mr. Stimson's views were not shared by the department's leadership. The letter asks the administration to repudiate the statement. … The missive was circulated by the dean of Yale Law School, Harold Hongju Koh, and the dean of Northeastern University's law school, Emily Spieler. The signers include the deans of law schools at Columbia, Fordham, New York University, and New York Law School."

Stimson Criticized For Comments On Detainee Representation. In an op-ed for Washingtonpost.com (1/17), CBS News legal analyst Andrew Cohen writes, "Here is how our executive branch last week waged its legal war on terrorism against the detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. While federal lawyers and intelligence officials earnestly prepared behind the scenes to put on trial some of the major terror suspects, a skuzzy Pentagon lawyer was front and center on the radio attacking the motives and integrity and even the patriotism of detainee defense attorneys and the law firms that support them." Cohen continues, "If there is nothing surprising about a group of prosecutors preparing for trial…it is…downright shocking that a government attorney would denigrate the work of attorneys and their colleagues who have chosen to help men who sometimes quite literally have no one else on their side. The malfeasant culprit is a man named Charles 'Cully' Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, and there is simply no excuse for the tone or the tenor of the remarks he made Thursday on Federal News Radio." Cohen adds, "What Stimson said, and why, and how, constitutes conduct unbecoming a member of government and a member of the bar. One hand may be acting aggressively, if not mercifully and justly, toward prosecuting suspected terrorists. But the other hand, Stimson's hand, is undercutting the very principles we fight for. This is how our government waged the legal war on terror in our name last week."

The Boston Herald (1/17) editorializes, "Well, it's official now: Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs Charles 'Cully' Stimson has made himself a household name virtually overnight with a comment that is beyond idiotic. … Interviewed by Federal News Radio on the fifth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo Bay prison, Stimson said, 'It's shocking . . . The major law firms in this country . . . are out there representing detainees.' … Then the former Navy lawyer went so far as to suggest a boycott of those firms, noting, 'when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms.'" The Herald adds, "A Pentagon spokesman has already distanced the Defense Department from Stimson's comments. And Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told The New York Times [NYT], 'Good lawyers representing the detainees is the best way to ensure that justice is done in these cases.' … Anyone clueless about that concept ought to be out the door."

DOJ Letter Details Problems With Prosecuting Detainee Abuse. The New York Times (1/17, Johnston) reports, "A Justice Department team responsible for reviewing accusations of abuse of detainees by civilian government employees in Iraq and Afghanistan has encountered 'delays' and 'unique difficulties,' the department said in a letter on Tuesday." The Times continues, "The letter, to Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, said prosecutors found that some accusations were not credible. Some victims could not be identified, it said, and a few had been released from custody and could not be found. … In one case, two lawyers were prepared to travel to an unidentified Middle Eastern country to interview people who say they had been abused, but canceled the trip because the country's officials refused to allow the prosecutors to meet with them. .. 'As with an American suspected of a crime, those Americans who are the subject of the referrals are innocent until proven guilty,' the letter said. 'When career prosecutors conclude that we cannot prove allegations of a crime beyond a reasonable doubt, the department — consistent with its longstanding practices and policies — will not prosecute.'" The Times adds, "The Justice Department provided the report in response to questions posed by Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, who in a letter on Dec. 18 asked government lawyers for a progress report. Democrats have expressed skepticism about the department's inability to bring cases to trial. … The letter described the reasons no charges would be brought in most of the cases, saying, 'All were declined for insufficient evidence to warrant criminal prosecution for one or more of the following reasons: insufficient evidence of criminal conduct; insufficient evidence of the subject's involvement; insufficient evidence of criminal intent; low probability of conviction.' … A government lawyer who worked on some of the cases said Tuesday that the problems made prosecutions unlikely in nearly all of the 21 abuse accusations the team reviewed. … But the official, who did not want to speak on the record about pending investigations, said prosecutors had tried hard to assemble cases."

9th Circuit Tosses Ressam Sentence. The AP (1/17, Kravets) reports, "A federal appeals court on Tuesday threw out the sentence of a man who was convicted of plotting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport at the turn of the millennium." The AP continues, "Ahmed Ressam was arrested near the U.S.-Canadian border in December 1999 after customs agents found 124 pounds of explosives in the trunk of his car. … Prosecutors said he was intent on bombing the airport on the eve of the millennium. The arrest raised fears of terrorism attacks and prompted the cancellation of millennium celebrations at Seattle's Space Needle." The AP adds, "Ressam was sentenced to 22 years in prison after being convicted off all nine charges. On Tuesday, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco reversed his conviction on one of the charges and sent the case back to a lower court to issue a new sentence and explain the rationale behind the 22-year term. No new sentencing date was immediately set. … The decision does not necessarily mean Ressam will get a shorter term. Judges are given wide latitude to sentence defendants as they see fit. … Defense attorney Thomas Hillier II said the reversal might not reduce his client's sentence but 'helps in fending off the government's argument that the original sentence was too lenient.' … Emily Langlie, spokesman for U.S. attorney John McKay in Seattle, said the government was mulling whether to ask the 9th Circuit to rehear the case with 15 judges. They maintain Ressam should get a 35-year term."

The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Weinstein) reports, "U.S. 9th Circuit Judge Pamela Ann Rymer, writing for the majority, referred to the fact that the U.S. Supreme Court and the 9th Circuit are considering cases that are expected to have a significant impact on federal sentencing law. … Consequently, District Judge John C. Coughenour will have to wait for those decisions, said Thomas W. Hillier II, the federal public defender in Seattle, who is representing Ressam." The Times notes, "Ressam left his native Algeria for France in 1992 and two years later fled to Canada after being arrested on an immigration violation. While in Montreal in 1998, Ressam met an Al Qaeda operative who recruited him for a training camp in Afghanistan. According to Tuesday's ruling, Ressam spent six months at a training camp, learning how to fire a rocket-propelled grenade launcher and make explosive charges, and 'how to destroy infrastructure targets, such as power plants, military installations, railroads and airports,' Rymer wrote. … Later, Ressam went to a second camp near Jalalabad, where he and others "hatched the plot to target a U.S. airport to coincide with the millennium," the judge added. .. .In December 1999, Ressam left British Columbia in a rented Chrysler loaded with explosives, electronic timing devices, detonators, fertilizer and aluminum sulfate. After he crossed by ferry to Port Angeles, Wash., an alert customs inspector, Diana Dean, noticed that he was agitated and asked other agents to search his car. … They found component parts of a bomb hidden in the trunk's tire well. Ressam was arrested and indicted. The case was transferred to Los Angeles because of heavy pretrial publicity in the Northwest."

Bloomberg (1/17, Gullo) reports, "The U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco said today the sentence should be recalculated in part because the court overturned one of Ressam's convictions, for carrying an explosive during the commission of a felony. The charge carried a 10-year minimum sentence under federal guidelines. … 'We vacate the entire sentence so that the district court can resentence in light of this decision and developments in the law of sentencing,' the court said in its ruling." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. Justice Department had sought a tougher sentence for Ressam after he stopped cooperating with investigators. The 9th Circuit declined to address the government's appeal because of its reversal of one of his convictions. … 'We are studying the ruling to determine whether or not to seek an appeal,' said Dean Boyd, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington."

Author Of Controversial Terror Memo Takes Podium At U Of Minnesota Law School. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (1/17, Tosto) reports, "It may be the most anxiously awaited constitutional law class ever at the University of Minnesota. … At the podium Tuesday will stand Robert Delahunty. A recognized scholar and U.S. Justice Department veteran, he is better known as co-author of one of the most controversial legal opinions in the nation's war on terrorism. … His one-term appointment to the U triggered waves of praise — and scorn — from students and faculty in the fall." The Pioneer-Press continues, "While he's kept a low profile, supporters and detractors continue to slug it out in letters and on the Web. The latest volley came two weeks ago, when eight of Delahunty's former Justice Department bosses wrote to praise him — and to scold U professors for deriding his hiring as being akin to the U paying Enron executives to teach accounting." The Pioneer-Press adds, "Written while Delahunty was a Justice attorney, the 2002 memo concluded al-Qaida and Taliban prisoners were not protected by international treaties or federal law. … Critics charged the memo paved the way for the Bush administration to mistreat prisoners and ignore the Geneva Conventions. Amnesty International has called for Delahunty and other attorneys to be investigated for failing to meet professional standards in advising the president — accusations his supporters ridicule. … Delahunty joined the University of St. Thomas Law School faculty in 2004. The St. Thomas law dean defended Delahunty then, noting his "long and distinguished career" working for several presidents, including Bill Clinton. … He fell out of the public eye until last fall, when the U began looking to fill a constitutional law teaching slot after a professor took an unexpected leave."

Trial Of Would-Be London Subway Bombers Underway. The Washington Post (1/17, A10, Sullivan, Adam, 690K) reports on the trial of six British Muslims for their role in the failed subway and bus bombing attempts on July 21, 2005. The "grainy security video showed a London subway car crowded with midday riders, a man with a backpack among them. He looked around, then turned his back toward a woman with a child in a stroller. Suddenly, a large puff of dust shot out of his pack, and panic erupted among the other passengers." British prosecutors said the man "was Ramzi Mohammed, 25, one of six men on trial for conspiracy to murder commuters that day, July 21, 2005. The dust, they said, was residue from a bomb hidden in his backpack. Its detonator fired and caused the puff of dust, prosecutors said, but the shrapnel-laced main charge failed to explode." Prosecutor Nigel Sweeney "told jurors that three other bombs carried onto subway trains and a bus that day also failed to explode, preventing a repeat of a nearly identical attack two weeks earlier, July 7, that had killed 52 commuters and wounded about 700 others." With the "four July 7 bombers dead, the six July 21 defendants are the first people to face trial on charges relating to a pair of incidents that were the first major Islamic extremist attacks on British soil and created chaos in one of the world's biggest cities."

FBI Assisting In US Embassy Attack Investigation. The AP (1/17, Paphitis) reports FBI agents are "helping investigate last week's rocket-propelled grenade attack on the US Embassy" in Athens, "trying to enhance security camera footage," Ambassador Charles Ries said Tuesday. FBI experts "flew in over the weekend and were working on the security footage," according to the ambassador. The video footage "shows the missile streaking across the street and into the embassy," he told state NET television, noting that "It was dark, it's not as good as we want. We're bringing in some experts to see what they can do in terms of looking at the files, ways to enhance it."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Treasury Says Counterterror Data Collection Program Will Have To Wait. The Washington Post (1/17, D1, Nakashima, 690K) reports the Treasury Department reported to Congress yesterday that the Cross-Border Electronic Funds Transfer Program, which would "give counterterrorism analysts routine access to as many as 500 million cross-border financial transactions a year, could not be implemented until 2010. The department had hoped to implement it by the end of this year. … In a report to Congress to be released today, the Treasury Department concluded that the program was technologically feasible and has value, but said it needs to determine whether the counterterrorism benefit outweighs banks' costs of compliance and to address privacy concerns. The program is opposed by bankers, who view it as burdensome and invasive."

ACLU To Release Pentagon Memo Showing Protestors In Talon Database. The Washington Post (1/17, A8, Pincus, 690K) reports, "A Defense Department database devoted to gathering information on potential threats to military facilities and personnel, known as Talon, had 13,000 entries as of a year ago -- including 2,821 reports involving American citizens, according to an internal Pentagon memo to be released today by the American Civil Liberties Union. The Pentagon memo says an examination of the system led to the deletion of 1,131 reports involving Americans, 186 of which dealt with 'anti-military protests or demonstrations in the US.'" The memo "said that the deleted reports did not meet a 2003 Defense Department requirement that they have some foreign terrorist connection or relate to what was believed to be 'a force protection threat.'" The Post adds that the 1,131 deleted reports "far exceeds the estimate provided to The Washington Post just over a year ago by senior officials of Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), the Defense Department agency that manages the Talon program."

Nighttime Drills Over Washington Test Air Defense. In a front page article, the Washington Post (1/17, A1, Sheridan, 690K) reports on a group of Civil Air Patrol pilots "who pose as nighttime intruders, penetrating restricted airspace over Washington in drills that take place every few weeks. While area residents slumber, the volunteers allow the US military to practice intercepting them -- or worse." Though many details of the "Falcon Virgo" exercises are kept secret, "this much is known: The exercises test Washington's air-defense radar system and the aircraft that might have to confront an intruder. Those include the Air Force jets that fly continuously over the capital, planes that scramble from Andrews Air Force base and Coast Guard helicopters. Participants include officials up the chain of command who must decide whether to intercept or shoot down an aircraft."

Half Of Passengers Using ShoeScanner Forced To Remove Shoes. USA Today (1/17, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports approximately half of the Registered Traveler customers screened by "Orlando International Airport first-in-the-nation ShoeScanner" yesterday "underwent the very hassle the machines were designed to ease — putting shoes through checkpoint X-rays — because the ShoeScanner detected metal in their shoes. … Steven Brill, whose Manhattan company, Verified Identity Pass, operates the ShoeScanners, said 52% of hundreds of passengers using the machine Tuesday morning had to remove shoes." General Electric's GE Security, which makes the

ShoeScanner, "is trying to upgrade the machine so it can allow passengers to wear shoes that contain harmless metal. For now, TSA spokesman Christopher White said, if the ShoeScanner senses any explosives or metal, 'it's going to require additional scrutiny.'"

Meanwhile, USA Today (1/17, 2A, Frank, 2.27M) described Tuesday's opening of a Registered Traveler terminal in New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport, the first outside Orlando International Airport, as "a small but dramatic step" for the program. "Indianapolis International Airport plans to start a Registered Traveler program Thursday. Airports in San Jose, Calif., and Cincinnati are scheduled to join next week, said Steven Brill, whose Manhattan company, Verified Identity Pass, will manage the programs. Other airports are likely to follow when they see Registered Traveler grow, Brill said." USA Today adds, "Some Orlando passengers said Tuesday that being able to keep their shoes on while passing through security was a step forward."

NYTimes Sees Wider Uses For Registered Traveler Technology. Under the headline "Keep Your Shoes On, For A Price," the New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) editorializes, "Of all the hassles at the airport in this age of heightened security, perhaps the most annoying is the requirement to take off your shoes to send them through the X-ray screener. That burden will be lifted at some airports shortly — for those willing to pay about $100 a year for the privilege." The Times says the ShoeScanner "is the first important new technology to emerge from the for-profit registered traveler programs." Advances like this "could become the major contribution" of the programs, "which otherwise simply offer those willing to pay an annual fee a designated fast lane to a set of the airport's standard metal detectors and X-ray scanners. … Someday these technologies may trickle down to us all, and the registered traveler companies will have to keep finding new devices to stay ahead."

Discrimination Seen In Denial Of Flight For Muslims Returning From Hajj. The Washington Times (1/17, Hudson, 88K) reports the Council on American-Islamic Relations "is calling for an investigation to determine why 40 Muslims were not allowed to board a flight from Germany to Detroit after their pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia. Northwest Airlines officials said the passengers arrived too late to catch the flight, but some of the Muslims, appearing at a press conference yesterday" with CAIR "called it religious discrimination. … Imam Sayed Hassan Al-Qazwini of the Islamic Center of America in Dearborn, Mich., told reporters that the travelers, who included two imams, were stranded and left on their own to find flights home." However, Northwest Airlines spokesman Dean Breest "said those who arrived at the gate in time with boarding passes were allowed onto the plane, and that those who could not be accommodated were rescheduled for other flights."

CIFA May Have Broken Law. USA Today (1/17, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "A Pentagon domestic intelligence agency overpaid and might have broken the law in awarding a $100 million contract to lease office space, federal investigators say. The Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA) awarded the no-bid deal in 2003 to TKC Communications. ... Internal watchdogs at the Pentagon and Interior Department, as well as Congress' Government Accountability Office, began questioning the contract last year. Still, federal contracting records show CIFA has paid TKC more than $11 million since Pentagon auditors raised their concerns in May, including more than $6 million in late November." The investigations come "as CIFA faces criticism over its surveillance tactics. Created in 2002, the agency oversees investigations and efforts to block terrorism or espionage against military bases or personnel in the USA. The agency has issued hundreds of 'national security letters' to obtain the banking records of suspects, a practice The New York Times revealed this weekend."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says Previous Iraq Policies Were Leading To "Slow Failure." The Washington Post (1/17, A14, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "President Bush said that his Iraq policy was headed to 'a slow failure' until he changed course last week with the announcement that he was sending more than 21,000 additional U.S. troops to bolster flagging security in Baghdad. The comment, perhaps the president's frankest admission that the previous strategy was not working, came during an interview yesterday with Jim Lehrer of PBS's 'NewsHour,' in which Bush detailed some of his decision-making regarding Iraq." Bush said, "I had a choice to make. Do what we're doing -- and one could define that maybe a slow failure. Secondly, withdraw out of Baghdad and hope for the best. I think that would be expedited failure. And thirdly is to help this Iraqi government with additional forces -- help them do what they need to do, which is to provide security in Baghdad. … I chose the latter because I think it's going to more likely be successful." The interview "was part of an ongoing White House campaign to sell the new Iraq policy in the face of intense skepticism from Congress and the American public. Bush acknowledged this view while sharpening his criticism of the Iraqi government over its handling of the execution of Saddam Hussein and security in Baghdad."

Most media coverage focuses on Bush's comments on the executions. The AP (1/17, Loven) reports Bush said "the unruly execution of Saddam Hussein 'looked like it was kind of a revenge killing,' making it harder to persuade a skeptical US public that Iraq's government will keep promises central to Bush's plan for a troop increase." Said Bush, "I was disappointed and felt like they fumbled the -- particularly the Saddam Hussein execution."

The New York Times (1/17, Rutenberg, 1.16M) says the comments "pointed up the continued tensions between Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki as they try to forge a joint plan to calm the violence plaguing Iraq." USA Today (1/17, 1A, Nichols, 2.27M) notes Bush "has called on al-Maliki…to reach out to disgruntled Sunnis and to help disarm sectarian militias as 21,500 additional US troops begin arriving in Iraq."

Also reporting on the executions, the New York Times (1/17, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "The botched hanging of Saddam Hussein and two lieutenants in Iraq by its Shiite-led government has helped to accelerate Sunni-Shiite sectarianism across an already fragile Middle East, according to experts across the region. The chaotic executions and the calm with which Mr. Hussein confronted the gallows and mocking Shiite guards have bolstered his image among many of his fellow Sunni Muslims." But "something else is happening too: a pan-Muslim unity that surged after the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite militia, is waning." Moreover, "while political analysts and government officials in the region say the spreading Sunni disillusionment with Shiites and their backers in Iran will benefit Sunni-led governments and the United States, they and others worry that the tensions could start to balkanize the region as they have in Iraq itself."

New York Times columnist David Brooks discussed Bush's PBS' Newshour With Jim Lehrer (1/16) interview immediately after it aired, saying he thought "this was the best" he's heard the President "on the past, on the troop deployments, on the inability that we had for a couple of years to hold any territory that we cleared." Brooks went on to say he also found the President "pretty compelling on the future, what would happen if we don't succeed there. … Where I found him less compelling was on the present and on this plan." Americans "have been following this issue for a long time, and they're pretty well-educated about it, especially viewers of this program. They want some details. They don't just want the grand assertions."

Also, show host Jim Lehrer asked syndicated columnist Mark Shields if he thinks the President made any progress in his PBS' Newshour With Jim Lehrer (1/16) interview, in terms of convincing the skeptics about his new Iraq plan. Shields said, "I don't think so, Jim. I think the President put it bluntly himself. The Secretary of State did as well yesterday. And that is that all the words, all the rhetoric, I mean, you could be Churchillian at this point, but it's the reality on the ground…in Baghdad."

Doubts About Maliki Continue. The CBS Evening News (1/16, story 3, 1:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Back in Washington, President Bush finds himself increasingly isolated because of his new Iraq strategy. Democrats and Republicans have voiced their opposition to the plan, and there are new questions about whether the President can depend on Iraq's Prime Minister to carry out his part of the deal." CBS (Axelrod) added "the jury's out on whether Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has the capacity to stop the bloodshed." Bush was shown saying, "No question, there's a headwind. There's a lot of skepticism in Washington, DC. There's skepticism about whether or not there's enough troops, or whether we should be putting any troops, and there's skepticism whether the Maliki government will make the tough decisions necessary to succeed." The President "says he thinks his plan can succeed, if Prime Minister Maliki will support American forces completely." The White House "won't talk about failure before even launching the plan, but foreign policy expert Michael O'Hanlon says Maliki must be thinking about his plan B." Michael O'Hanlon, Brookings Institution: "Maliki probably agrees with us on what the preferred outcome in Iraq would be, of a multi-ethnic Iraq that holds itself together. But he is probably also planning, in a way that we are not, for a backup option, which is civil war in which the Shia win." CBS added, "While the President won't talk about a plan B, inside the White House they feel they've done everything they can to get Maliki on board in what amounts to the President's last best hope for Iraq. Yet still there are doubts that Maliki's the man to get it done."

Fox News' Special Report (1/16, Hume) reported, "The first of 21,000 new US troops are arriving as the US and Baghdad kicked off a new security plan. The no. 2 U.S. Commander here says Iraqis developed the strategy with the goal of moving Americans to a support role." Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno: "It will enhance our training teams with Iraqis and we will move to the perimeter of Baghdad. That could take some time, but it is about sustaining this over a long period of time." Fox went on to report, "A major challenge in securing Baghdad is disbanding militias thought to be responsible for hundreds of execution-style murders each month. The prime minister has repeatedly promised that Iraqi forces will move against militias, but has yet to follow through. Odierno says that he truly believes Maliki will truly meet his commitment this time."

Administration Said To Appear "Off-Stride" Defending Bush Plan. The Washington Post's (1/17, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and national security adviser Stephen Hadley "and others seemed a bit off-stride, less self-assured, last week as they got a bipartisan hammering on the Hill and from the media about the war in Iraq." Instead, "It fell, once again, to Vice President Cheney to show how to take the long view in handling this sniping." On "Fox News Sunday," Cheney told Chris Wallace: "The fact is we've come a long way from where we started in Iraq. Now, no war ever goes smoothly all the way. ... Lots of times you have to make adjustments, and that's what we're doing here."

More Commentary. Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (1/17, 690K), "For the Republicans, there are two ways out of Iraq. They can either go out like Eisenhower or like Nixon." Dwight Eisenhower "could have chosen to divide the public and try to roll back Franklin Roosevelt's handiwork. In fact, he didn't give that option a moment's consideration. Social Security and unions, he concluded, were here to stay; any attempt to undo them, he wrote, would consign the Republicans to permanent minority status. Ike also ended the Korean War without attacking Democrats in the process." Richard Nixon "became president largely because of the public's massive discontent with the Vietnam War. We now know that Nixon and Henry Kissinger had no illusions that the war could be won, and Nixon probably could have withdrawn US troops in a way that didn't polarize the public. Such a stance, however, ran counter to Nixon's deepest instincts. … Today's Republicans now must choose between Eisenhower's way and Nixon's way."

David Ignatius, in the Washington Post (1/17, A19, 690K), writes, "It was axiomatic during the Cold War that presidents should not gamble with matters of national security. The stakes were too high. The Bush administration's Iraq policy has long suffered from a lack of that prudence -- and the misplaced gambler's instinct is especially evident in the administration's plan to send more troops to Baghdad." Bush's "surge" is "a mistake because it is piling more precious chips -- more human lives -- on what so far has been a losing bet."

Maureen Dowd writes in the New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) that Bush "told Jim Lehrer last night that in 20 years, radical Shiites could be warring with radical Sunnis and Middle Eastern oil could fall into the hands of radicals, who might also get weapons of mass destruction. So after scaring Americans into backing the Sack of Iraq by warning that radicals could get W.M.D., now he's trying to scare Americans into supporting the Surge in Iraq by warning that radicals could get W.M.D. So many deaths, so little progress."

Los Angeles Times (1/17, 850K) columnist Max Boot, meanwhile, writes Bush's plan "has not...been well received. But does anyone have a better idea?" The plan "seems worth one final effort to see if we can salvage something from this dire situation."

Wall Street Journal (1/17, 2.04M) op-ed contributor and AEI fellow Reuel Marc Gerecht urges a "revision" of Bush's surge strategy, saying, "Recent remarks by Defense Secretary Robert Gates -- predicting troop reductions within a year, and saying that we might not need an additional five brigades in Baghdad for a successful operation -- are a frightening echo of the self-defeating, undermanned optimism that came from the US military under Mr. Gates's predecessor."

Senate To Debate Biden-Levin-Hagel Resolution Against Bush Iraq Plans. The Washington Post (1/17, A4, Weisman, 690K) reports, "Senate leaders will introduce a bipartisan resolution of opposition to President Bush's new Iraq policy as early as today, taking the lead from House Democrats who are increasingly divided on how far to go to thwart additional troop deployments to Iraq. The resolution -- crafted by Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) -- will not come to a vote before Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday." But "by sending it to Biden's committee this week, Democratic leaders will give senators from both parties multiple opportunities to voice concerns about the president's policy." House leaders "opted to allow the Senate to strike first, reasoning that a strong, bipartisan vote there would splinter Republican support in the House, Democratic leadership aides said. … House leaders are beset by division over efforts to choke off the deployment through Congress's power of the purse. Moreover, antiwar groups are growing uneasy about a nonbinding resolution of opposition."

The New York Times (1/17, Hulse, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports Hagel "said the intent of the resolution was not to 'bash the president' or to call for the immediate withdrawal of United States troops from Iraq, but a responsible way for senators to register their opinion on the increase of more than 20,000 additional troops announced by Mr. Bush last week." The Times adds, "While Senate opponents of the buildup were preparing to move forward, Senate Republicans backing the president were trying to map their own strategy, considering proposals that could appeal to Republicans frustrated with events in Iraq but keep them from supporting the most critical resolution. 'There will be alternatives,' said Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona, the third-ranking Senate Republican." At the White House, "officials were continuing to discuss the new plan with members of Congress, with an emphasis on lining up Republicans behind Mr. Bush's approach. 'We knew this was not going to be an easy policy to explain or one that was going to be met with open arms,' said a White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity." That official "said that the message to Congressional Republicans was similar to the one the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, conveyed Tuesday at his press briefing: that approval of any resolution critical of Mr. Bush's approach, even if nonbinding, would send a damaging message."

Roll Call (1/17, Stanton) reports "aides" said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "is attempting to carefully craft the resolution to appeal to as many Republicans as possible in the hopes of piecing together a truly bipartisan coalition. As a result, the language of the resolution will remain as neutral as possible to allow Republicans to feel comfortable casting their votes with Democrats on such a high-profile issue." While "there has been talk in Democratic circles of holding a vote on the resolution the day of Bush's State of the Union address, a Reid aide said it was unlikely that would occur, since it likely would provoke claims of partisanship."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/17, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "If a nonbinding resolution opposing the surge of 21,500 troops into Iraq is approved, Democrats could quickly move stronger legislation to build a congressional firewall against any future move to broaden the war to Iran or Syria. Others are testing the waters for GOP support for the ultimate weapon in a showdown with the White House – curbs on funding." But "the key to an effective push back – including the 67 votes needed to overturn a presidential veto – is building bridges to Republicans."

Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (1/17, Rogers, 2.04M) notes "Republican votes will decide the coming debate in Congress over the Iraq war, so Democrats are first working to build bipartisan support for nonbinding criticism before taking on the White House over funding. The two-part strategy is on display this week as top Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee expect to announce agreement on a resolution challenging…Bush's decision to increase U.S. troop levels. As those talks proceed, the House Appropriations Committee will also begin hearings this morning to lay the groundwork for tougher fights over war-related spending requests this spring and summer." The Journal adds, "The nervousness among House Republicans is striking after November's losses. 'Two years before the elections, people are worried about their political skins,' said Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.)."

In addition, says The Hill (1/17, Tiron), Democrats want to redirect "attention" from Iraq " to the war in Afghanistan and the search for al Qaeda's leader, Osama bin Laden. Several top Democrats, including 2008 presidential hopefuls Sens. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), said a troop increase should occur in Afghanistan rather than Iraq." Clinton, Sen. Evan Bayh and GOP Rep. John McHugh "returned from a congressional delegation to Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq and are expected to talk about the trip today." But "congressional plans have yet to emerge for keeping a firm grip on Afghanistan, which is dealing with rampant poppy production and is at risk of sliding back into the hands of Taliban insurgents."

Former Bush Counterterror Advisor To Join Biden Staff. The Washington Times (1/17, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "A counterterrorism adviser to President Bush is leaving the White House to join the staff of a prominent Democratic senator gearing up to investigate the administration's war policies. A Senate source said Todd M. Hinnen, a director for combating terrorism on the staff of the president's National Security Council (NSC), will become the chief counsel for Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. … 'Once again, people on the Bush White House staff turn on him while our soldiers and Marines fight to protect the rest of us,' a Republican staffer said."

More Commentary. Former Defense Secretary Mel Laird writes in the Washington Post (1/17, 690K), "Cutting off funding is not a plan. Holding hearings to excoriate the executive branch is not a plan. Emotional oratory about casualties is not a plan." Therefore, "Congress must stop the partisan gamesmanship that feeds on itself and becomes an end rather than a means. … The best thing Congress could do now is look at the bigger picture with civility and bipartisanship. … Defense spending must be substantially increased. … Congress must take the lead in demanding accountability from the Iraqi government," and "Congress must set the tone by admitting who the enemy is -- political correctness be damned."

Over 1,000 Active Duty Troops Sign Anti-Surge Plan. The AP (1/17) reports, "Several anti-war groups that include members of the military on Tuesday delivered petitions against the war in Iraq to US Rep. Dennis Kucinich, a Democrat who's long been against the conflict." Iraq Veterans Against the War, Veterans for Peace and Military Families Speak Out "sponsored the 'appeal for redress' petition, which was signed by more than 1,000 active duty military members, according to Kucinich's office."

McClatchy (1/17, Schoof) reports, "Although they're duty-bound to carry out the president's orders," the troops "have a legal right to use this means to express their views. The statement, carried on the Web site AppealforRedress.org, was signed by 1,080 troops as of Tuesday afternoon, according to the site. It urged Congress to support 'the prompt withdrawal of all American military forces and bases from Iraq," adding, "Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Levey, 850K) also notes the "public opposition from a slice of the American population that rarely speaks out: the military rank and file. A group of service members came to Capitol Hill on Tuesday armed with signatures from more than 1,000 military personnel who oppose the war. 'We will not be silent while thousands die,' said Sgt. Liam Madden, a 22-year-old active-duty Marine and Iraq war veteran who is helping lead the effort to organize resistance to the war from inside the military." The Times adds, "When the campaign began three months ago, White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed the first signatories as '65 people who are going to be able to get more press than the hundreds of thousands who have come back and said they're proud of their service.'"

Troops Express Uncertainty Over Iraq's Future. The AP (1/17, Frayer) reports, "Nearly four years into the fighting, some soldiers say it's getting more difficult to swing their legs over the edge of the cot each morning. With America's Iraq policy in flux, some troops say they're asking themselves for the first time whether the U.S. can win the war — or what winning really means here. ... [Case] Dewinkel and other members of the 1st Squadron, 89th Cavalry Regiment, 2nd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division gathered one recent rainy morning in a schoolhouse south of Baghdad to set up a makeshift medical clinic for villagers. ... [they] finally said they felt a certain apathy and ambiguity." While Web Wright "said he worried U.S. public support for the war was waning and that U.S. troops could be withdrawn prematurely," Fred Morris "said he's grown frustrated with Iraqis, who have become increasingly demoralized and more dependent than ever on U.S. troops."

Bombs Kill At Least 70 Students At Baghdad University. The CBS Evening News (1/16, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported on "a horrific example of the kind of violence…additional US forces are likely to face as they try to stabilize Baghdad. Two bombs exploded today at a university there that's nearly 800 years old. It was especially brutal, even by Baghdad standards." ABC World News (1/16, lead story, 2:40, Harris, 8.78M) said the victims were "Shiite and Sunni. There were no arrests and no claims of responsibility." The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Daragahi, 850K) notes "at least 70 Iraqi college students were killed and more than 170 others were wounded."

NBC Nightly News (1/16, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It's the exact same situation American troops are about to head right into and today it got even more dire. According to numbers just out today, over 34,000 Iraqi civilians died in the sectarian violence there last year. That's 100 a day."

The Washington Times/AP (1/17, Hurst) reports "a total of 142 Iraqis were killed or found dead Tuesday, in what appeared to be a renewed campaign of Sunni insurgent violence against Shiite targets. The sharp uptick in deadly attacks coincided with the release of UN figures that showed an average of 94 civilians died each day in sectarian bloodshed in 2006." The AP (1/17, Gamel), New York Times (1/17, Cave, 1.16M) and Washington Post (1/17, A1, Partlow, 690K) run similar reports.

Four More US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. ABC World News (1/16, story 2, :10, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "The US military announced the deaths of four US soldiers yesterday in northwestern Iraq."

UN Report Says 34,000 Iraqis Were Killed In Violence In 2006. The New York Times (1/17, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports, "The United Nations reported Tuesday that more than 34,000 Iraqis were killed in violence last year, a figure that represents the first comprehensive annual count of civilian deaths and a vivid measure of the failure of the Iraqi government and American military to provide security." The report was "the first attempt at hand-counting individual deaths for an entire year. It was compiled using reports from morgues, hospitals and municipal authorities across Iraq, and was nearly three times higher than an estimate for 2006 compiled from Iraqi ministry tallies by The Associated Press earlier this month."

Rice Seeks Arab Support For Bush Iraq Plan. NBC Nightly News (1/16, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Today Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice continued her efforts in the Persian Gulf region to sell this new strategy for Iraq. She met with Arab leaders in Kuwait and came out with a key victory today." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Condoleezza Rice won a critical endorsement today: The backing of the Sunni Arab world for [President] Bush's plan to prop up Iraq's Shi'a government. The exploding crisis got them to issue an unprecedented joint statement."

In contrast to NBC's positive portrayal of the Arab countries' support for Bush's plan, most print coverage describes the final communiqué as mixed and "tepid." The Washington Post (1/17, A13, Kessler, 690K), for example, says the Arab diplomats offered "only tepid support for President Bush's new plan," while in an analysis, the AP (1/17, Gearan) says the "carefully worded encouragement that Arab allies are offering for…Bush's new Iraq strategy belies deep suspicion among the United States' few real friends in the region that Iraq may already be a lost cause." Secretary Rice "has made sales calls the past several days in Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait," but has received "polite versions of a blunt message: Good luck with that." Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal was "the most upbeat, but his doubts were obvious," as he pinned "success squarely on the Iraq government, saying there is only so much that any outsider can do." Meanwhile, Rice's trip began with an emphasis on rejuvenating the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, but the move was "widely portrayed in the Arab press as simply an attempt to change the subject."

The New York Times (1/17, Shanker, 1.16M) also says that "one of Washington's staunchest partners in the region, Saudi Arabia, indicated deep concerns about whether the Shiite-led government in Baghdad had the capacity and will to halt sectarian violence and protect Sunni Arabs." The Arab diplomats gathered in Kuwait issued a statement that "welcomed the commitment" of the United States to stabilizing Iraq, "but made no commitments to help stabilize or rebuild the country." For her part, Rice "acknowledged the legitimacy of those worries within powerful Sunni-majority states," saying, "After all the years of deep grievance in the region, within Iraq, it's not surprising that that's the case." But at the same time, Rice stressed that each of the Middle Eastern leaders with whom she has met "wants to give this a chance," adding, "That's the position of people in the region, and there is, in fact, a burden on the Iraqi government to perform."

The Washington Times (1/17, Kralev, 88K) calls Arab governments "skeptical" and says they are "not prepared to fully back the proposal" because of its reliance on al-Maliki's performance.

However, the AP (1/17, Gearan) reports that after meeting Tuesday with diplomats from Persian Gulf countries, Rice told reporters, "There is, I think, very good support for the American commitment there, very good support for the objectives the president wants to achieve." Rice "acknowledged the doubts," however, saying that plan "requires now that everybody fulfills the obligations of the plan, particularly that the Iraqis have to carry through on their obligations." However, the AP notes that "many in the Arab world profoundly distrust [Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri] al-Maliki's government, believing it is serving Iran's interests at the expense of Sunnis." Similarly, USA Today (1/17, 10A, Slavin, 2.27M) says the diplomats "voiced support" for President Bush's plan, while Rice "acknowledged, however, that Sunni Arab leaders in the region worry" that the Maliki government "will not deliver on its promises to treat Sunnis fairly and stop the spiraling violence in Baghdad."

The Financial Times (1/17, England) says that "although Arab officials have questioned Washington's emphasis on a military, rather than political, solution, they have also been arguing against an abrupt US withdrawal, fearing it would exacerbate Iraq's civil conflict and destabilise the region."

Communiqué's Apparent Rebuke Doesn't Mention Iran By Name. AFP (1/17, Lanteaume) notes that during Tuesday's meeting, Rice and her "eight Arab counterparts called on Iran not to meddle in Iraq's affairs," Kuwait's foreign minister said. A joint communiqué did not mention Iran by name but said that relations among countries "should be based on mutual respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity of all states, and on the principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of other nations."

NBC Nightly News (1/16, 2:00, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported that Rice "wanted a united stand against Iran, but Arab leaders refused to condemn Iran by name for its support of Iraqi insurgents." Still, the Los Angeles Times (1/17, Richter, 850K) says the joint statement marked "a small step in US efforts to win regional support for pacifying Iraq and resisting Iranian influence."

Similarly, the Washington Post (1/17, A13, Kessler, 690K) says the Arab diplomats issued "a veiled warning to Iran," but the statement was written "in diplomatic jargon and did not mention Iran by name or even cite concerns about Iran's nuclear program." The Post notes that since September, Rice has "prodded the eight nations…to create an informal group to discuss regional issues. Arab officials have said privately they are reluctant participants in the meetings, in part because they are wary of being perceived as an anti-Iran alliance."

Rice Says Diplomacy Not "Dealmaking." The Washington Post (1/17, A17, Kessler, 690K) notes that during an exchange with reporters in Kuwait Tuesday, Secretary Rice "was asked if there were any moments in Arab history, as opposed to European history, that informed her thinking, such as Britain's occupation of Mesopotamia, Britain's experience in Egypt or France's experience in Algeria." The question "spurred Rice to give a six-minute philosophical lecture on her view of diplomatic history." Diplomacy, she said, "is not dealmaking." The Post publishes excerpts from her comments.

NYTimes Urges Bush To Identify Timelines In Iraq. The New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) editorializes, "None of Mr. Bush's ideas -- his plan to send more American soldiers to fight alongside Iraqi units in Baghdad, his program for jump-starting the Iraqi economy, his hope of reconciling rival sectarian communities and heading off civil war -- can possibly succeed without the full cooperation of the Iraqi government. Yet in the days following Mr. Bush's address, as in the days before, Mr. Maliki has demonstrated how far his own goals diverge from America's best interests or any reasonable path for containing Iraq's civil war. ... Unless President Bush insists that Mr. Maliki accept specific and enforceable policy benchmarks and timelines -- starting with the disarming of sectarian militias -- the United States will remain hostage to the Iraqi prime minister and his radical Shiite agenda."

WPost Says "New" Mideast Policy "Betrays" Bush's Freedom Agenda. The Washington Post (1/17, 690K) editorializes that Secretary of State Rice "is trying to solidify an alliance of 'the mainstream' against Iran and in support of U.S. policy in Iraq. ... The new strategy explains a series of reversals of US policy that otherwise would be baffling. ... The administration has decided to seek $98 million in funding for Palestinian security forces -- the same forces it rightly condemned in the past as hopelessly corrupt and compromised by involvement in terrorism. ... [Another beneficiary] is Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, a thuggish autocrat who was on the wrong side of Ms. Rice's previous Mideast divide ... The attempt to divide the Middle East into two opposing camps is nevertheless wrongheaded and dangerous. ... Finally the new US policy betrays President Bush's freedom agenda, giving a free pass to dictators who support the new geopolitical cause."

Ahmadinejad Seeks Saudi Cooperation On Iraq. The AP (1/17, Youssef) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday that he sent a message to Saudi King Abdullah "proposing that they cooperate in helping stabilize Iraq." In an interview with Saudi television, Ahmadinejad said, "We, Saudis and other neighboring countries can help the Iraqi people to take the lead to consolidate their government's capability to stabilize and maintain security in their country." While the AP says Iran's "overture to Saudi Arabia appeared to be an attempt to counter American efforts to rally its allies in the region and isolate Tehran, the Financial Times (1/17, England) notes Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal Tuesday "played down suggestions that his government had been asked to ease tensions between Washington and Tehran." After meetings with his Arab counterparts in Kuwait, Faisal said, "There is no need for mediation. Our relations with the United States are long standing...Iran is a neighbour of Saudi Arabia, so obviously we hope to avoid any conflict."

US Sending Second Carrier To Mideast. The AP (1/17, Krane) reports the deployment of the USS John C. Stennis to the Middle East "will put two US aircraft carriers in the Persian Gulf region for the first time since the 2003 Iraq invasion, in a clear response to Iran's aggressive posture in the region." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said Monday that Iran and other US adversaries believe the US is vulnerable in Iraq, where the Pentagon is preparing to send more than 20,000 additional troops as part of a new security plan that envisions a crackdown on Iranian-backed militias." However, a second US carrier will "significantly boost US air power in the region and serve to remind Iran of American firepower."

Iran Buys Army Gear In Pentagon Sale. The AP (1/17, Theimer) reports, "Fighter jet parts and other sensitive US military gear seized from front companies for Iran and brokers for China have been traced in criminal cases to a surprising source: the Pentagon." In one case, federal investigators said, "contraband purchased in Defense Department surplus auctions was delivered to Iran." In that instance, a Pakistani arms broker "convicted of exporting US missile parts to Iran resumed business after his release from prison," purchasing "Chinook helicopter engine parts for Iran from a US company that had bought them in a Pentagon surplus sale."

French Visit To Tehran Cancelled. The New York Times (1/17, Sciolino, 1.16M) reports, "At a time when most world powers have forged a united front against Iran because of its nuclear program," French President Jacques Chirac "arranged to send his foreign minister to Tehran to talk about a side issue, then abruptly canceled the visit earlier this month in embarrassing failure." Chirac's "troubles stemmed from his deep desire to help resolve the crisis in Lebanon before his term runs out in May." To that end, he "decided to seek the support of Iran, which, along with Syria, backs the radical Shiite organization Hezbollah," three senior French officials said in describing the effort.

Sauerbrey Says US Mulling Options To Help Displaced Iraqis. The New York Times (1/17, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "Senate lawmakers sharply criticized the Bush administration on Tuesday for failing to provide refuge in the United States for the most vulnerable of the Iraqis fleeing the violence at home. The United Nations estimates that two million Iraqis have fled the country and that 1.7 million are currently displaced within the country. Of those, roughly 500,000 have been displaced since February, with roughly 40,000 to 50,000 more fleeing their homes each month. Among them are Iraqis who have been threatened or attacked for working with American troops and companies." In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Ellen Sauerbrey, "an assistant secretary of state, acknowledged that only 466 Iraqis had been admitted as refugees since the American invasion of Iraq in 2003. She said that expanding the resettlement of vulnerable Iraqis in the United States was 'a top priority.'" Sauerbrey "said the State Department was considering several options, including offering the Iraqis refugee or other special status, and expediting the processing of Iraqi religious minorities and of refugees who have worked for the American government." The "bipartisan panel of senators called for prompt action."

The Washington Times (1/17, Ward, 88K) reports Sauerbrey "said the refugee crisis began to develop in February, when the bombing of a prominent Shi'ite mosque in the city of Samarra heightened sectarian fighting. 'I came into my position just about exactly a year ago, and at that time, we were touting the fact that repatriation was so successful because most of the resources that we were sending at that time were to return people. And a very large number of Iraqis were returning to Iraq,' Mrs. Sauerbrey said."

The Washington Post (1/17, A4, Tyson, 690K) notes the US "has allowed only 466 Iraqis to immigrate under refugee status since 2003 -- including 202 out of 70,000 slots for refugees last year -- in part because of…stringent security screenings, officials said at a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee. … 'We should not repeat the tragic and immoral mistake from the Vietnam era and leave friends without a refuge and subject to violent reprisals,' said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the committee's chairman."

The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Gaouette, 850K) says the situation is "drawing comparisons to the refugee problem created after the Vietnam War," and reports "lawmakers framed the issue as one of moral obligation, strategic prudence and opportunity -- particularly to reopen contacts with Syria, where about 500,000 Iraqis have sought refuge, according to UNHCR. … 'We have a special obligation to keep faith with the Iraqis who have bravely worked for us -- and have often paid a terrible price for it -- by providing them with safe refuge in the US,' said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the immigration subcommittee."

Boxer-Rice Exchange Triggers Debate. The AP (1/17, Noveck) reports, "However one interprets Sen. Barbara Boxer's remark last week to Condoleezza Rice that the secretary of state, single and childless, doesn't have a 'personal price' to pay in Iraq, the brief exchange still has people debating." The reference to Rice's personal status was "an instant catalyst for vigorous chatter on blogs, TV and talk radio." Rice herself later told Fox News: "I thought single women had come further than that." Also on Fox News, White House spokesman Tony Snow called Boxer's remark "a great leap backward for feminism."

US Indicts Former UN Oil-For-Food Chief On Bribery Charges. The AP (1/17, Neumeister) reports former UN oil-for-food chief Benon Sevan "was charged Tuesday with bribery and conspiracy to commit wire fraud for allegedly accepting $160,000 to illegally influence the $64 billion program." Sevan "countered through his lawyer that he was a political scapegoat and had accounted for every penny as he successfully ran the largest humanitarian program in U.N. history, helping to save 'tens of thousands of innocent people from death by disease and starvation.'" The AP notes, "U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said the United States has lodged warrants for the arrest of both men with Interpol and will seek their arrest and extradition to the United States. … FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon said the indictment brings to 14 the number of individuals charged in the case and 'strikes at the heart of the corruption that pervaded the oil-for-food program.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A6, 2.04M) runs a truncated version of the AP story, and the New York Times (1/17, Preston, 1.16M) reports Sevan "was accused together with Ephraim Nadler…of taking illegal commissions from an Egyptian oil trader in exchange for helping him secure contracts to purchase Iraqi oil." The Washington Times (1/17, Pisik, Seper, 88K) notes Mershon said, "As executive director of the program and undersecretary-general of the U.N., Benon Sevan was responsible for maintaining the program's probity and propriety. Instead, his administration of the program was marked by profiteering and profligacy."

The Washington Post (1/17, A13, Lynch, 690K) reports, "Federal authorities announced the indictment as the new U.N. secretary general, Ban Ki Moon, traveled to Washington yesterday to shore up U.N. relations with the United States. Ban told a gathering of Washington Post executives, editors and reporters that he has 'a strong and firm commitment' to raise the United Nations to the 'highest level of ethical standards.'"

Escaped Ex-Iraqi Minister Back In Chicago. The Chicago Tribune (1/17, Madhani, 617K) reports, "After spending four months in an Iraqi prison and pulling off an audacious jail break, Aiham Alsammarae flew quietly back into Chicago and was behind the desk of his Downers Grove engineering firm Tuesday. In an hour-long interview, the former Iraqi electricity minister who is still wanted on corruption charges in his native Iraq gave new details of his escape." The Tribune adds, "The dramatic jailbreak included a high-speed run to Baghdad International Airport, a private jet that flew him out of the country and back-channel talks with Iraqi politicians. The Iraqi judge overseeing the case expressed surprise that Alsammarae had turned up in Chicago and vowed to take 'all legal measures' to return him to Iraq." Alsammarae "said he has reached out to officials in the US attorney's office in Chicago and Washington who have assured him, he says, that they are not interested in sending him back to Iraq. A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago declined to comment."

Gates Says Taliban Attacks Rising In Afghanistan. The New York Times (1/17, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "Attacks by militants crossing into Afghanistan from Pakistan have tripled since September along portions of the border, a senior American intelligence official said Tuesday, prompting calls for a greater effort by Pakistan to curb the influx and a larger deployment of American and other NATO soldiers here. Of particular concern, officials said, has been a rise in attacks by Taliban and other militants from remote and largely ungoverned tribal areas in Pakistan in eastern Afghanistan, where most of the American combat forces in the country are based." After meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai Tuesday, Defense Secretary Robert Gates told reporters, "The border area is a problem," warning that "Al Qaeda networks operating across the border."

The Washington Post (1/17, A10, Constable, 690K) says Gates added "his voice to a chorus of US and international officials who have begun taking Pakistan to task for harboring Islamic insurgents." Gates praised Pakistan as a "strong American ally in the war on terror," but he also said there was a "problem" in Pakistan's border areas and that "al-Qaeda networks are operating on the Pakistan side." He said that the United States needed to "work with Pakistan" to reduce the violence and attacks emanating from within its borders. The Washington Times (1/17, Sands, 88K) runs a similar story.

In a report on Gates' visit, the CBS Evening News (1/16, story 6, 1:00 Couric, 7.66M) broadcasted, "US officials blame Pakistan for providing the Taliban and al Qaeda safe haven. Pakistan denies it, and today announced it carried out a missile attack on suspected hideouts. But sources tell CBS News, the attack was carried out by the US, which allowed Pakistan to take credit."

US Commanders In Afghanistan Want More Money, Not Troops. CBS Evening News (1/16, story 7, :50, Assuras, 7.66M) reported last night that Gates "said more US troops may be sent to the region if commanders ask for them." But the Wall Street Journal (1/17, A6, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports from Kabul, "As the Bush administration presses for a surge of US troops in Iraq, military officials in Afghanistan are proposing a surge of their own. Instead of troops, U.S. commanders here, hoping to counter a sharp rise in attacks by Taliban forces, are seeking as much as $6 billion to build roads and speed development of the Afghan army and police forces." The request "comes as the US has quietly increased the size of its force here to about 24,000 soldiers, the highest level yet. Dim prospects for getting substantially more troops are forcing commanders here to take an approach dramatically different from that in Iraq, where the US plans to surge to a force of about 150,000 soldiers focused largely on Baghdad." A "military official" said, "We are talking about a major infusion of money to get things going where they need to go."

Pakistani Strike Against Taliban Coincides With Gates Trip. Reports this morning speculate on whether the Pakistani shelling of the Taliban was intended to coincide with Secretary Gates' trip. The Financial Times (1/17, Bokhari, Dombey) reports, "Pakistan said on Tuesday it had attacked Taliban and al-Qaeda positions in an airstrike that coincided with a visit to Afghanistan by Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary. The attack, in the south Waziristan region, near the Afghan border, comes amid mounting western concerns that Nato's struggle against the Taliban cannot be won without greater co-operation from Islamabad. ... Some diplomats argue that Pakistan is the biggest problem in the Afghanistan conflict ... Pakistan rejects such claims but has stepped up its activities along the border." The Times adds, "The attack came the morning after Mr Gates arrived in Afghanistan, prompting speculation that it was intended to signal Pakistan's commitment in the battle against the Taliban and al-Qaeda. But on Tuesday US officials said Taliban fighters had exploited a peace deal with the Pakistan government last year in north Waziristan to increase attacks in Afghanistan."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/17, Montero, 59K) reports, "For the second time in a week, the Pakistan Army has rained missiles on suspected militant targets, seeming to confirm in deeds what it has denied in words: That a controversial peace deal with Islamic militants has turned Pakistan's tribal belt into a sanctuary for attacks against Afghanistan. ... A peace deal signed with Taliban-linked militants in September of last year, the government said, was supposed to bring peace. Now Pakistani officials appear to be contradicting themselves by targeting the very same militants they were supposed to have appeased." The Monitor adds, "The timing prompted some observers to speculate whether the attacks were meant as a demonstration of Pakistan's continued cooperation in the face of a growing chorus of criticism from US and NATO officials. Pakistani government officials, for their part, rejected suggestions that the airstrikes were anything other than conventional military strategy."

Contractor Profits May Surge As Pentagon Reloads. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Karp, 2.04M) reports, "Defense contractors have enjoyed surging profits in recent years as the government spent heavily to fight wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and combat terrorism in other parts of the world. Recently, some investors have worried that ballooning federal deficits could bring the flush times to an end. But with the makers of warplanes, tanks and battlefield technology expected to report strong fourth-quarter results beginning next week, the latest Pentagon plans suggest that the long-expected spending plateau is still another year away. ... Major defense companies are expected to meet or exceed their quarterly targets, given that federal funds spent to buy and develop weapons in the October-to-December quarter rose 19% from the year-earlier period. ... Record Iraq war funding is likely to boost previously issued conservative profit outlooks for 2007 as well."

Psychologist Says Navy Faces PTSD Crisis. USA Today (1/17, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports, "An experienced Navy psychologist warns that the U.S. military does not have enough mental health professionals to meet the growing number of emotionally damaged war veterans." Cmdr. Mark Russell "says, many of the mental health professionals on staff lack formal training in core therapies for post-traumatic stress syndrome. Russell predicts a 'perfect storm' of dire health care consequences." He "has been speaking out for three years that the U.S. military faces a mental health crisis in the treatment of its combat veterans." Officials "downplay Russell's grim assessment, noting that training is increasing, aggressive mental health programs are being created, and civilian mental health professionals are being hired to provide additional resources."

DOJ:

Lawmakers Concerned About More US Attorney Departures. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Marosi) reports, "The top federal prosecutors in San Diego and San Francisco announced their resignations Tuesday as critics charged the Bush administration with forcing out a growing number of U.S. attorneys without cause." The Times continues, "The U.S. attorneys in San Diego and San Francisco, Carol Lam and Kevin V. Ryan, respectively, did not comment on whether they had been forced to resign. Lam said she would step down Feb. 15; Ryan did not name a date." The Times adds, "Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., in a Senate speech Tuesday, said at least five other U.S. attorneys have been forced to resign without explanation. She accused the Bush administration of trying to circumvent Senate confirmation of their replacements. … Such appointments were subject to Senate review until last year when the Patriot Act was reauthorized with a provision that allowed the U.S. attorney general to appoint longer-term, interim replacements without Senate approval. … The departures, Feinstein said, come at a sensitive time when federal prosecutors are pursuing political corruption cases. … 'The U.S. attorney's job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions, or, worse, any appearance of undue influence,' Feinstein said." The Times notes, "A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, said senators would be consulted before the nomination of replacements, as has been the routine since the law was changed. … 'It is inconceivable for a member of Congress to believe that use of an appointment authority to fill a vacancy is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process,' Roehrkasse said."

The AP (1/17, Kellman) reports, "Senate Democrats want to take away Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' power to replace U.S. attorneys who fall out of favor and return that authority to federal district judges." The AP continues, "Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California and Mark Pryor of Arkansas complained Tuesday that the White House is using an obscure provision in the newly reauthorized USA Patriot Act to reward Republican political allies with jobs as federal prosecutors. … 'The Bush administration is pushing out U.S. attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements,' Feinstein said. … 'It appears that the administration has chosen to use this provision, which was intended to help protect our nation, to circumvent the transparent constitutional Senate confirmation process to reward political allies,' Pryor said in the joint Democratic statement." The AP adds, "Not true, Gonzales told The Associated Press. … 'We are fully committed to ensuring that with respect to every position we have a Senate-confirmed, presidentially appointed U.S. attorney,' Gonzales told editors and reporters during an interview Tuesday. … 'We in no way politicize these decisions,' he added. … U.S. District Court judges, Gonzales said, tend to appoint friends and others not properly qualified to be prosecutors. … Better that judges do the hiring than the White House, say Democrats, who have introduced legislation to return the appointment process to the courts." The AP notes, "The subject is headed for a public airing Thursday when Gonzales appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee for its first oversight hearing of his department since the Democrats took control of Congress. … At issue is whether the administration is using an obscure provision in the terrorism-fighting USA Patriot Act to oust federal prosecutors and replace them for the duration of the Bush administration with White House allies."

The New York Times (1/17, Johnston) reports, "Justice Department officials said Tuesday that Ms. Lam's dismissal had nothing to do with the prosecution of Mr. Cunningham, Republican of California, but was based on her overall record in prosecuting firearms violations and crimes along the California border with Mexico." The Times adds, "Representative Darrell Issa, a Republican from San Diego County who has criticized Ms. Lam's record on illegal immigration, called the Cunningham prosecution 'a credit to her leadership and her office' in a statement on Tuesday, but repeated his call for border enforcement and said her replacement 'will bring new ideas and new strategies that will benefit our area.'" The Times adds, "It is not clear how many United States attorneys are being forced out. Ms. Feinstein said the number was 5 to 10; Justice Department officials said the number was lower but would not provide a specific number. … The Justice Department sent a letter defending its actions on Tuesday to Ms. Feinstein and Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, chairman of the Judiciary Committee. 'That on occasion in an organization as large as the Justice Department some United States attorneys are removed or are asked or encouraged to resign, should come as no surprise,' the letter said. It added that no action had been taken against United States attorneys 'to retaliate against them or interfere with or inappropriately influence a particular investigation, criminal prosecution or civil case.' … Ms. Feinstein said in her statement that she knew of seven United States attorneys who had been dismissed without cause."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/16, Soto) reports, "A national political storm is brewing over the departures of several top prosecutors, including San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam. … Sources told The San Diego Union-Tribune that superiors in the Justice Department are unhappy with decreased prosecutions for gun and immigration violations." The Union-Tribune continues, "With reports yesterday that the Department of Justice has demanded the resignation of another top prosecutor, in Las Vegas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled this week to answer questions from skeptical senators. … Democratic lawmakers have criticized the recent departures from the ranks of top federal prosecutors as worrisome. … 'We have no idea why this is happening,' Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, said in a statement last week. 'The attorney general could have a legitimate reason for asking for specific resignations, or this could be motivated by political concerns or worse, derailing ongoing investigations.'" The Union-Tribune notes,

"Both U.S. senators from Nevada said this weekend that U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden had been asked to step down, according to a report published yesterday in the Las Vegas Review-Journal. … Outgoing New Mexico U.S. Attorney David Iglesias also said he was asked to resign, but without explanation. … Other U.S. Attorneys who recently announced they are leaving include John McKay in Seattle and Paul Charlton in Phoenix. Neither has said he was pushed out; McKay said he would 'be returning to the private sector' while Charlton said he was leaving to join a law firm."

The Hill (1/17, McCormack) reports, "Rumor has it that Lam has other cases in which members of Congress have been subpoenaed, Feinstein said. … But she admitted to knowing little of the circumstances surrounding Lam's departure. 'The only explanation I've seen are concerns that were expressed about prioritizing public corruption cases over smuggling and gun cases,' the senator said." The Hill adds, "U.S. Attorney H.E. Bud Cummins, of Little Rock, Ark., recently was replaced by Timothy Griffin, a former White House lawyer who has worked for the Republican National Committee. … Feinstein today plans to question U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the issue at a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee. … However, the DoJ upheld its process, saying that Senate confirmation was a top priority. … 'We are fully committed and it is in our best interest to have a U.S. attorney that is confirmed by the Senate,' DoJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said."

The San Jose Mercury News (1/17, Mintz) reports, "U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan has notified his staff that he is leaving amid reports that he and six other federal prosecutors are being forced out by the Bush Administration." The News continues, "Ryan has been the administration's point person for the Justice Department in Northern California since 2002. … Ryan sent an e-mail to his staff today notifying them that he is leaving, saying 'for some months now I have been considering the possibility of pursuing other challenges for a variety of personal and professional reasons.' The e-mail did not specify the date that Ryan is leaving, just stating that 'it is a good time for me to move on.'" The News adds, "Former prosecutors under Ryan say they've been told he has been asked to leave his post under the cloud of an internal Justice Department probe of his leadership of the 90-plus lawyer office. But most lawyers say Ryan's departure will have little impact on the big ticket cases he has been pursuing, including the Apple stock options probe and Balco. … 'I don't think there's much of a hiccup in terms of already filed cases from one U.S. attorney to another,' said a former federal prosecutor who asked not to be identified. … Ryan's tenure has been marked by internal chaos and controversy within his office balanced against his lead role in some of the nation's most high-profile federal prosecutions, including the Balco steroid scandal, the stock options backdating probe and, more recently, his decision to pursue the Hewlett-Packard spying scandal. … Rumors that Ryan might be planning to resign have circulated within his office for months, particularly since the Justice Department sent a team of auditors to the Bay Area last fall to interview current and former prosecutors about his management. Whether Ryan resigned or was asked to resign, his status has been on shaky ground as a result of a constant stream of criticism from current and former prosecutors who've questioned his insular leadership style."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/17, Soto) reports, "U.S. Attorney Carol Lam announced Tuesday that she is resigning effective Feb. 15. … 'It has been both a great honor and a great privilege to have served the nation and the Southern District of California as United States attorney for the past 4½ years,' she said in a statement. … 'The dedication shown by the men and women of the U.S. Attorney's Office can be seen every day in the important cases they prosecute, including cases relating to terrorism, immigration, narcotics, public corruption, and fraud.'" The Union-Tribune continues, "The San Diego Union-Tribune reported on Friday that Lam was asked to resign because of decreasing prosecutions in gun and immigration matters. … In her statement issued midafternoon Tuesday, Lam did not address whether she was asked to resign. … Lam prosecuted former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, a Republican, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy and tax evasion charges."

The North County (CA) Times (1/17, Bennett) reports, "In a Tuesday phone interview from his Washington office, U.S. Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Vista, said Lam was asked to step down. … Issa declined to name the source of the information, but said 'it was a high-ranking administration official involved in the decision process.'" The Times adds, "For years, Issa has been critical of Lam for what he said was her failure to more aggressively prosecute illegal-immigrant smugglers. … 'And I have had one-on-one conversations with Ms. Lam, urging her to be more aware of the policy priority that the president has given,' he said, referring to Bush's promises to secure the nation's borders. … In an October 2005 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, for example, Issa blasted Lam's office for failing to prosecute two cases of smugglers who were repeat offenders. In the letter, Issa called her failure to do so the result of 'lax prosecutorial standard.' … On Tuesday, Issa said that Lam, who was appointed to the post by President Bush in 2002, had done a good job in prosecuting white-collar crime and commended her for her successful investigation of the now-imprisoned former 50th District Congressman and conservative Republican Randy 'Duke' Cunningham. … Issa said it would be too strong to say that he was instrumental in Lam's resignation."

KNSD-TV, San Diego, CA (1/16, 4:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney Carol Lam is resigning effective February 5th. It's believed the office of US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asked her to leave the job. Late last week, stories surfaced that Lam and several other US Attorneys had been asked to step down. Democratic Senator Dianne Feinstein's office claims the requests were made by the Republican Administration for political reasons."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former CA Counsel Sentenced To Two Years. The Long Island Newsday (1/17, Wagner, Bernstein) reports, "Choking back tears, former Computer Associates chief counsel Steve Woghin apologized in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn Tuesday for his role in a $2.2 billion accounting scandal at the company before he was sentenced to a two-year jail term." Newsday continues, "Woghin, who pleaded guilty in September 2004 to securities fraud conspiracy and obstruction of justice charges, faced U.S. District Court Judge I. Leo Glasser and said in an emotional voice that he was sorry for the role he had played in the scandal that toppled most of the company's top management, including chief executive officer Sanjay Kumar, who also plead guilty and is to begin serving a 12 year jail sentence next month." Newsday adds, "The Islandia-based company, one of the country's largest manufacturers of software for large banks, insurance companies and airlines, is now known as CA Inc. … Woghin said his part in the affair was 'not a legacy I would like to leave... It was not for personal gain or hubris,' he added, choking back tears as about 15 of his friends and relatives looked on in the courtroom. … In addition to the two-year prison sentence, Woghin was also sentenced to three years supervised release and a fine to be determined at a later date. … Woghin worked at the U.S. Justice Department for 10 years before joining CA in 1992. He was charged with overseeing a team of CA lawyers who 'routinely' drafted software licensing contracts with clients after a quarter had closed and with drafting at least one of the contracts himself. He stepped down from CA in May 2004."

The Wall Street Journal (1/17, C8) reports, "At a hearing in federal court in Brooklyn, U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser also sentenced Mr. Woghin to three years of supervised release, said Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn. … Mr. Woghin pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit securities fraud and obstruction of justice in 2004. Several former executives at the company formerly known as Computer Associates, including onetime Chief Executive Sanjay Kumar, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges in the matter."

Former Refco Head Added To Fraud Case. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, C5, Bray) reports, "Refco Inc.'s former president was indicted on securities fraud and other charges in connection with an alleged scheme to hide hundreds of millions of dollars in trading losses by Refco and its customers from the investing public, prosecutors said." The Journal continues, "The U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan said Tone Grant, 62 years old, has been charged with conspiracy, securities fraud, bank fraud, wire fraud and money laundering. Mr. Grant, of Chicago, is the latest former Refco executive to be charged in the matter. He was the company's president from 1997 to June 1998 and at times held a significant ownership interest in the firm." The Journal adds, "Phillip Bennett, Refco's former chief executive, and Robert Trosten, the commodities broker's former chief financial officer, are already facing criminal charges in the matter. … The superseding indictment adds additional charges of bank fraud and money laundering against Messrs. Bennett and Trosten and wire fraud against Mr. Bennett. … Mr. Bennett, of Gladstone, N.J., previously has been charged with conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud, making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission and making material misstatements to auditors. Mr. Trosten, of Sarasota, Fla., previously had been charged with conspiracy, securities fraud and wire fraud."

Unraveling Case Against Former Westar CEO May Help Him With Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Smith) reports, "The effective unraveling of government efforts to prosecute former Westar Energy Inc. Chief Executive David C. Wittig has given new life to his hope of getting the company to pay him millions of dollars he claims to be owed under an employment agreement." The Journal continues, "Earlier this month, a federal appeals court in Topeka, Kan., vacated Mr. Wittig's convictions in a 2003 indictment springing largely from personal use of corporate aircraft. … Late last week, attorneys for the former Westar chief, who has been in prison in Minnesota for a year, asked a federal court in Topeka to order their client released, arguing there is 'no lawful basis for ... continued imprisonment.'" The Journal adds, "What happens next in the civil and criminal cases will have direct bearing on Mr. Wittig's and the Kansas utility's finances. The company has reserved more than $73 million to cover any adverse decisions. Westar's total potential exposure for legal costs and employment issues related to Mr. Wittig and a onetime subordinate, former Westar Vice President Douglas Lake, is about $94 million. … The company had argued in an arbitration proceeding that it doesn't owe Mr. Wittig severance payments called for under his employment contract because he was let go 'for cause.' … In a separate civil dispute in Topeka federal court, Westar has argued it must pay only 'reasonable' attorney fees and has disagreed with the men about what's reasonable. … To date, the utility has paid $8.4 million of legal expenses for Mr. Witting and co-defendant Mr.

Lake, who also was convicted. Westar has declined to pay $12 million more in legal costs."

Former Cendant Chairman To Be Sentenced Today. USA Today (1/17, 3B, Farrell) reports, "The final chapter in one of the longest-running sagas of corporate crime is scheduled to conclude today in a Connecticut courtroom." USA continues, "Walter Forbes, the blue-blooded former chairman of Cendant, is due to be sentenced in Bridgeport, Conn., for his role in a $252 million accounting fraud that was exposed nearly a decade ago. … At the time, the Cendant fraud was the largest on record, and its exposure in April 1998 wiped out $14 billion of the company's market capitalization, nearly half its total, in a single day." USA adds, "Since then, Cendant's scandal has been eclipsed in magnitude by accounting meltdowns at Enron and WorldCom. The CEOs who presided over those companies were convicted of spawning those frauds and given stiff jail sentences, 24 years for Jeff Skilling of Enron and 25 years for Bernie Ebbers of WorldCom. … Forbes' sentence probably will be lighter, but when he stands in front of U.S. District Judge Alan Nevas, he still faces a stretch of more than 10 years. That was the jail term given his top lieutenant, Kirk Shelton, who was convicted two years ago of participating in the same fraud." USA notes, "The reason Forbes might get only half of what Skilling and Ebbers got is that his timing was better. The accounting fraud that occurred at Forbes' company (which was known as CUC International before a merger transformed it into Cendant), took place from 1995 to 1997. That was several years before a harsh new set of mandatory sentencing guidelines was adopted by Congress. … Skilling and Ebbers committed their misdeeds after the new guidelines went into effect. … Still, for Forbes, who was born into an affluent family in Rockford, Ill., attended Harvard Business School and became one of the leading proponents of shopping by computer in the 1990s, any sentence north of 10 years will secure him a place in what has become an infamous group of former CEOs convicted of felonies."

Federal Regulators Examining Commerce Bank's Real Estate Deals With Executives. The New York Times (1/17, Bajaj) reports, "Commerce Bancorp, which calls itself 'America's most convenient bank,' rattled investors yesterday after it disclosed that federal regulators were investigating the bank's real estate deals with executives." The Times continues, "Shares of Commerce fell 8.3 percent, or $2.89, to $31.83, after the bank said the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve were conducting an inquiry." The Times adds, "Commerce has become one of the fastest-growing banks in the nation, thanks in part to its extended branch hours, and has made an aggressive and successful push into New York's crowded banking market. … Commerce, based in Cherry Hill, N.J., said, 'The scope of the investigation will include but not be limited to transactions with its officers, directors and related parties, including transactions involving bank premises.'" The Times adds, "Investors were unnerved by the announcement, in large part, because 'it was so vague,' said Meredith Whitney, an analyst with CIBC World Markets. 'It could be the lightest offense or it could be the most severe offense.'" The Times notes, "Bank executives declined to answer questions about the investigation on a conference call with analysts and reporters yesterday. Commerce said it had appointed a committee of independent board members to oversee the investigation. … Critics have long complained about the bank's business ties with firms that are either owned or controlled by Commerce's chairman and president, Vernon W. Hill II, and his wife, Shirley Hill."

Senate Proposal Would Target Deferred Executive Pay. The Washington Post (1/17, D1, Montgomery, Birnbaum, 690K) reports the Senate Finance Committee "is considering a proposal to sharply limit the earnings corporate executives and other highly paid employees can place tax-free into deferred compensation plans, one of the most popular executive benefits in corporate America." The proposal would permit "an individual taxpayer" to "defer no more than $1 million annually in compensation, beginning this year. The shift in tax policy would be likely to affect top executives at hundreds of corporations and would raise taxes on some of the nation's wealthiest workers by an estimated $806 million over 10 years." The proposal "tracks rhetoric that some Democrats employed during the midterm elections, when they portrayed the Republicans who controlled Congress as being too close to special interests and the wealthy."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Forming Strategy To Curb Increase In Violent Crime. McClatchy Newspapers (1/17, Gordon, Taylor) reports, "Bush administration officials are scrambling to demonstrate that they're addressing sharp jumps in violent crime in some cities, in an attempt to reclaim a traditionally Republican issue amid criticism from some Democrats, mayors and police chiefs." McClatchy continues, "Senior Justice Department officials sought Tuesday to highlight the administration's multipronged programs for combating growing gang violence and outbreaks of juvenile crime. The renewed emphasis comes as some experts, as well as politicians, cite federal cuts in city and state law enforcement funding as a possible contributor to spikes in murders, robberies and assaults in medium-sized cities." McClatchy adds, "While criminal justice experts stress that the jumps in crime over the last 18 months in cities such as Charlotte, N.C.; Cleveland, Ohio; Memphis, Tenn.; Minneapolis and Sacramento, Calif., may not represent a long-term upswing, they're watching to see if President Bush proposes more anti-crime funding in his State of the Union Address next week. … Chuck Wexler, who heads a think tank for police departments across the country that has monitored crime trends in cities, said the data over the last 18 months suggest that the crime surge 'isn't a statistical aberration.' … After 14 years of declines in crime, police in some communities began to report double-digit increases. That left the administration vulnerable to criticism because the crime jumps came after the White House instigated $1 billion in cuts in anti-crime funding since 2001 as it shifted its focus to the war on terrorism. … Among the casualties was a Clinton administration program to hire 100,000 police officers." McClatchy notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that federal anti-crime funding has never made up more than 4 percent of total state and local law enforcement spending nationwide. … Other researchers agree that the reasons for the rise in crime are more complicated than money, and they vary from city to city. They point to factors such as increasing gun-, gang- and drug-related violence; growing juvenile crime; a deep hopelessness among poor, young black men; and an upsurge in prison releases after years of record numbers of incarcerations. … The rise in gang activity, in particular, has drawn the attention of the Justice Department and the FBI. At a briefing Tuesday, Alice Fisher, chief of the department's Criminal Division, Assistant FBI Director Chip Burrus and two other officials described efforts to crack down on gangs, especially national and international gangs, such as the Salvadoran la Mara Salvatrucha, also known as MS-13."

DOJ Helping Georgia Community Deal With Violence. WALB-TV, NBC 10, Albany, GA (1/17) reports from Moultrie, GA, "Representatives from the U.S. Department of Justice came to Moultrie Tuesday to listen to complaints from citizens upset over a fatal police shooting." WALB-TV continues, "The Justice Department held a community forum after Hispanic crimes escalated last year in Colquitt County. In the wake of the recent Willie Banks shooting, the justice department was called in again. … They met with community groups Tuesday afternoon to discuss how the community as a whole can better respond when shootings and violence like those acts occur."

New Orleans Searches For Answers To Rising Crime. The AP (1/17, Foster) reports, "They came by the thousands last week, carrying signs and pictures of the dead and demanding action. … A bloody murder spree that opened the year by littering the city with nine bodies in 10 days galvanized residents from across the city's neighborhoods and class lines." The AP continues, "The dramatic march against crime in New Orleans echoed the outcry that grew in the mid-1990s from the slayings in the French Quarter that became known as the Pizza Kitchen killings. People took to the streets then and public officials developed concrete plans to attack a murder problem that left more than 400 people a year dead. … But in the post-Katrina environment, the decision-makers have many issues to cope with, and a major difference is the lack of a solid plan by either Mayor Ray Nagin or the police department to stem the violence, said criminologist and University of New Orleans professor Peter Scharf." The AP adds, "Mayor Ray Nagin and police superintendent Warren Riley outlined a plan to stop the violence earlier in the week. It included shuffling police officers from administrative jobs and using deputies from the jail to beef up patrols, speeding up delivery of murder cases to the district attorney, stopping cars on the streets between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m., when most of the murders take place."

Jury Selection Begins In Libby Trial. The New York Times (1/17, Lewis, 1.16M) reports the "perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. began Tuesday with his lawyers trying to eliminate as jurors anyone who might have strongly negative feelings about the Bush administration in general and Vice President Dick Cheney in particular." Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, "is facing five felony counts charging that he lied to F.B.I. agents and to a grand jury investigating who leaked the name of a Central Intelligence Agency operative and why." The "first day of jury selection on Tuesday went slowly, with only nine potential jurors interviewed. Two of them were excused by Judge Walton after they made it clear they were critics of the administration and Mr. Cheney." Libby's lawyers, "Theodore V. Wells and William H. Jeffress Jr., also explored whether potential jurors were open to one of their main lines of argument: that if Mr. Libby gave incorrect answers to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the grand jury, it could have been a simple case of faulty memory."

The CBS Evening News (1/16, story 6, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Jury selection began today in the trial of the only person indicted in connection with the CIA leak investigation, Scooter Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby is not charged with leaking the name of CIA agent Valerie Plame, but with lying to Federal agents investigating the case. If convicted, Libby could get 30 years in prison."

NBC Nightly News (1/16, story 5, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, Libby "has said he learned of Plame's identity from NBC News' Washington bureau chief, Tim Russert who says that is not true. Russert is expected by the way to be a key witness at the trial."

The Washington Post (1/17, A3, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) reports defense lawyers are "carefully scrutinizing potential jurors for strong opinions about the Bush administration, the war in Iraq and the fallibility of human memory." Judge Walton "dismissed three of the nine potential jurors interviewed. Two were released after expressing strong feelings about the Bush administration." The "difficulty of finding 12 jurors and four alternates became apparent as jury selection began. Walton started by asking prospective jurors 38 pre-screening questions, telling them the inquiry would help determine whether they had 'certain sympathies or prejudices' that could interfere with their responsibility to be impartial."

The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "Libby's lawyers signaled Tuesday that even though the case was about perjury and obstruction, they were concerned that strong feelings among the jurors about the war — and whether President Bush misled the public about it — could influence their verdict. Two potential jurors were dismissed after expressing strongly negative feelings about administration officials." The questioning 'about the Bush administration and the Iraq war drew repeated objections from prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who said that the defense lawyers were engaged in 'an open-ended Rorschach test,' alluding to the famous ink-blot test in which people are believed to project their feelings onto ambiguous stimuli."

The Washington Post (1/17, A17, Goldstein, 690K) reports Judge Walton "read aloud 38 questions that lawyers for both sides had agreed on to help screen potential jurors. They included mundane questions about whether potential members of the jury panel knew the people involved in the case, had ever been a victim or perpetrator of a crime, had read news about Libby's alleged crime. And then there were four intriguing questions exploring potential jurors' beliefs about human memory." The four questions include, "Is there anyone who believes that it is impossible for a person to mistakenly believe that he or she was told something by one person when in fact the person was actually told the information by someone totally different several months earlier?"

Charges Against Libby Seen As "Paradoxical." The New York Times (1/17, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "paradox seems to define" Libby, "who remains a bit mysterious even to close colleagues. He is the White House policy enforcer who also wrote a literary novel; a buttoned-down Washington lawyer who likes knocking back tequila shots in cowboy bars and hurtling down mountains on skis and bikes; and a 56-year-old intellectual known to all by his childhood nickname, Scooter." But "now comes the most baffling paradox of all." By "all accounts a first-rate legal mind and a hypercautious aide whose discretion frustrated reporters, he is charged with repeatedly lying to a grand jury and to the F.B.I. about his leaks to the news media in the battle over Iraq war intelligence."

Background Checks Of Jurors Becoming More Common. The Legal Times (1/17, Schwartz) reports, "The case involved the largest single drug bust in D.C. history, and after eight weeks of trial, the last thing a defense attorney wanted to hear was concerns about the jury. … But just after closing statements in a drug-conspiracy trial last month at the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Judge Ellen Huvelle thought there could be a problem. … Only then had she run the jurors' names through criminal-background checks. The system flagged four jurors -- something none of them had disclosed during jury selection." The Times continues, "Had they lied? Or were the data -- run by the FBI and notoriously unreliable -- incorrect? … The question was hardly incidental. Last year, Chicago-based U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer dismissed two jurors during deliberations in the corruption trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, after the Chicago Tribune found that they had concealed their arrest records during jury selection. Ryan is free on bail while an appeals court looks at whether the jury problems merit a reversal." The Times adds, "The Ryan case drew attention across the legal world. Convicted felons are barred from serving on federal juries. But most courts rely on individual jurors to tell the court about any convictions, rather than run criminal-background checks on the jury pool. Indeed, the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, which oversees the federal judicial system, keeps no data on which courts run background checks. … But that may be changing. At the upcoming trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby Jr., Judge Reggie Walton will check the criminal backgrounds of potential jurors before lawyers make their final selections. The move comes at the request of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, who specifically noted the Ryan incident during a recent court hearing."

More Commentary. Investor's Business Daily (1/17) editorializes, "Like the Duke lacrosse players, Scooter Libby faces jail for alleged involvement in a crime that was never committed, pursued by a vindictive prosecutor. And also like the Duke case, it's a national disgrace." IBD continues, "If lying to law enforcement, officers of the court or Congress warrants jail time, then both Bill Clinton and Sandy Berger might still be writing their memoirs in Leavenworth. For that's what Libby is charged with -- lying to investigators. Not stuffing secret documents in his pants, not even outing a secret agent, but simply having a recollection that is different from reporters of what he said when and to whom." IBD adds, "Like District Attorney Michael Nifong in the Duke case, Fitzgerald knew early that he had no real crime and no real criminal. But he had to come up with something. So he charged with lying someone who in his job got hundreds of phone calls every day and talked to dozens of reporters because his memory of earlier conversations differed with those reporters' notes. … Duke lacrosse players still twist in the wind, as does Libby, who stands accused of lying about a crime that never occurred in an investigation that never should have happened. Justice should be blind, not those administering it. That's the real crime in both cases."

Prosecution Of Hackers Often Hindered By Legal Codes. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A8, Bryan-Low) reports, "As police around the world become more skilled at tracking down criminals who spread computer viruses, they are realizing there are some bugs in their own system: hurdles to trying their cases in court." The Journal continues, "The problems lie in both building cases and securing stiff sentences, say legal and security experts. Prosecutors can have a hard time explaining the complex crimes to the courts. It often is difficult for law enforcers to quantify the damage caused by a virus that infects computer networks. And judges often hand down light sentences to the culprits, who typically are young, first-time offenders, among other factors. … 'The main obstacle in any complex computer-crime case is convincing a judge or a jury about the seriousness of the case,' says Arif Alikhan, a former federal prosecutor in Los Angeles. 'It's a lot harder than a bank robbery or other crimes.'" The Journal adds, "As a result, some countries -- including the U.S., United Kingdom and Germany -- are reviewing their laws. The British Parliament in November passed the Police and Justice Act which, among other things, updates the country's cybercrime laws by raising the maximum prison penalty for unauthorized access to a computer to two years from six months. It also seeks to plug a loophole by criminalizing so-called denial-of-service attacks, by which one party attempts to knock another party's computer system offline by bombarding it with data via the Internet. Perpetrators now face as many as 10 years in prison; previously, such cases typically were prosecuted for unauthorized modification of a computer, which carries a maximum five-year sentence. … In the U.S., legislation proposed last year advocated raising the maximum sentence for most computer crimes to 30 years in prison. Current penalties for computer crimes vary and generally reach up to 20 years in prison."

DOJ Manuel Helps Local Police In Cybercrime Probes. CNET News (1/17, McCullagh) reports, "Police trying to learn how to use the Internet to investigate everything from cyberstalking to spam and illegal hacking have some new advice, thanks to the U.S. Department of Justice." CNET continues, "The department's Office of Justice Programs on Tuesday published what amounts to a manual for tech-challenged gumshoes, covering everything from how to track suspects through an Internet Relay Chat network to targeting copyright thieves on peer-to-peer networks." CNET adds, "Local and state law enforcement have bungled some high-tech investigations recently. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court rejected prosecutors' attempts to seize newspaper reporters' hard drives, and the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that police illegally seized a computer in a methamphetamine investigation. A federal judge permitted an Internet service provider to sue police after it was raided because of Usenet posts its employees knew nothing about. … The new 137-page manual appears to represent the Justice Department's attempt to offer at least some basic technical and legal tips to law enforcement agencies that may not have computer experts on the payroll."

Two Neteller Founders Arrested On Illegal Gambling Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/17, Neumeister) reports, "Two founders of a company that processes Internet gambling transactions were arrested and charged with funneling billions of dollars in gambling proceeds to overseas betting operations, federal prosecutors announced Tuesday. The charges mark the latest in a series of crackdowns by the federal government against the online gambling industry." US Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement yesterday that former Neteller PLC directors John David Lefebvre and Stephen Eric Lawrence "knew when they took their company public that its activities were illegal. FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon said the multibillion-dollar online gambling industry is 'a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business.'" The Daily Independent (1/17, Attwood) also notes "Mershon said that the multibillion-dollar online gambling industry was 'a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business.'" The Times of London (1/17, Doran) adds, "The pair were arrested on Monday after an FBI sting operation discovered that Neteller was being used to allow Americans to place illegal bets on sporting events via internet gambling companies based in foreign countries."

The Financial Times (1/17, Wilson, Smith, Warwick-Ching, Pimlott) reports, "The US attorney's office in the southern district of New York said the men, who are Canadian, had been charged with conspiring to transfer funds with the intent to promote illegal gambling." Garcia "said the arrested men 'knew when they took their company public that its activities, as well as those of the internet gambling companies it assisted, were illegal in the US'." The FT notes, "Simon Holliday, partner at Global Betting and Gaming Consultants, said: 'It could mean anyone . . . ever . . . involved in the online gambling industry faces the possibility of arrest if they travel to the US.'"

The New York Daily News (1/17, Zambito) reports, "In recent months, the Justice Department has used money laundering laws to charge two offshore gambling operations. And in 2003, Pay-Pal and parent company eBay forfeited $10 million to settle a lawsuit, that claimed t the company aided illegal online gambling activities."

Arrests "Bode Ill" For Other Internet Gambling Sites. BusinessWeek (1/17, Holahan) reports that the arrests "demonstrate how far the U.S. government is prepared to take its crackdown on gambling, and they bode ill for the closely held Internet gambling sites that continue to cater to U.S. clients even after October. 'In the eyes of the U.S. Justice Dept., what Neteller is doing is even worse [than the gaming companies] because they are acting like a bank and helping all this money leave U.S. accounts,' says Christopher Costigan, president of the online gaming industry publication Gambling911.com, which initially reported the arrests. He speculates that Neteller will withdraw from the U.S. market." BusinessWeek adds, "Even if Neteller chooses to leave the U.S. market, however, it would not spell the end for all gambling companies. … Indeed, several U.S. land-based casinos have expressed interest in starting their own online poker sites that would be regulated by U.S. law, in a sign that not all hope is lost for the cause of U.S. online gambling."

Tennessee Lawmaker Seeks Dismissal Of Fraud Charges. The AP (1/17) reports, "Indicted state Sen. Jerry Cooper contends in court filings aimed at getting his federal mail fraud, bank fraud and conspiracy case dismissed that law enforcement officials coached grand jury witnesses. Cooper, D-Morrison, is accused of using a fraudulent appraisal and political influence to help an Alabama businessman get a loan from a bank co-owned by then-Lt. Gov. John Wilder in a borrowing scheme involving the 1999 sale of Cooper's lumber mill in Warren County." Cooper lawyer Jerry Summers "has requested government evidence that he believes is grounds for dismissing the charges because of prosecutorial misconduct, court records show."

Federal Investigators Examining Defunct Pirro Jewelry Business. The AP (1/17, Fitzgerald) reports, "The federal investigation of former Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro has branched out to include the jewelry business she set up while she was in office, a Pirro spokesman said Tuesday. The spokesman, Pirro family friend Michael Edelman, said agents have begun questioning some of the people who bought the bead jewelry she made several years ago in what he said was an attempt to raise money for charity. … He said he did not know specifically what interested the investigators, but he said Pirro was cooperating and had turned over all requested records." The AP adds, "Edelman said Pirro's stab at the jewelry business 'was a flop.'"

Potential Coke Formula Theft Trial Jurors Complete Questionnaires. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/17, Weber) reports, "One hundred potential jurors filed into a federal courtroom Tuesday for the start of the conspiracy trial of a former Coca-Cola secretary accused of stealing trade secrets from the world's largest beverage maker in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi. The potential jurors answered questions from U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester about whether they work for or have relatives who work for Atlanta-based Coca-Cola, then filled out a questionnaire drafted by the lawyers in the case and were sent home for the day." The AP notes, "The questionnaire also asks potential jurors what magazines and newspapers they read, what television shows they watch regularly, whether they own Coca-Cola stock and what they know about this case."

Philadelphia Strip Club Owners To Surrender To FBI Today. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/17, Sullivan, 385K) reports Philadelphia strip club owners Kevin Rankin and Bishop Krabsz "agreed to turn themselves in to authorities this morning to face federal charges that they sought to avoid paying more than $300,000 in federal taxes, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office and a defendant's attorney. The case grew out of the federal corruption probe into convicted City Councilman Rick Mariano," who "was sentenced last summer to 61/2 years in prison for taking bribes to help navigate tax and regulatory issues. At some point during the two-year investigation, agents thought Mariano had an interest in the club, but he did not, court documents say." Rankin lawyer Chris Warren "questioned prosecutors' motive for going after his client. … 'They went after them because they thought Mariano was involved, then for guns, and now, for tax evasion,' Warren said. … Warren said Rankin and Krabsz would surrender to the FBI this morning."

Comptroller Of Currency, Fed Investigating Commerce Bancorp. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/17, Brubaker, 385K) reports, "Shares in Commerce Bancorp Inc. fell more than 8 percent yesterday after the Cherry Hill company said it was under investigation by federal banking regulators. The Office of the Comptroller of Currency and the Federal Reserve are looking into the company's transactions with directors, officers and related parties, 'including deals involving banking premises,' Commerce said deep in its fourth-quarter earnings report." The Inquirer notes, "Commerce is no stranger to federal investigations, having been caught up in Philadelphia's pay-to-play scandal starting in June 2004. … Also, in the summer of 2005, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said the FBI had seized Commerce records to determine whether the bank had given municipal officials in the suburbs preferential treatment to win government business. But the company said Nov. 1 that it was no longer being investigated."

Two Arrested In Separate California Child Porn Cases. The Los Angeles Times (1/14, 850K) reported, "Authorities have announced arrests in separate child molestation and child pornography cases, one involving a website bulletin board used to trade illicit images of minors.

Jeffrey Blaine Hall, 51, subscribed to 'North American Man Girl Love Assn.' website, where he downloaded and posted child pornography, a federal criminal complaint alleges. Authorities announced the arrest Friday. … In the second case, a Lancaster man was facing dozens of felony counts in state court after being accused of repeatedly molesting and taking explicit photographs of a young girl in his neighborhood. Christopher Jarold Hoff, 41, also could face federal charges based on evidence seized from four home computers. Authorities also took dozens of movies and computer discs."

Federal Prosecutors Say Ryan Trial Judge Was Fair. The AP (1/17, Robinson) reports, "The judge who presided over former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial took "superlative care" to see that the proceedings were fair, prosecutors told a federal appeals court Tuesday." The AP continues, "In a 97-page response to Ryan's appeal, the government said U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer had worked hard and effectively to see that the former governor got a fair trial, and succeeded in doing so. … 'During these proceedings, Judge Pallmeyer expressed no fewer than 12 times her view that the defendants' right to a fair trial was paramount and that, if fairness could not be achieved, she would not hesitate to declare a mistrial and start the trial over, despite the amount of time that had gone into the trial,' prosecutors said." The AP adds, "Ryan, 72, was convicted in April along with longtime friend Larry Warner of racketeering and other offenses. … Ryan was accused of steering lucrative state leases and contracts to Warner and other cronies and receiving rewards ranging from vacations in Jamaica to a free golf bag. He also was accused of using state money and workers to operate his campaigns and burying an investigation of bribes paid in exchange for drivers licenses when he was secretary of state. … Ryan still maintains nothing he did was illegal. His appeal focuses heavily on the dismissal of two jurors, Evelyn Ezell and Robert Pavlick, who were found to have omitted mention on a pre-trial questionnaire of their encounters with police. … Pallmeyer replaced them with alternates after the jury already had deliberated eight times. But she did not replace other jurors when it was discovered that they too had brushes with the law on their records."

SCOTUS Signals Backing For Insurers On Credit-Reporting Law. Bloomberg (1/17, Stohr) reports, "U.S. Supreme Court justices signaled they may limit the duty of insurance companies to tell consumers about flaws in their credit histories, questioning a ruling that insurers say would open them to billions of dollars in damages." Bloomberg continues, "More than half the court's nine members today in Washington voiced support for arguments by Safeco Corp. and Berkshire Hathaway Inc.'s Geico Corp. The insurance companies are fighting class-action lawsuits by consumers who sought price quotes, weren't offered the lowest rates and now say they should have been told the insurer relied on their less-than-perfect credit histories. A federal appeals court let the case go forward." Bloomberg adds, "Several justices questioned whether Congress intended for the Fair Credit Reporting Act to require notification of every consumer who doesn't get the best rate. Justice Stephen Breyer said an Internet search he conducted indicated that only 1 percent of Americans have the highest possible credit score. … 'There will be tens of millions of these notices going out,' Breyer told Scott A. Shorr, the lawyer for the consumers. Breyer predicted the notices 'will become meaningless' to consumers and most will go 'right in the wastebasket.'" Bloomberg notes, "Justice Antonin Scalia was even more blunt in questioning a Justice Department lawyer who offered partial support for the consumers' position. … 'I find it hard to shoehorn your case into that language,' Scalia told the government lawyer, Patricia A. Millett."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Demurs On Probe Of Duke Lacrosse Prosecutor. The AP (1/17) reports, "Officials from the Department of Justice have told a North Carolina congressman that it's too early to launch a federal investigation into the handling of the Duke lacrosse case, a spokeswoman said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Rep. Walter Jones wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last month, asking that the Department of Justice investigate whether the district attorney prosecuting three Duke lacrosse players charged with sexual assault has violated the athletes' civil rights." The AP adds, "The department's Office of Legislative Affairs responded last week that it was premature to initiate a federal investigation while criminal charges and other investigations at the state level are ongoing, said Cynthia J. Magnuson, a Department of Justice spokeswoman. … Jones' spokeswoman Kathleen Joyce said Tuesday that the congressman still planned to meet next week with the head of the department's Civil Rights Division. … 'He doesn't consider the letter received as a final response,' Joyce said. 'He's still pushing forward.'" The AP notes, "In the letter to Gonzales, Jones asked that the conduct of Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong be reviewed. … Nifong turned the case over to state Attorney General Roy Cooper last week. The North Carolina State Bar has filed ethics charges accusing Nifong of making misleading and inflammatory comments about the lacrosse team. … Cooper's office took possession of all the files in the lacrosse case late Tuesday afternoon." WITN-TV, NBC 7, Greenville, NC (1/17) also reports this story.

FNC Studio B with Shepard Smith (1/16, 3:41 p.m.) broadcasted, "Mike Nifong, officials from the Department of Justice have apparently told a North Carolina Congressman that it's too early to launch a Federal investigation in to the handling of the Duke Lacrosse case. A representative wrote the Attorney General last month, asking that the Department of Justice investigate whether the District Attorney prosecuting the lacrosse players have violated the athletes' civil rights. Alberto Gonzales says not yet. But Jones' spokesperson says he does not consider the letter as a final response and he is still, at this moment, at least, pushing forward. Too early, because all fed oversight is based on the trial." There are many local broadcasts of this story in Raleigh and Durham, NC. An example is: WNCN-TV, Raleigh, Durham, NC (1/16, 11:00 p.m.).

DOJ Ends Probe Of Santa Clara County Juvenile Hall. The San Jose Mercury News (1/17, Ostrom) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has closed its three-year investigation into allegations of abuse and excessive force at Santa Clara County juvenile hall." The News continues, "The department wrote in a letter, dated Tuesday, to Board of Supervisors Chairman Don Gage that after reviewing updated policies -- which give youth offenders due process when they file complaints or are disciplined for misbehavior and include improving the reporting of child abuse – 'the county has satisfactorily addressed the deficiencies identified over the course of our investigation.'" The News adds, "In September, the department had signaled that the county was on the right track, pending final review of the new policies. … The Justice Department also praised the county for working hard to resolve the original complaints and in the letter said the county is 'dedicated to providing the appropriate care for youth in their custody.' … The original abuse investigation, launched in early 2003, led to sweeping changes and dramatic reductions in use of force at juvenile hall and created more independent oversight."

Mississippi Student Seeks Federal Charges Against Officer After Scuffle. The AP (1/17, Mohr) reports, "A lawsuit seeking damages from a Greenwood (MS) police officer and others after school security cameras captured the officer twice drawing his weapon on a teenager in front of classmates has been doubled to $2 million." The AP continues, "Carlos Moore, the attorney for 18-year-old James Marshall, had earlier sought $1 million in damages after obtaining the school videotapes that show a portion of the Dec. 6 encounter between the white officer, Casey Wiggins, and the unarmed black teenager." The AP adds, "The case has sparked accusations of racism and calls for Wiggins' dismissal. Wiggins' attorney says the officer did 'nothing wrong.' … Moore obtained copies of the tapes on Jan. 5, after filing a motion with the court. The tapes show Wiggins, who was on a security detail at the predominantly black school, twice pointing his gun at Marshall - once in a crowded school hall - before putting the teen in a choke hold." The AP notes, "The Mississippi chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union on Monday issued statement supporting legal action 'in seeking justice for the Marshall family.' … Moore also filed a federal criminal complaint this week with the U.S Justice Department, accusing Wiggins of violating Marshall's civil rights with excessive force and false arrest under the color of law. … State charges had already been filed in the case, but Moore said those were only misdemeanor simple assault charges and did not fit the crime. The federal charges are felonies."

Delaware Family Demands Answers In Inmate Death. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (1/17, Williams) reports, "Family members of the 24-year-old Dover man who was found dead in the state's newest prison infirmary last week are demanding answers about the death, and getting nothing but silence from the Department of Correction." The Journal continues, "Demetrius Caldwell had been undergoing unspecified treatment for a month in the prison infirmary at the Delaware Correctional Center in Smyrna before he was found dead, laying on a mattress on the floor of his cell. … A medical staffer had checked on him 25 minutes before he died." The Journal adds, "The Department of Correction has released Caldwell's body to his family, who plan to bury him Saturday, but they have not told them what caused the young man's death. … Prison officials ruled out meningococcal meningitis as the cause of death late last week, after naming it as a possibility. They've said doctors from the prison's medical provider, St. Louis-based Correctional Medical Services, the Department of Correction, Public Health and the Medical Examiner's Office are still trying to determine a cause of death." The Journal notes, "Last month, the U.S. Justice Department found 'substantial civil rights violations' in four Delaware prisons. The federal investigation was prompted by a series of articles in The News Journal that revealed inadequate health care and questionable treatment within the prisons."

Texas District Challenges DOJ Voting Oversight. The Legal Times (1/16, Schwartz) reports, "The small utility district on the outskirts of Austin, Texas, had a simple wish: to move its polling place from a residence to a school. … It may have been simple, but it wasn't easy. The move needed approval from the Justice Department in Washington." The Times continues, "As it happens, the Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District No. 1 (population 3,500) is one of the areas of the country required by federal law to get permission from the government before making any changes to its voting rules. … Now the utility district — with the help of some conservative legal firepower — has decided to mount the most significant assault on the Voting Rights Act in a quarter of a century." The Times adds, "The case, filed last year in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, argues that the federal government's oversight of local voting rules is unconstitutional. And it was selected and prepared with one goal in mind, to get the issue before the Supreme Court. Unsurprisingly, it's drawing attention from civil-rights groups, who fear the wolf is at the door. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, for instance, has hired former Clinton administration solicitor general Seth Waxman to fend off the challenge. … The suit targets the section of the act — which Congress overwhelmingly voted to reauthorize last summer — that requires certain counties and states to seek federal approval before making changes to their voting rules. Known as 'pre-clearance,' the section was one of the ways the federal government prevented Southern states from continuing to discriminate against African-Americans after the landmark civil-rights legislation passed in 1965. … But the federal government only oversees certain states and counties, the ones that most egregiously suppressed minority voting during the 1964 election. The jurisdictions under such federal authority have remained virtually unchanged, except for a few additions in the 1970s."

Push Continues To Save Convicted Border Agents From Jail. Fox News (1/17) reports, "Two Texas Border Patrol agents who shot a Mexican drug runner in the backside on the U.S. side of the border are hoping a last-ditch pardon from President Bush will save them from serving more than a decade in prison." Fox continues, "Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean are scheduled to turn themselves in to authorities Wednesday to begin serving 11 and 12 years, respectively, for the February 2005 non-fatal shooting. … Several groups, including Friends of the Border Patrol, The Minutemen and Grassfire.org, have been trying through petitions to keep the agents out of prison — through either a motion to U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone to allow them to remain free on bond during an appeal or through a presidential pardon from Bush. About a dozen rallies took place across the country in support of the agents last week." Fox adds, "Several lawmakers, including Reps. Ted Poe, R-Texas; Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif.; Walter Jones, R-N.C.; Tom Tancredo, R-Colo.; and Duncan Hunter, R-Calif. last week sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to allow Ramos and Compean to remain free on bond pending the appeal of their convictions. … Petitions with more than 225,000 signatures will be delivered to the White House Tuesday afternoon, Poe told FOX News. … Earlier this month, a letter circulated by Poe and signed by 24 lawmakers requested that the Justice Department not oppose a motion filed to allow the men to remain free pending the appeal. … But Poe said he hasn't heard much from the Oval Office. … 'We have been getting some information from low-level members of the attorney general's office,' he said. 'The White House has not contacted us directly, even though we corresponded with them several times and have called. I'm a little concerned about that.'"

High Court Rules For IBM In Pension Case. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Anderson, 2.04M) reports, "The US Supreme Court let stand a lower court ruling that said International Business Machines Corp.'s switch to a cash-balance pension plan didn't discriminate against older workers, ending a lawsuit that could have cost the company $1.4 billion." The Supreme Court's decision "adds additional certainty to the legality of corporate shifts from defined-benefit pensions to so-called cash-balance retirement plans." Congress "last year also clarified the legality of the plans, but the IBM case could have bearing on a number of corporate retirement plans altered prior to the June 29, 2005 effective date in the legislation."

The New York Times (1/17, Walsh, 1.16M) reports the decision "saves I.B.M. a significant amount of money." But "it resolves almost nothing for the many other companies that made similar changes to their own pension plans."

The AP (1/17, Rugaber) reports, "In the pension case, a former IBM employee named Kathi Cooper served as the lead plaintiff in a class action suit brought on behalf of 250,000 current and former IBM workers. The suit argued that IBM's "cash balance" pension plan was discriminatory because it allowed younger workers to accrue benefits in the plan at a faster rate than older workers. … IBM switched to a cash balance plan in 1999. Such plans provide workers with individual accounts that can be cashed out when they leave the company and are intended to appeal to younger workers who are more likely to switch jobs." The AP notes, "The IBM case has been closely watched, as roughly 1,500 companies have adopted cash-balance plans. The company earlier agreed to settle the case for $1.4 billion if it lost in the courts. … But the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, based in Chicago, sided with IBM in August, ruling that the 'terms of IBM's plan are age-neutral.' … In addition, Congress passed legislation, also in August, that clarified that cash-balance plans complied with the age discrimination provisions of ERISA, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act."

Two Freed In Probe Of LA Girl's Killing. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Winton, Abdollah) reports, "A few days after a bullet from a gang shooting tore into an Angelino Heights home last month, killing a 9-year-old girl, police announced with much fanfare that they had arrested the two gunmen. … But the suspects — Cesar Zamora, 23, and Steven Castanon, 20 — are now out of jail and back in their old neighborhood, to the dismay of residents who held candlelight vigils to memorialize Charupha Wongwisetsiri." The Times continues, "Police released the men without filing charges after determining that Zamora or Castanon fired the shot that killed Charupha in self-defense when a rival gang member pulled up in a car and tried to shoot them in front of their apartment complex next to Charupha's home. … The situation has shaken and angered residents of Angelino Heights, a diverse neighborhood with commanding views of downtown Los Angeles. The area includes rows of grand Victorian houses restored by television writers and downtown office workers side-by-side with apartments housing working-class families." The Times adds, "Legal experts said the circumstances of the shooting would make it difficult to build a murder case against Zamora and Castanon. … According to police, the men were sitting outside an apartment on East Kensington Road when a car pulled up. One man got out, walked onto the apartment property and pulled out a gun. Witnesses said he tried to shoot but his gun apparently jammed, according to law enforcement sources. … Zamora and Castanon pulled guns of their own and fired several times. None of the shots hit the gunman, who fled in the car. But one bullet traveled down the street and into Charupha's home." The Times notes, "The issue of self-defense in gang shootings in which bystanders are killed or wounded has been a matter of debate for years in Los Angeles. … In 2003, a mother decorating her Christmas tree in South Los Angeles was killed by a stray bullet fired during a gun battle between two gangs. … The LAPD eventually arrested the two suspects who fired the shots after someone in a passing car sprayed bullets in their direction. But prosecutors decided not to pursue the case, agreeing with investigators that the men apparently acted in self-defense."

LA Violence Fuels Racial Rivalry. The New York Times (1/17, Archibold) reports, "The Latino gang members were looking for a black person, any black person, to shoot, the police said, and they found one. Cheryl Green, perched near her scooter chatting with friends, was shot dead in a spray of bullets that left several other young people injured." The Times continues, "She was 14, an eighth grader who loved junk food and watching Court TV with her mother and had recently written a poem beginning: 'I am black and beautiful. I wonder how I will be living in the future.' … Cheryl's killing last month, which the police said followed a confrontation between the gang members and a black man, stands out in a wave of bias-related attacks and incidents in a city that promotes its diversity as much as frets over it." The Times adds, "Ethnic and racial tension comes to Los Angeles as regularly as the Santa Ana winds. Race-related fights afflict school campuses and jails, and two major riots, in 1965 and 1992, are hardly forgotten. But civil rights advocates say that the violence grew at an alarming rate last year, continuing a trend of more Latino versus black confrontations and prompting street demonstrations and long discussions on talk-radio programs and in community meetings. … Much of the violence springs from rivalries between black and Latino gangs, especially in neighborhoods where the black population has been declining and the Latino population surging. A 14 percent increase in gang crime last year, at a time when overall violent crime was down, has been attributed in good measure to the interracial conflict. … This month, the authorities reported that crimes in the city motivated by racial, religious or sexual orientation discrimination had increased 34 percent in 2005 over the previous year. Statistics for 2006 have not yet been compiled."

California Hate-Crime Trial Relies On Questionable Identification Tactic. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Mozingo) reports, "With closing arguments set to begin today, the case against 10 Long Beach youths accused of beating three white women Halloween night hinges almost entirely on identifications made in a Ralphs parking lot the night of the attack." The Times continues, "In a procedure known as a field show-up, police told the victims and a reputed witness that the youths — nine girls and a boy, ages 12 to 17 — were suspects and asked if they recognized them from the melee. In several subsequent police interviews, witnesses were never asked to pick the juveniles out of a lineup that included non-suspects: a means to test their memory that experts say is a standard and crucial procedure. Nor were they asked to identify them in open court." The Times adds, "Long Beach Police Cmdr. Jeffry Johnson said the field show-up is the most accurate form of identification in a case like this. 'Especially when you talk about numerous suspects, you have to go with immediate recollection,' he said. … But experts say field show-ups are inherently fallible and rarely used in isolation. … 'I can't remember ever seeing a case go to trial in which the only identification is a field show-up,' said Kathy Pezdek, a professor at Claremont Graduate University and expert witness in the area of eyewitness identification, in an interview. 'It's extremely unusual.'" The Times notes, "Much of what has occurred in the Long Beach courtroom of Judge Gibson W. Lee, however, is unusual. The mild-mannered jurist has let attorneys deliver long fiery speeches, make objection after objection that all but stopped the testimony and ignore his orders to stick to the facts of the case. … Deputy Dist. Atty. Andrea Bouas has accused the youths of having gang connections, of orchestrating the destruction of a witness' car, of calling the witness 'a stupid bitch' outside of court to intimidate her. None of Bouas' accusations are based on evidence in the case, and they normally would have been heard out of the presence of a jury. … But the Long Beach hate-crime case highlights a critical — and many experts say troublesome — difference between adult and juvenile court: There are no juries in juvenile court; a judge decides the minors' fate."

Attorney Sues Law Firm For Anti-Gay Bias. The New York Times (1/17, Creswell) reports, "An associate at one of the country's most prestigious law firms, Sullivan & Cromwell, filed a state lawsuit in Manhattan yesterday accusing the firm of a systematic campaign of discrimination and retaliation against him because of his sexual orientation." The Times continues, "Aaron B. Charney, 28, who is a fourth-year associate, asserts in the lawsuit, filed in New York State Supreme Court in Manhattan, that several partners in Sullivan & Cromwell's highly regarded mergers and acquisitions practice subjected him to 'lewd and illegal conduct,' beginning in the fall of 2005. He is seeking a jury trial and unspecified compensatory and punitive damages." The Times adds, "In his lawsuit, Mr. Charney accuses members of the firm of demanding he be terminated for carrying on an "unnatural" gay relationship with another Sullivan & Cromwell associate; Mr. Charney denies the relationship. The suit also contends that after he filed a formal internal complaint, members of the firm suggested that he move to a foreign office and then fabricated reviews to accuse him of overbilling clients, among other things. … While Mr. Charney has not been terminated, he says he was told he should not come to the office while an internal investigation is continuing." The Times notes, "In an e-mailed statement, the firm's chairman, H. Rodgin Cohen, said the firm "categorically denies Mr. Charney's allegations of discrimination and retaliation.' … Another of the firm's partners, David H. Braff, said that the firm had a strong culture of acceptance and that it had handled several landmark cases over the years that protected gay and lesbian rights."

Possible XM-Sirius Merger Would Face DOJ, FCC Hurdles. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A3, McBride, Schatz) reports, "With speculation on the upswing about a possible merger between satellite-radio rivals Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., the companies face a serious obstacle: Federal Communications Commission regulations that appear to specifically forbid a merger." The Journal continues, "Winning approval for any deal, from both the FCC and the Justice Department, may rest in persuading regulators that the two companies face many more competitors than just each other. Competing technologies that have helped damp satellite radio's growth -- like iPods, podcasts and Internet radio -- may give the companies ammunition to persuade regulators that a merger of the only two satellite-radio players isn't a threat to competition." The Journal adds, "Merger rumors involving the companies have surfaced periodically over the last year, stoked by Sirius officials like Chief Executive Mel Karmazin, who has said he would be interested in buying XM. Officials at XM typically dismissed the possibility. … But in recent weeks, XM has notably softened its stance. While XM still stops short of saying it is exploring a deal, it no longer rules out the possibility. That has given new life to hopes for a deal. Since the beginning of the year, XM's stock has risen almost 19% and Sirius's 17%. … An XM-Sirius merger is gaining more urgency in the industry as both companies struggle to win consumers. While both firms add new listeners each quarter, neither is reaching the lofty subscriber levels that were expected a few years ago. … The merger talk, to some, seems like a trial balloon intended to gauge the reaction of both investors and regulators. Such advance work may be necessary given that any deal would face significant hurdles." The Journal notes, "The companies would need to persuade the Justice Department that a merger wouldn't be anticompetitive, even though it would likely result in higher subscription rates and less consumer choice. The companies, however, say thinking about satellite radio on its own defines the options too narrowly."

Localities Can Be Burned With Risky Municipal Bond Swaps. Bloomberg (1/17, Braun) reports, "The third-poorest city in Pennsylvania is a lot poorer because of a 28-year bet on interest rates that already has gone awry." Bloomberg continues, "The Reading, Pennsylvania, school district, which has 18,323 students, this week must pay $230,000 to Deutsche Bank AG, Germany's largest bank, because it's on the losing side of a wager that long-term interest rates will rise faster than short- term interest rates. In April, the board rushed approval of the so-called interest rate swap in eight days after its adviser said the transaction may earn the district $16 million by 2034. … While Reading's taxpayers are liable for the loss, bankers and advisers already have pocketed $1 million in fees for arranging the swap, enough to buy 11 Mercedes-Benz S-550 sedans. This week's payment to Deutsche Bank would have covered the school district's monthly utility bill." Bloomberg adds, "Local governments from Augusta, Georgia, to Oakland, California, are being lured by similar opportunities to speculate with derivatives created by the world's biggest banks. Most of the $400 billion of private agreements sold to municipalities escape taxpayers' notice and are little understood by the public officials and administrators who approve them. …

While financial firms often promote the agreements as a way for municipalities to lock in borrowing costs for future projects, the swap bought by Reading amounts to a bet on the relationship between short-term and long-term interest rates. If long-term rates rise higher than short-term rates, the municipalities will profit from the agreement and vice-versa. … Reading, like most municipalities, borrows with long-term bonds. The most recent bond the school district sold in December 2005 has a final maturity of 2036. The interest-rate swaps that Reading and other borrowers are purchasing are typically matched to the maturities of bonds that have been issued. … The swap market is unregulated and trading occurs over the counter, so municipalities can't be sure they are getting the best price on contracts. In Jefferson County, Alabama, one of the tens of thousands of borrowers in the municipal bond market, officials have bought $5.8 billion of swaps. Officials there have received subpoenas from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission asking about the swaps. … The Internal Revenue Service has probed whether the mispricing of municipal swaps has allowed advisers and banks to make excessive fees, depriving the federal government of earnings from the investment of tax-exempt bond proceeds. The U.S. Justice Department and SEC have asked for information on swaps as part of an antitrust investigation into alleged bid- rigging in the $2.3 trillion municipal market."

Writer Weighs Proper Level Of Judicial Review Of Mergers. In an op-ed for the Deal (1/17), David T. Blonder, an associate in the antitrust practice in the Washington office of Chadbourne & Parke and formerly an attorney with the Antitrust Division of the United States Department of Justice, writes, "The controversy surrounding Judge Emmet Sullivan's review of the merger consent decrees entered into among Verizon Communications Inc., AT&T Corp. and the U.S. Department of Justice is shining the spotlight both on the boundaries of independent judicial review in assessing the impact of antitrust consent decrees on market competition, and on the implications of a more stringent evaluation of future mergers." Blonder continues, "Sullivan, of the U.S. District Court in Washington, has delayed a ruling on whether to grant his required approval of the SBC Communications Inc.-AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications-MCI Inc. mergers. The judge recently took umbrage at comments from a Verizon attorney who said that company's merger would not be undone by the court, and he vowed to finish his independent review. … Commentators claim that increased judicial scrutiny may alter how merging parties negotiate settlement agreements with the DOJ. If the prospect of settlement dims due to increased oversight, the parties' negotiating tactics may change, and the incentives for either side to make early concessions may be eliminated. This might further create a perception that the DOJ has to litigate cases even though a structural settlement is available to remedy competitive harm. … The facts, however, seem to belie the inference that settlements are less likely. Judicial review of the decrees that have followed the Tunney Act amendments suggests that Sullivan's role in these proceedings is anomalous to that of other courts. Since the amendments, courts, including the D.C. court, have approved at least eight merger settlement agreements. Of these, no court engaged in the type of review that Sullivan is contemplating." Blonder concludes, "The current judicial hullabaloo likely is limited to the confines of Judge Sullivan's courtroom. Only time, and possibly a decision from an appeals court, will tell whether Sullivan is ushering in a new era for merger settlement review or whether this exercise was simply much ado about nothing. This interested spectator thinks it will be the latter."

CVS Boosts Caremark Bid In Battle With Express Scripts. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A4, Berman) reports, "Challenging a rival bid from Express Scripts Inc., drugstore chain CVS Corp. bumped up its offer for pharmacy manager Caremark Rx Inc. by $2 a share, to be paid in the form of a dividend, while also agreeing to a large share buyback that would shrink the combined companies' shares about 10%." The Journal continues, "The moves ratcheted up the competitive dynamic between Express Scripts and CVS, which are battling for the allegiances of Caremark shareholders in an increasingly caustic battle of words and takeover tactics." The Journal adds, "The Express offer put CVS in an increasingly untenable position, particularly as it headed on the road to sell its deal to shareholders. The question now is how well the $2-a-share dividend -- coupled with a $5 billion share buyback -- will placate shareholders. … As recently as last year, Express and Caremark explored a deal of their own, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings. That deal never led to anything substantive, and at least by Express's reckoning, faltered primarily on valuation. … That undercuts Caremark's contention that the two would be unworthy partners because of antitrust concerns and strategic fit, said Express Chief Executive George Paz in an interview yesterday."

Bloomberg (1/17, Rapaport) reports, "Express Scripts' unsolicited offer was rejected last week by Caremark's board. Buying Caremark would make Express Scripts, based in Maryland Heights, Missouri, the largest manager of drug benefits in the U.S. CVS, based in Woonsocket, Rhode Island, wants Caremark to help give it more bargaining power in negotiating the price of medicines." Bloomberg continues, "Express Scripts on Jan. 3 asked U.S. antitrust regulators to approve both its proposed tender offer and its takeover bid, the company said in the filing. The deadline for the U.S. Federal Trade Commission to review these proposals is midnight Feb. 2, unless regulators extend the waiting period by seeking additional information, Express Scripts said. … Caremark may lose contracts that would generate more than $8 billion in revenue because of a threatened proxy fight, Caremark Chief Executive Officer Mac Crawford said Jan. 10 at a meeting with investors in San Francisco."

Market Watch (1/17, Moore) reports, "Express Scripts, which announced its intention to bid for Caremark in December, has said it would nominate four members to Caremark's board and has asked a Delaware court to void the $675 million breakup fee protecting the Caremark and CVS combination. … 'CVS remains in the driver's seat in this contest with this latest effort no more likely to succeed than the others that have preceded it,' Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel wrote in a note to clients. … Heinbockel said key factors are the spread between the two bids as well as antitrust approval and how combining with Caremark would transform the winner's business. The spread on the Express Scripts offer has narrowed from 16% to 7%, he said. … In other words, the bid by Express Scripts 'is no longer notably superior' to what CVS has offered, Heinbockel said."

Search Engines Use Spinoff Sites To Test New Features. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, D1, Vascellaro) reports, "Kevin McCarty, long a devout Google user, recently discovered a search engine he often finds more helpful. It's called SearchMash.com, and unlike Google and other major search sites, it pulls up video, images and text all at the same time. … It turns out, though, that SearchMash is Google. In recent months, the top search engine and its main rivals have stealthily set up a new generation of search engines where they try out new tools and features on consumers -- without putting their tried-and-true formulas at risk. If something proves to be a hit -- the combined search results that Mr. McCarty likes so much, for instance -- it could eventually be folded into the parent site. For now, though, these sites provide an entertaining and even useful glimpse into the evolution of Web, and in particular, search engines, which in their basic operation haven't changed much in years." The Journal continues, "Google Inc. launched SearchMash.com in September without the Google name, although it is mentioned in the site's privacy policy. SearchMash displays a subset of the normal Google search results in an entirely different interface with collapsible menus for video, blog and image results on the same screen. In December, IAC/InterActiveCorp.'s Ask.com launched Ask X, which chops up the results page into an unconventional three-panel format. Standard search results are flanked on the left by suggested terms to help you narrow or expand your search and, on the right, by results broken down by categories such as news and dictionary results." The Journal adds, "All of the leading search brands have operated their own internal test sites and labs for years. They frequently test layout and formatting tweaks on their main sites, often without users knowing. But now they are making their bold new ideas more public and asking users for feedback. Ask X links to a feedback form where users can submit random thoughts about the quality of the results."

Hackers Attack DVD Copy Protection. The New York Times (1/17, Stone) reports, "Last weekend, a loose-knit coalition of hackers around the world defeated the antipiracy software protecting several high-resolution movies in the HD DVD format. They then began distributing copies of the films…using BitTorrent, a popular file-sharing tool. … The move could send the technology companies behind the new wave of advanced DVDs scrambling back to the drawing board to improve their copy protection, and prompt Hollywood studios to rethink their alliances in the war between the HD DVD and Blu-ray formats." The Times continues, "The HD DVD standard is backed by Toshiba, Microsoft and Intel and uses copy protection technology known as the Advanced Access Content System. The rival Blu-ray format, supported by Sony, Hewlett-Packard and Dell, uses the same system but adds a level of software that acts as a backup when the first level is compromised, so it is considered to be slightly more secure. … The new intrusions came less than a month after a programmer calling himself Muslix64 announced in a Web forum that he had unraveled at least part of the HD DVD protection system. Muslix64 released free software that allows users to insert HD DVDs into their computers and make copies of those films without the original encryption. However, to make it work, users still needed a special title key, generated by the A.A.C.S. software, for each movie they were trying to copy." The Times adds, "Bill Rosenblatt, president of the consulting firm GiantSteps which specializes in content protection issues, said the intrusion was less of a crisis than the 1999 defeat of the encryption that protects standard DVDs, which allowed movie files to be freely copied and shared online. … However, some security experts said the intrusions were more serious. Bruce Schneier, the chief technology officer of the security company BT Counterpane, said it was unclear what effect revoking licenses would have. If new discs of the movies are updated with new title codes, the old discs in stores will still be vulnerable. And hackers will surely redouble efforts to crack the new discs."

Nike Poised To Seek Acquisitions. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, B3C, Stepankowsky) reports, "Nike Inc. hasn't made an acquisition since it bought the Starter brand in 2004. But with a lot of cash on its balance sheet, and fast growth in its niche brands, the Beaverton, Ore., athletic footwear and apparel company appears poised to pounce when the time is right." The Journal continues, "During the past two years, Nike has focused on internal reorganization and developing its core Nike brand. During its fiscal second-quarter conference call, however, executives appeared more open to the acquisition idea than they have been recently." The Journal adds, "While Nike continues to see steady growth globally in its Nike brand, the potential for faster growth comes from some of the smaller brands it has bought over the years. … These include Cole Haan for upscale dress shoes, Bauer Nike Hockey, Hurley International for the surf/skate market, Converse, and Starter, which has been renamed Exeter Brands, for the discount market. Nike developed its golf business internally."

Cablevision Board Rejects Dolans' Offer. The New York Times (1/17, Sorkin) reports, "The board of the Cablevision Systems Corporation rejected an $8.9 billion offer yesterday to sell the company to the Dolans, its founding family." The Times continues, "The rebuff was a rare example of a board standing up to and denying a request by a controlling shareholder." The Times adds, "The rejection by the board, which set up a special committee to review the Dolans' proposal, is the second time it has refused to sell the company to the family. … In 2005, the Dolans, led by the founder, Charles F. Dolan, and his son James, offered to break the company in two and buy Cablevision's cable television assets. But they were forced to withdraw the offer before the board formally rejected it." The Times notes, "The Dolans' latest effort, though, was much more public, and at times it appeared acrimonious. Rather than withdraw its offer when told it would be rejected, the family increased its bid last Friday by about $1 billion and tried to put pressure on the board by setting a deadline tomorrow, declaring that the proposal was its 'best and final' offer. … In rejecting the bid, the board said in a letter to the family that the offer 'does not represent fair value for the company's public shareholders nor does it contemplate a transaction that is in their best interest.'"

Report Says Interior Official Was Told Of Oil And Gas Royalties Error. The New York Times (1/17, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "A top Interior Department official was told nearly three years ago about a legal blunder that allowed drilling companies to avoid billions of dollars in payments for oil and gas pumped from publicly owned waters, a report by the department's chief independent investigator has found." The report "suggested that Interior officials could have fixed the mistake far more easily if they had taken action when they first recognized it." The report "contradicts statements by the official, Johnnie M. Burton, the director of the department's Minerals Management Service, who told a House hearing last September that she first learned about the royalties problem in January 2006." The Times adds, "Confronted by e-mail messages from subordinates from early 2004, the report said, Ms. Burton conceded that she probably had been told earlier, but 'did not remember putting a great deal of thought into the matter.'"

White House Denies Plans For Carbon Caps. The Financial Times (1/17, Daniel) reports the White House "denied it was planning a U-turn on its climate change policy by embracing a system of formal caps on greenhouse emissions, despite rising pressure from European governments to change its stance." Although energy security "will be a key theme in President George W. Bush's State of the Union address next week, the White House issued an unusually public rebuttal of rumours about its climate change policy." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "I want to walk you back from the whole carbon cap story...The carbon cap stuff is not accurate. It's wrong."

The Washington Times (1/17, Dinan, 88K) reports Snow said Bush "will lay out his new climate-change policy in his State of the Union address next week, but sources familiar with the drafting of the speech said the president will argue that global warming can be better addressed through technology and greater use of renewable energy sources than through caps imposed on businesses and industries." Analysts and observers "have speculated for months that Mr. Bush is due for a change in his global-warming policy, not least because some of his top advisers, including Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., support such a move." In addition, "reports from London this week said British officials were predicting Mr. Bush would adopt mandatory carbon caps, the type of solution called for in the Kyoto Protocol negotiated by President Clinton but rejected by Mr. Bush." Snow said that Bush "has committed $29 billion to climate science and clean-energy technology, and that although funding for climate research at NASA is falling, the budget for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration is increasing."

State Of The Union Expected To Address Energy, Social Security. The AP (1/17, Riechmann) reports President Bush, "already facing fierce opposition to his decision to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, will confront a tough audience next Tuesday when he delivers his State of the Union address to the first Democratic Congress in 12 years." Among the "prominent themes in the speech" will be "reducing U.S. dependence on foreign oil and supporting alternative fuels," and Bush "also will challenge Congress to fix Social Security's long-term solvency problem, find a way to compromise on immigration and preserve tax cuts. Lawmakers also will be listening for hints of what he might veto." Republicans "see the speech as a chance for Bush to put a wide-angle lens on the nation's problems, taking the focus away from Iraq. Still, the war's shadow will hang over the joint session of Congress when Bush speaks."

Webb To Deliver Democratic Response. The AP (1/17) reports, "Freshman Sen. Jim Webb, a Vietnam War veteran, will deliver the official Democratic response to President Bush's State of the Union Address, where the war in Iraq is expected to be a central topic."

CQ Politics (1/17, Benenson) reports Webb is "an early opponent of the Iraq war, a critic of President Bush's current proposal to increase troop strength there, and a vocal advocate of economic populism." Webb's "political credentials and background in the military surely were the major factors in the decision by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada to choose Webb for the role." Webb's remarks "will mark the second consecutive year that a Virginia Democrat will be delivering the party's official response to Bush's annual message to Congress. In 2006, Democratic Gov. Tim Kaine — elected to his office in 2005 — delivered the party's response."

The Washington Post (1/17, A4, Craig, 690K) reports the "selection of Webb by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) underscores the party's efforts to counteract Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq at a time when opinion polls show most Americans want to begin exploring ways to bring more troops home." Several Democrats "said the decision to have two Virginia lawmakers in a row give the speech highlights the party's efforts to continue to make inroads into what has long been a conservative-leaning state. Some political observers believe Virginia could be competitive in the 2008 presidential race, even though the state has not voted for a Democrat for president since 1964."

The Washington Times (1/17, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Webb said "he was honored to deliver the response and hoped Bush would discuss 'fresh, creative solutions' that would 'move the country forward.'" Webb's "selection to deliver the response also has fueled further speculation that Democrats plan to push harder to win Virginia, known as a 'red state,' in the 2008 presidential election."

The Hill (1/17, Schor) reports Webb "will bring a unique vantage point on the war as a military expert who served as Navy secretary under President Reagan and did not flinch from challenging Bush to begin troop withdrawal during a visit just after Webb unseated Sen. George Allen (R)."

Report Cites BP With Failure To Emphasize Safety At US Plants. The AP (1/17, Porretto) reports, "British oil company BP failed to emphasize safety at its U.S. refineries before the 2005 Texas City explosion that killed 15, according to a report released Tuesday by an independent panel led by former U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III." The AP continues, "The panel, in a statement summarizing its 300-plus page report on BP PLC's operations, said the company had made strides in personal accident prevention but came up short on the bigger picture. … 'The panel maintains a central theme that prior to the Texas City tragedy BP emphasized personal safety and had achieved significant improvements in personal injury rates, but the company did not emphasize process safety,' the statement said. 'BP mistakenly interpreted improving personal injury rates as an indication of acceptable process safety performance at its U.S. refineries.'" The AP adds, "The 11-member panel made 10 recommendations, including that an independent monitor report to the company's board of directors for five years. … 'BP gets it and I get it, too,' BP CEO John Browne told reporters by video link from London. 'I recognize the need for improvement.'"

The Houston Chronicle (1/17, Belli, Clanton) reports, "The report says BP's board should appoint an independent monitor to routinely report back over the next five years on progress the company is making toward implementing 10 recommendations being made by the panel. … The panel found no evidence, though, that BP purposely turned a blind eye toward operational safety or intentionally short-changed safety. … Instead, it found that BP chiefs were focused on personal safety statistics concerning such minor accidents as slip and falls and vehicle collisions. Meanwhile, they were oblivious to the broader problems brewing in operations, which the panel refers to as 'process safety,' at all five of their domestic refineries." The Chronicle notes, "The Texas City explosion occurred as workers were restarting a unit after a maintenance shutdown. Federal investigators looking into causes of the blast have said that malfunctioning equipment, poor communication between workers and managers, outdated or nonexistent safety plans, even worker fatigue were contributing factors. … Although their final report isn't due out for two months, the U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board last year urged BP to create an independent panel to review the corporate safety culture after finding evidence that management may have a lax attitude toward process."

BP CEO Denies Putting "Profits Above Safety." The Financial Times (1/17) reports, "BP on Tuesday night hit back at suggestions it put profits over safety after a damning independent report found 'material deficiencies' and systemic problems in stewardship of all five of its US refineries." The Times notes that a panel led by former US Secretary of State James Baker "identified a series of weaknesses in BP's safety practices." BP CEO Lord Browne "denied cost-cutting was responsible for failings: 'We've never focused on profits above safety.'" The Times adds, "The report made 10 recommendations that BP is expected to follow in full." BP "expects to fund the recommendations from within the US safety, compliance and regulatory affairs budget which it increased last July from $6bn to $7bn."

The Washington Post (1/17, Mufson) notes that in a "347-page report, the panel…said that the London company failed to provide 'effective' leadership to make the safety of its industrial equipment 'a core value' at its five U.S. refineries." The Post adds, "BP said it would adopt all the recommendations and noted that it had already taken many steps to fix the problems that led to the blast at its Texas City, Tex., refinery, which killed 15 workers and injured more than 170 others."

The New York Times (1/17, Timmons) says the report "concluded that weak leadership at BP and a lack of attention to effective safety helped create a dangerous setting that led to 15 deaths at the oil giant's Texas refinery." BP's "departing chief executive, John Browne, denied that there were fundamental problems with BP's structure or that a succession of problems were related. But he said he 'has a responsibility to implement these findings' and a 'moral responsibility' to make sure the company is improved." The Times adds, "BP has had a succession of diverse problems in recent years, including leaks in its Alaska pipeline and accusations of market manipulation at its trading desks, leading some to re-examine a once highly praised company and its longtime chief executive, Mr. Browne."

USA Today (1/17, Iwata) reports, "Led by…Baker, the panel's report comes two years after an explosion and fire at BP's refinery in Texas City, Texas, killed 15 people and injured 170 in one of the worst U.S. workplace disasters in history." The panel, which was appointed by Browne in 2005 at the urging of the U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, "said BP had improved 'personal safety' procedures and lowered the injury rates for workers in recent years. But BP failed to create company-wide safety performance systems and oversight that could prevent fatal serious blasts, fires and spills."

Report To Test BP's Next Chief Executive. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Cummins) reports, "The London-based oil titan, reacting to the review released yesterday by an independent panel, promised to embrace a number of sweeping changes at its U.S. oil refineries, including engaging an independent body to monitor safety practices at the company." The report "is the most recent rebuke to longtime BP CEO John Browne," who last week "said he would step down about a year and a half earlier than expected." BP's "effort to minimize damage from" the report "presents the first big test for BP's next chief executive, Tony Hayward." Hayward, currently BP's head of exploration and production, "will take over as CEO in August."

FTimes Says Other Companies Should Pay Attention To What Happened At BP. In an editorial, the Financial Times (1/17) says that "the management of BP, the oil giant, must not ignore yesterday's report from a panel chaired by" former US Secretary of State James A. Baker "into the safety and management of the company's US operations." The "panel looked at safety culture across BP Products North America, not just at Texas City, reflecting other accidents, including some at BP's Alaskan operations." The "panel's conclusions suggest that BP's executives were most at fault, but the board of directors does not escape. The board relied on information about safety given to it by management. But, implies the report, the board did not question that information." BP's boardroom, "where many non-executives have been in place for almost a decade, needs to be revamped." The Times adds that other industrial companies also face grave safety risks, and non-executives "need to start asking the right questions."

Justices Sidestep Eminent Domain Case. The New York Times (1/17, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "The Supreme Court on Tuesday bypassed an opportunity to revisit or limit its much-disputed 2005 ruling that upheld governmental power to use eminent domain to foster economic development. Without comment, the justices declined to hear a case from Port Chester in Westchester County, N.Y., that challenged the village's use of eminent domain in a dispute between a property owner and a private company designated as the developer of a run-down 27-acre urban renewal area."

High Court Declines To Review 9th Circuit's Diablo Canyon Dry Cask Decision. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/17, B2, Davidson) reports, "The US Nuclear Regulatory Commission and PG&E were issued a major legal setback Tuesday when the Supreme Court declined to consider a lower court decision requiring that a nuclear power plant near San Luis Obispo be analyzed for terrorist risk. The high court's refusal to take up the case means the Nuclear Regulatory Commission," must "now formally study the environmental impacts of potential attacks on the Diablo Canyon plant, said an attorney for San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, an anti-nuclear group that brought the lawsuit. But officials with the regulatory commission and PG&E, which operates the plant, said they were looking at what legal options might remain open to them." The Chronicle adds, "Dave McIntyre, NRC spokesman, told The Chronicle that the agency has acted 'aggressively since Sept. 11, 2001, to enhance security at nuclear facilities. It would be dishonest and inappropriate for me to speculate on what the commission will decide as the best way forward,' he said."

The New York Times (1/17, Greenhouse) reports that Pacific Gas and Electric, wants "a 20-year license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to build and operate a spent-fuel storage installation there." The Times adds, "The utility's appeal, Pacific Gas and Electric v. San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, No. 06-466, argued that the ruling was a misinterpretation of federal environmental law that would place unnecessary burdens on license applicants. The government itself did not file a Supreme Court appeal, however. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement told the court in his brief that while the decision was incorrect and potentially 'disruptive,' it was too soon to know how disruptive it would prove to be in practice."

Decision Seen As Blow To NRC And PG&E. Under the headline, "Order For Diablo Review Stands Up," the San Luis Obispo Tribune (1/17, Sneed) reports, "The court announced Tuesday it will not hear the case. Doing so exhausted all review of the lawsuit, forcing the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission and plant owner Pacific Gas and Electric Co. to comply with a ruling of the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. That ruling will likely force the agency and PG&E to redo the environmental analysis of the dry-cask storage facility, complete with more public hearings to specifically address how the environment could be harmed if terrorists attack the facility. NRC officials do not yet have a timeline for fulfilling the court ruling, said Dave McIntyre, NRC spokesman." The Tribune adds, "Mothers for Peace spokeswoman Jane Swanson said the group is elated by the Supreme Court's decision. It will force the NRC and the nuclear industry to more openly consider health and environmental risks associated with terrorist attacks when designing and building nuclear facilities, she said. 'Now, after years of resistance, the NRC and PG&E are forced to address these concerns,' she said."

An advance version of the San Luis Obispo Tribune's (1/16, Sneed) coverage noted, "Construction is continuing on the dry casks and is not expected to be delayed as the NRC decides how to respond to the court ruling. PG&E may not be able to load spent fuel into the casks before the NRC decides how to act."

The Lompoc (CA) Record (1/17, Charlton) reports, "Jeff Lewis, PG&E Diablo Canyon spokesman, said the utility company is disappointed but plans to proceed with the dry-cask project while the NRC decides how it will comply with the Supreme Court's ruling. 'To this point, we've spent $74 million on this project,' Lewis said, 'and we're on schedule to start the initial loading (of the casks) late this year, pending any other developments.' Lewis added that to keep the dry-cask project on schedule, 'PG&E expects the NRC to clearly define the issues to be resolved to address the Ninth Circuit's concerns, the procedures to be followed and the schedule for resolution.'"

Greenwire (1/16, O'Driscoll) reports, "The federal government" fought "the appeals court decision, charging that the Atomic Energy Act is the appropriate tool for protecting nuclear facilities against nuclear attack. NRC officials say the agency has used its AEA authority aggressively since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to enhance security at nuclear facilities. NRC spokesman David McIntyre said today that the federal government's view is that the NEPA terrorism issue, while decided incorrectly by the appeals court, was not ready for Supreme Court review. 'There may be opportunities for the NRC to raise the issue again in future court cases,' he said."

Platts Commodity News (1/16) reports, "PG&E called on NRC to clearly define the issues that must still be resolved, the procedures to be followed, and a schedule for completing the work. PG&E is building a dry cask storage facility because Diablo Canyon's spent fuel pool is running out of space. The utility hopes to begin loading dry casks by the second quarter of 2008."

Decision Expected To Have National Implications. KSBY-TV Santa Barbara, CA (1/16, Musada) reported on its Website that the decision was "a major victory for the local watchdog group, Mothers for Peace, and nuclear opponents nationwide. 'Today's ruling is a real triumph,' says Mothers for Peace spokesperson Jane Swanson. The 'triumph' to which Swanson is referring is a setback for PG&E, which operates Diablo Canyon." Swanson "says her local group has finally prevailed over nuclear giants. Swanson hopes the ruling will be applied to nuclear operators nationwide."

Ruling May Affect Oyster Creek Relicensing Application. In an early version of it story, the Press of Atlantic City (1/16) reports, "Although that ruling was aimed at the storage of spent nuclear fuel rods at Diablo Canyon Power Plant in California, the ruling by the Supreme Court could force a re-evaluation of Oyster Creek's ongoing attempt at license renewal. The Oyster Creek plant stores spent nuclear fuel rods in a pool which is 119 feet above the ground and holds about 375 tons of highly radioactive fuel rods. The state of New Jersey last year filed a contention nearly identical to the one filed with the 9th Circuit Court by the San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace."

The Cherry Hills Courier Post (1/17) reports, "The US Supreme Court on Tuesday may have strengthened New Jersey's case to have federal regulators consider the impact of a terrorist attack on the Oyster Creek nuclear power plant in Lacey before renewing its operating license. The justices, without comment, turned away an appeal by a California utility, which had unsuccessfully argued that regulators should not have had to evaluate an attack's impact before approving a storage site for radioactive waste." The arguments "presented by the plaintiff in the California case, a citizens' group, and those presented by New Jersey officials in seeking a federal administrative hearing on the terrorism issue were nearly identical."

NRC Maintains That 9th Circuit's Ruling Limited To Diablo Canyon. The Asbury Park Press (1/17, Clunn) reports, "Neil Sheehan, a spokesman for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, said it is now up to the NRC to decide what additional action must be taken in regards to the California waste site proposal for the agency to comply with the appellate court ruling. The winning arguments presented by the citizens' group San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace and then by New Jersey environmental officials seeking a federal hearing on the terrorism issue were nearly identical." The Press adds, "Before Tuesday's ruling, the Nuclear Energy Institute, an advocacy group for the industry in Washington, said a terrorism review triggered by the policy act might impede the licensing of nuclear power plants and delay important federal projects. But Sheehan said the appellate decision only applies to the 9th Circuit. 'If the Supreme Court would have taken this up and ruled on it, then it could have had national implications,' he said. Sheehan said it is now up to the NRC to decide what additional action must be taken in the California waste site case to comply with the appellate court ruling." According to the "NRC, renewal reviews do not currently include terrorism because that threat is evaluated regularly through drills and inspections. State officials want to change that, and have a hearing request on the issue pending before the top five officials at the NRC.

Amid Abramoff Probe, Former Interior Official Resigns From Jamestown Commission. The AP (1/17, Barisic) reports, "The Interior Department's former No. 2 official has resigned from a federal commission for Jamestown's 400th anniversary amid reports that he is a target of a probe involving imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff. … 'As you have no doubt seen, recently there have (been) published reports concerning investigations of actions involving me,' J. Steven Griles wrote in a letter to Frank Atkinson, chairman of the Jamestown 400th Commemoration Commission. … 'Without commenting on those reports, I have come to the conclusion that it would be better for the commission that I withdraw my membership,' Griles wrote in the letter, dated Jan. 10 and provided to reporters by the commission on Tuesday." The AP adds, "The commission works with the state agency planning events for the 400th anniversary of Jamestown, America's first permanent English settlement. Its responsibilities include a series of conferences on the future of democracy. … Griles, former deputy interior secretary during President Bush's first term, was notified by letter and told of possible charges - including lying to Congress - at a meeting this month with Justice Department prosecutors, The Associated Press reported last week, citing people familiar with the probe who spoke on condition of anonymity. … The charges involve questions about whether Griles falsely testified in 2005 before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee about Abramoff's attempts to hire Griles away from Interior."

SCOTUS Rejects Appeal Of Anacostia River Pollution Limits. The Washington Post (1/17, B3, Fahrenthold) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court let stand yesterday a lower court's ruling that would set stricter pollution limits for the Anacostia River, giving environmentalists a victory in a long-running battle over the river's gluts of raw sewage." The Post continues, "The court's decision means that there will be daily caps on the amounts of various pollutants dumped into the Anacostia, although federal officials said it could take until next year for the details to be worked out." The Post adds, "Previously, the Environmental Protection Agency had required only annual or seasonal pollution caps, which can be easier to meet. A panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit rejected that approach in April, and yesterday the Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal from the EPA and the D.C. Water and Sewer Authority. … The river has fecal bacteria, trash and toxic chemicals that make it one of the most unhealthy streams in the region." The Post notes, "The most significant effect of the decision probably will be on the District's antiquated sewer system, which dumps out raw sewage and rainwater during storms. Environmentalists had argued that the damage done by each one of these "overflows" was so severe that an annual limit was not adequate. … Although the environmental groups celebrated yesterday's decision as a victory, it was unclear what the immediate impact on the river's pollution would be. Participants in the case said the EPA might not have the details of the daily limits ready until next year."

Figliuzzi Says Counter-Terrorism Top FBI Priority. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (1/16, Tobin, 352K) reported, "The new head of the Cleveland FBI just bought a house in Bay Village and is moving his family here. That might not sound like much, but it's a leap of faith for C. Frank Figliuzzi, who last month became the fourth man in five years to head the local FBI office." The Plain Dealer added, "Figliuzzi said he will follow the priorities outlined by the FBI's leaders, which puts counter-terrorism at the top. … 'The threat is very real,' Figliuzzi said. 'The fact that there hasn't been an attack since Sept. 11 is not the result of luck.' Figliuzzi repeats the mantra of local law enforcement, that cooperation among the various agencies is paramount." Cleveland Police Chief Michael McGrath said, "We've never had a better relationship with our federal partners, and we'll continue moving forward." The Plain Dealer noted, "Figliuzzi is proud that he was able to forge relationships with Arab and Muslim groups in Florida while investigating terrorism there. … Altaf Ali, director of the Florida chapter of the Council on American Islamic Relations, said Figliuzzi often visited and met with leaders at mosques while working in Miami. Muslims will find him a good working partner, Ali said."

Israeli Drug Kingpin Reaches Plea Deal With US. The Miami Herald (1/17, Weaver) reports, "International narcotics kingpin Ze'ev Rosenstein pleaded guilty Tuesday in federal court to conspiring to import and distribute hundreds of kilos of the popular nightclub drug Ecstasy -- but he will serve his sentence in his native Israel." The Herald continues, "U.S. District Judge William Dimitrouleas of Fort Lauderdale sentenced Rosenstein to 12 years in prison. But under an extradition agreement with Israel, he will be allowed to return home to serve the sentence -- and could qualify for parole in five years and four months with time off for good behavior. … Under federal sentencing guidelines, he faced 11 to 14 years in prison." The Herald adds, "Rosenstein, 52, listed among the top 50 traffickers worldwide by the Justice Department, agreed to the plea deal on conspiracy charges of peddling and smuggling about 850,000 pills of MDMA, a synthetic drug commonly known as Ecstasy. … The notorious Israeli criminal, who had initially pleaded not guilty, was scheduled for trial next week. He has been in custody in Israel and Miami since late 2004, so at the minimum he would end up serving a total of about 7 ½ years. … His plea agreement Tuesday is bound by conditions in Rosenstein's extradition agreement between the United States and Israel, which initially paved the way for him to be prosecuted in South Florida. … Those conditions, approved by the Israeli Supreme Court, allow Rosenstein to serve his prison sentence in his homeland, where there is a provision for early release for good behavior. There is no parole of any kind today in the federal criminal justice system. … 'To the extent that system differs from ours, I cannot comment,' said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta in Miami. 'He would be serving [his prison sentence] under the Israeli rules.' … Acosta said Rosenstein's conviction marks the end of his worldwide organization – 'his organization is no more.'"

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/17, Blum) reports prosecuting the case "grew more complicated for government lawyers in November after [Judge] Dimitrouleas refused to permit Israeli undercover agents to testify using false names. … Defense lawyers opposed the request, saying it would prevent them from thoroughly investigating the agents' backgrounds." The Sun-Sentinel adds that Rosenstein "admitted he took part in a plot to import 850,000 Ecstasy pills into the United States in 2001 to be sold in Miami and New York." This Sun-Sentinel story has been picked up by the Myrtle Beach Sun News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, Contra Costa Times, Kansas City Star, and other news outlets.

Haaretz.com (1/17) writes, "Once in Israel, Rosenstein will admit in court...to hiring Colombian mercenaries to target members of the Alperon family, also seen as crime kingpins. For that crime, Rosenstein will be sentenced to three years in prison, to be served concurrently with his 12-year sentence."

Local TV Coverage. WSCV-TV, Telemundo-Miami-Ft. Lauderdale, Florida (1/16. 6:00 p.m.) aired, "An Israeli citizen pleaded guilty today in a court in Fort Lauderdale to conspiracy to import thousands of Ecstasy pills into the USA. Zeev Rosenstein, also known as 'the fat man' is considered to be one of the top drug traffickers in the world, and part of the agreement with the authorities includes a sentence of 12 years, as oppose to one of 40 years had he been found guilty in a court of law."

WTVJ-TV, Miami-Ft. Lauderdale (1/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "One of the world's biggest drug traffickers pleads guilty to charges to conspiring to export thousands of Ecstasy pills into the United States. A plea by a top organized crime figure comes a week before the trial was to begin. He was sentenced to 12 years in prison to be served in Israel as part of the deal."

More Charged In "Operation Death Merchant." The AP (1/17) reports the federal government "continued its attack on a large Colombiabased heroin trafficking organization yesterday by announcing that 10 more people were charged in Manhattan and 20 others face charges in Colombia. The charges bring to 110 the number of people charged internationally in an investigation nicknamed Operation Death Merchant." The AP story was used by the Wall Street Journal, Newsday, the New York Sun, and Detroit News.

New York Daily News (1/17) reports federal agents "dismantled a Colombian heroin ring by arresting several couriers who stitched packets of drugs into their britches and then took cruise ships to the United States, authorities said yesterday. 'Drug traffickers have never lacked creativity in trying to smuggle in their drugs,' said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York office. 'But smuggling drugs aboard cruise ships is a new twist, as traffickers try to do an end run around airport security.'" Yesterday's charges "bring to 110 the number of people charged internationally during the three-year probe."

On its Web site, WNBC-TV, New York (1/16) reports charges "were unsealed Tuesday naming 10 members of an alleged heroin and cocaine trafficking organization accused of smuggling more than $7.5 million worth of heroin into the United States from Colombia. … Describing the overall results of Operation Death Merchant, DEA Special Agent in Charge John Gilbride said, 'Over 117 members have been arrested. Over 170 kilograms of cocaine and 55 kilograms of heroin seized and destroyed.'" Authorities said the smuggled drugs "were destined for the eastern part of the United States and distributed throughout New York, Baltimore and Detroit."

Reputed Norte Del Valle Cartel Leader Arrested In Colombia. UPI (1/16) reported, "An alleged Colombian drug kingpin wanted on charges of smuggling tons of cocaine into the United States has been captured, Caracol Radio reported. Eugenio Montoya was arrested after a prolonged police shootout in which no one was injured, police said. Montoya's Norte del Valle cartel is believed to be one of the largest in Colombia and responsible for smuggling a large portion of the cocaine that reached U.S. shores."

BBC News (1/16) reported Montoya, who "also is known as Don Hugo, is alleged to be a leader of the Norte del Valle group. He denies being a drug trafficker." Montoya's capture "has ended a lengthy manhunt in which the US had offered a $5m reward for his arrest."

Former Chicago City Worker Gets 5-Year Sentence For Dealing Heroin. The Chicago Tribune (1/16, Bush) reported a former city laborer "was sentenced to five years in federal prison Tuesday for dealing heroin as part of a drug ring run by a former city hoisting engineer. Michael Hart, who worked for the city's Water Management Department, was hooked on heroin when he turned to dealing to support his habit, said his attorney Eugene O'Malley." Hart "pleaded guilty in August to dealing large quantities of heroin through the drug ring run by George Prado, a veteran water management employee."

Los Angeles Police Chief Seeks Moratorium On New Marijuana Dispensaries. The Los Angeles Times (1/16, Mcgreevy) reported Police Chief William J. Bratton is calling for a moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries until strict rules can be adopted governing them. Bratton "said the number of dispensaries increased from four in November 2005 to 98 a year later. 'This has fostered an increase in … crime problems and caused quality-of-life issues for families and communities, as evidenced by the 110 complaints received from neighbors, business owners and concerned citizens concerning these dispensaries,'" Bratton said.

Police Commission Supports Moratorium. The Los Angeles Times (1/17) reports the Police Commission "voted Tuesday to support a moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries and tougher regulations of existing enterprises, even as…Bratton promised to work with federal authorities to prosecute businesses found to be violating the law."

On its Web site, KNBC-TV, Los Angeles (1/17) reports the Los Angeles Police Commission "agreed Tuesday to a moratorium on the issuance of permits for new medical marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles. Without discussion, the commission agreed with police Chief William Bratton's report that new dispensaries cannot be opened until new rules are adopted in governing where and when they can operate."

ATF Agent Infiltrates Michigan Robbery Ring. The Detroit News (1/17, Perkins) reports, "Authorities announced today that an undercover federal officer infiltrated an alleged robbery conspiracy, leading to the arrest of a man and teenager charged with plotting a series of heists Downriver." The News continues, "The Lincoln Park Police and federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives learned of the plan when a federal agent working another case was informed about the alleged conspiracy. … Authorities claim 19-year-old William Musser of Lincoln Park, and a 16-year-old Dearborn Heights male conspired to rob businesses by targeting employees at gunpoint. They were arrested Friday. … 'So often law enforcement is successful at solving crimes after the fact,' ATF Special Agent in Charge Valerie Goddard said in a statement. 'However in this instance, we prevented this violent crime from ever occurring.'" The News notes, "The duo was arrested in a parking lot in Lincoln Park the morning they allegedly planned to commit armed robbery of a tavern in that city, followed by a second robbery of a Taylor restaurant, said Vera Fedorak, public information officer for the ATF. … Musser was charged with conspiracy to commit robbery armed and attempted robbery armed. He remains jailed on a $30,000 bond. The juvenile is in the Wayne County Youth Home until prosecutors determine whether he will be charged as an adult."

US Indicts 148 Immigrants Captured In Swift Plant Raids. The AP (1/17) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says 148 illegal immigrants have been indicted for allegedly acquiring other peoples' Social Security numbers and other information to get jobs at Swift meat packing plants." The AP continues, "The indictments, issued in Iowa and five other states, follow federal raids on the plants last month in the largest-ever workplace crackdown on illegal immigration. The raids led to the arrests of nearly 13 hundred employees and temporarily halted operations for the meat processor." The AP adds, "Gonzales says the Bush administration is studying ways to curb identity theft, including better ways for police to report the crime, and to reduce the access that thieves have to Social Security numbers.The federal indictments include: 53 in Texas, 30 in Iowa, 26 in Nebraska, 20 in Minnesota, 18 in Utah and one in Colorado."

WOI-TV, Des Moines, IA (1/16, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "A total of 148 illegal immigrants have been indicted on identity theft charges stemming from last months' immigration raids at six swift plants. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the suspects got people's social security numbers and other information to get their jobs. On top of the 30 identity theft charges filed in Iowa more than 100 were charged in Texas." There were other local broadcasts in both Texas and Iowa.

Border Fence Cost Estimates Create Split In Congress. The Washington Times (1/17, Hurt, 88K) reports on Rep. Duncan Hunter's defense of plans to construct a fence along the US-Mexico border, and his designation of those who estimated that it "could cost about 25 times the roughly $2 billion he estimated. 'I call them the 'Mission Impossible' crowd,' the California Republican said, referring to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service and others who predict that the fence will cost nearly $50 billion." Hunter "might lump into that crowd Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, who told reporters yesterday that he thinks "the fence will be revisited." The Times adds that "President Bush might fall into that group as well. The administration, Mr. Hoyer noted yesterday, 'has not been enthusiastic' about implementing the Secure Fence Act of 2006."

IG Report Finds Mistreatment Of Illegal Immigrants In US Detention. The Washington Post (1/17, A8, Hsu, 690K) reports a DHS IG report released yesterday has found that illegal immigrants were mistreated "at five prisons and jails nationwide, violating federal standards meant to ensure safe and humane custody." The report said ICE "officials and contractors denied timely medical treatment to some of the immigrants, failed to disclose and justify disciplinary actions against them, and improperly limited access to relatives, lawyers and immigration authorities." The Post adds, "The report comes amid a sharp increase in illegal immigrants in US detention as Congress and the Bush administration debate an overhaul of immigration laws and promise tougher enforcement of existing laws." Responding to the report, DHS Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers concurred at least partly with nine of 13 findings and promised changes," but said "they 'do not indicate any systemic failure' at nearly 400 facilities where ICE is authorized to house as many as 27,500 people a night, because they were based on individual allegations at a small sample of sites."

In a brief article, the New York Times (1/17, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "Homeland security officials said the study was too small to be representative of the country's detention centers."

Georgia Town Provides Insight Into Question Of Effect Of Illegal Labor Force. In a 2,791 word article, the Wall Street Journal (1/17, A1, Pérez, Dade, 2.04M) reports from Stillmore, Georgia, where "a wave of raids by federal immigration agents on Labor Day weekend" resulted in a local chicken-processing company called Crider Inc. losing "75% of its mostly Hispanic 900-member work force. The crackdown threatened to cripple the economic anchor of this fading rural town. But for local African-Americans, the dramatic appearance of federal agents presented an unexpected opportunity. Crider suddenly raised pay at the plant. … For the first time since significant numbers of Latinos began arriving in Stillmore in the late 1990s, the plant's processing lines were made up predominantly of African-Americans." Though the situation "initially appeared" to back the notion that "illegal immigrants take jobs from low-skilled American workers," the issue "has become more complex" over time. "The plant has struggled with high turnover among black workers, lower productivity and pay disputes between the new employees and labor contractors. The allure of compliant Latino workers willing to accept grueling conditions despite rock-bottom pay has proved a difficult habit for Crider to shake, particularly because the local, native-born workers who replaced them are more likely to complain about working conditions and aggressively assert what they believe to be legal pay and workplace rights."

Judge Petitions 2nd Circuit Over Ancillary KPMG Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, B13, Lattman) reports, "New York federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan, a former litigator, is getting to play lawyer again. Judge Kaplan recently filed a brief with the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals -- on behalf of himself." The Journal continues, "The filing came as part of a high-profile case the judge is overseeing, the indictment of 16 former partners of accounting firm KPMG LLP and two others on criminal tax-fraud charges. Judge Kaplan got the bar buzzing when he ruled in June that prosecutors violated the constitutional rights of the KPMG defendants by pressuring the firm not to pay their legal fees." The Journal adds, "The ground-breaking decision was followed by another unusual one: Judge Kaplan created a separate civil proceeding, under his watch, about the legal-fee dispute between the firm and the defendants. … When KPMG appealed, the appeals court wanted to know what Judge Kaplan was thinking when he ordered a side proceeding, and did he have the authority to do it? Ralph Winter, one of the appeals judges, called the move 'extremely dubious.' … Injecting yet another twist in the case, the appeals court invited the judge to defend himself. … In his 47-page response, Judge Kaplan acknowledged his move was unusual but said the complex issues surrounding this case are unlikely to recur again, if ever. "

IRS Opens Doors For Most Electronic Filings. In his "Tax Report" column for the Wall Street Journal (1/17, D1), Tom Herman writes, "Opening day for e-filing your federal income-tax return for 2006 generally was this past Friday, the IRS said. But you can't e-file until Feb. 3 if you're claiming key tax provisions enacted last month. Both e-filed returns and paper returns claiming these provisions -- deductions for state and local sales taxes, higher education tuition and fees, and educator expenses for classroom supplies -- won't be processed if submitted before Feb. 3." Herman continues, "Tax returns filed on paper will be accepted but won't be processed until after IRS systems are updated Feb. 3, the IRS said. … IRS officials strongly urge taxpayers to file electronically. E-filing is "the fastest, safest and most accurate way" to file, said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson. He said people will get their refunds more quickly that way than filing the old-fashioned paper way. E-filing also "greatly reduces the chances for making an error." … Last year the IRS received more than 73 million returns electronically, up 7% from the prior year. A spokesman said almost 54% of all returns were filed electronically."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Withdraws Appeals Court Nominee. The AP (1/17) reports President Bush "withdrew a controversial federal appeals court nominee, a nod to the Senate's new Democratic leadership." Bush had "just resubmitted Norman Randy Smith of Idaho to the Senate last week for a seat on the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. At the time, Bush also withdrew four nominees." Last February, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., "blocked a vote on Smith, saying the nomination would give Idaho undue weight on the West's top appellate court."

Democrats Launch Campaign To Prebut Bush Speech. Roll Call (1/17, Billings) reports Democratic leaders "are launching a broad counteroffensive on issues ranging from Iraq to energy policy in advance of President Bush's State of the Union address next week, hoping to separate the president from the typical popularity boost that comes with the nationally televised speech." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) "are still putting in place the specifics of their plan, but senior Democratic sources say the new leaders are orchestrating a 'strong push-back' beginning today on some of Bush's major proposals." The Democrats will "hold numerous events on both sides of the Capitol to try to ensure they go into Tuesday night's speech with an upper hand on the issues they believe Bush is set to address, including the Iraq War, balancing the budget, global warming and energy independence. Democrats already are fanning out to the rank-and-file Members, urging them to set expectations high, so that the onus is on Bush to measure up."

After First 100 Hours, Democrats Have Work Cut Out. In her Washington Post column (1/17, A19), Ruth Marcus says, "The first 100 hours agenda gave Democrats the framework to avoid that befuddlement at the start of the 110th Congress. But when the clock runs out, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) may start to wonder whether Newt Gingrich had a point in pacing his Contract With America agenda over days, not hours." Marcus notes the "first 100 hours agenda will quickly collide with Senate and White House reality," and having "picked the low-hanging legislative fruit, Democrats have far more back-breaking work ahead" on issues such as climate change, healthcare, and farm subsidies. In addition, the "fissures, internal and external, in the Democratic Party, will start to emerge, like cracks in the Arctic ice shelf."

House Expected To Approve Repeal Of Oil Industry Tax Breaks. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, Simon, 850K) reports, "[W]ith Democrats in charge, perhaps no industry will find the new Congress less hospitable than the oil industry. That will be underscored Thursday when the House is expected to approve a bill that would repeal billions of dollars in oil industry tax breaks passed by the GOP-controlled Congress." The Times adds, "The measure would raise about $14 billion over 10 years by repealing the tax breaks and by closing a loophole that allowed royalty-free offshore oil leases. The money would be used to promote energy conservation and develop alternative fuels." The "measure is expected to easily pass the House but is likely to face a tougher time in the Senate. And it could run into trouble at the White House." President Bush "opposed the tax breaks for the oil and gas industry that were included in the 2005 energy bill. But the administration has been cool to the idea of forcing oil companies to renegotiate drilling leases."

Six Utilities Endorse Bill To Limit Carbon Dioxide Emissions. The Hill (1/17, Snyder) reports, "Six electric companies plan to support a Senate bill to cut greenhouse-gas emissions to curb global warming. The bill, cosponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Tom Carper (D-Del.), would establish a national 'cap and trade' program to limit power-plant carbon-dioxide emissions by 25 percent by 2020 from current projections." The Hill adds, "The companies are members of the Clean Energy Group, which has advocated for a carbon cap in the past." The "companies supporting the bill are Calpine, Entergy, Exelon, Florida Power & Light, PG&E Corp. and Public Service Enterprise Group."

WPost Gives Democrats' Energy Policy Mixed Rating. The Washington Post (1/17, A18, 690K) says in an editorial, "The House Democrats plan to pass an energy bill Thursday that combines the good, the bad and a large dose of missed opportunity. Thankfully, it faces an uncertain future in the Senate. Energy policy deserves more serious treatment." The "good part of the bill revokes tax breaks for oil and gas production in the United States that should never have been granted." The "bad part of the bill would effectively revoke lease contracts granted in 1998 and 1999 for offshore drilling." The House bill "would break this deadlock by imposing heavy penalties on firms that do not renegotiate on terms imposed by the government. This heavy-handed attack on the stability of contracts would be welcomed in Russia, Bolivia and other countries that have been criticized for tearing up revenue-sharing agreements with private energy companies." The main "problem with the House bill is that hitting up oil companies is a poor substitute for a real energy policy. The nation needs to accelerate the development of less-carbon-intensive fuels by capping or taxing carbon consumption."

Judges Seek More Experienced Clerks. The Legal Times (1/17, Palmer) reports, "Julia Kiraly doesn't fit the profile of a judicial clerk, the Ivy Leaguer who jumps directly from law school to a judge's chambers. After hopscotching from Venable to Hogan & Hartson and back to Venable in her first four years of practice as a litigator in Washington, D.C., Kiraly did the unthinkable for many young lawyers looking to scale the law firm ladder: She passed up a growing six-figure salary to clerk for Chief Judge Thomas Hogan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia." The Times continues, "However unconventional, Kiraly, now entering her second year clerking for Hogan, is emblematic of a growing number of lawyers leaving private practice to clerk on one of the most competitive circuit courts. … Though the graying of Supreme Court clerks has been well documented (think Justice Samuel Alito Jr.'s first-term pick of Adam Ciongoli, former senior vice president and general counsel of Time Warner Europe, as his clerk), the increasingly older talent pool applying for federal circuit court clerkships has risen over the past couple of years as lawyers seek to boost their résumés. The trend also reflects the growing number of federal judges who have done an about-face by requiring, or strongly preferring, law clerks who draft opinions and research questions of the law to obtain some real-world experience beyond school." The Times adds, "Applying for a clerkship after entering the marketplace hasn't always been in vogue. For decades, judges relied on the nation's top law schools to fill clerk positions. Even five years ago it was almost unheard of at most Washington firms to clerk after becoming an associate. But in-house recruiters and hiring partners say they have seen a distinct change in the number of associates exiting for clerkships. … Instead of viewing associates departing for clerkships as a negative trend, law firms have framed it as a recruiting tool to lure clerks back to firms with incentive packages."

House Expected To Approve Student Loan Interest Rate Reduction. The Washington Times (1/17, Fagan, 88K) reports, "Democrats, trying to deliver on expensive campaign promises, are offering a slimmer version of legislation to cut interest rates on student loans." The College Student Relief Act of 2007 "would cut interest rates gradually on need-based federal loans for college undergraduates from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent by 2011." The reduction could "save the average student borrower about $4,400 over the life of a loan." The bill is estimated to cost "$5.85 billion over five years." The Bush administration opposes the bill, arguing that it "won't help current students or their families and that encouraging more student debt can fuel higher tuition costs."

The AP (1/17, Zuckerbrod) reports the bill "would help an estimated 5.5 million students." And "to avoid increasing the deficit, the bill's cost would be offset by reducing the yield on college loans the government guarantees to lenders and cutting the guaranteed return banks get when students default. Banks also would have to pay more in fees." The House "was expected to approve the bill, though its future is uncertain beyond that."

McClatchy Newspapers (1/16, Barrett) reports the bill "falls short of a proposal" Democrats "pitched nearly a year ago when the Republicans controlled Congress." It "doesn't cover all student loans…and it will take five years to phase in. And though education advocates praise the effort as a nice start, they say it won't do much to boost college access at a time of soaring tuition increases."

Bloomberg (1/16, Basken) reports the Bush administration "preferred that Congress concentrate on funding direct-aid programs." The plan "also has drawn criticism from banks, which oppose provisions that would make them pay the estimated $6 billion cost of the lower rates, and congressional Republicans, who want more pressure on colleges to reduce costs."

WSJournal Says Bill Mostly Benefits Professors And Administrators. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, 2.04M) in an editorial criticizes the bill arguing that it "isn't really about making college more affordable for low-income families. It's about expanding federal subsidies for college grads." In addition, "colleges will raise tuition to capture the additional funds." So "the biggest winners from this latest subsidy will be the relatively well off professors and administrators who run higher education."

Boehner Says GOP Needs New Ideas. Roll Call (1/17, Davis) reports that for "all the hurdles House Republican leaders face in the minority, the biggest one simply may be getting their rank-and-file Members to accept the realities of their new deflated status." Minority Leader John Boehner said, "I had a Member one night last week moaning and groaning about the schedule. And I just had to look at him and say, 'Why don't you go talk to Mr. Hoyer?' It is what it is." Roll Call adds Boehner "makes no excuses for the electoral losses of the party he now leads." Boehner said, "We've got to work harder, we've got to work smarter, and probably the biggest thing we need to do is energize our Members to create new ideas for solving the problems the American people sent us here to solve." While Democrats

"continue to tick off a list of early legislative accomplishments, most with considerable Republican support, Boehner is quick to dismiss speculation that there are rifts in the GOP ranks."

Boehner Criticized For Booting Flake From Judiciary Panel. The Los Angeles Times (1/17, 850K), in an editorial, criticizes Minority Leader John Boehner's "decision to remove Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona from his seat on the House Judiciary Committee. Flake has made a name for himself with his long-standing effort to eliminate excessive congressional 'earmarks' — not through any complex new ethics legislation but by publicly fighting individual earmarks on the House floor. It's not certain that this was the reason he lost his Judiciary Committee job. Flake believes that he's being punished for supporting comprehensive immigration reform. Other D.C. observers say Boehner (R-Ohio) is making good on his promise last year to punish 'bad behavior' by Republicans who vote against the party's leadership. What is clear is that Flake, the kind of fiscal conservative who has the potential to reverse the GOP's woes, is being held back not for his behavior but for his beliefs."

McConnell, Kyl Plan New Communications Strategy. The Hill (1/17, Bolton) reports senior aides "to Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Senate Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) met with Senate Republican press secretaries yesterday to address last year's communications shortcomings under former Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.)." McConnell and Kyl "have decided that more members of their conference must actively voice the GOP's vision both in the national media and to constituents. Senate Republicans have felt increasing pressure to reform their communications strategy following the success of Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) war room, which is part of a 20-person Democratic communications team that specializes in rapid response." Kyl said, "This week alone we're already seeing progress in the effort to promote small business growth, restrain wasteful spending, and prevent government from price-fixing prescription drugs."

Senate To Vote On Banning Lobbying By Spouses. The Washington Post (1/17, A1, Solomon, 690K) reports in a front page story that "at least half a dozen congressional spouses have jobs as registered lobbyists and several more are connected with lobbying firms, but reining in the practice to prevent potential conflicts or the appearance of them has not been a priority among congressional leaders. Even modest proposals such as banning wives and husbands from lobbying their spouses or using their spouses' floor privileges for lobbying have gone nowhere." Democrats made "ethics reform a major issue in last fall's congressional elections, but the ethics package the House approved earlier this month didn't address the issue and neither did the one proposed by Senate Democrats. Last week, however, Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) proposed banning spouses of senators from lobbying any part of the chamber. The lone exception is for spouses who were lobbying at least one year before their husband or wife was elected." The Senate is "scheduled to vote on the legislation as soon as today. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) called Vitter and said he would support the proposal with one caveat: It should exempt spouses who are already lobbyists."

Senate Passes Bill To Disclose Earmarks. The AP (1/17, Abrams) reports the Senate "voted Tuesday to shine more light on thousands of expensive pet projects buried in legislation every year after the new Democratic majority bowed to a successful push by Republicans to make new disclosure rules even tougher than originally planned." The vote "was 98-0 to require senators to reveal the water projects, hiking trails, defense contracts or tax breaks for specific industries they insert in legislation. That unanimity came five days after Democrats, holding a slim majority, were thwarted by a GOP-led rebellion in advancing their own version of 'earmark' reform."

The Washington Times (1/17, Miller, 88K) reports the Senate "voted unanimously yesterday to adopt a Republican-backed measure to limit pork-barrel spending despite initial opposition by Democratic leaders." Majority Leader Reid "changed course and embraced the bill last week after delaying a final vote when the proposal unexpectedly survived a procedural vote to kill it." The amendment "would mandate public disclosure of all earmarks for federal projects and require members of Congress seeking earmarks to provide written information -- which also must be made available on an Internet database -- 48 hours before the legislation is considered."

Record 16 Women Serving In Senate. ABC World News (1/16, story 5, 1:05, Snow, 8.78M) reported Sen. Hillary Clinton "was part of an extraordinary gathering today. There are a record 16 women in the Senate this year. 15 of them sat down with ABC's Diane Sawyer this afternoon in Washington." ABC (Sawyer) added, "This group, this gathering." Sen. Diane Feinstein: "You know, when we were nine, and we would gather at the well of the Senate. I think people remember. The men would come over and say, what are you up to now? And, you know, there was a curiosity that we must be plotting something. I don't think that exists anymore."

Unlikely Coalition Forms To Urge Healthcare Reform. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A10, Solomon, Maher, 2.04M) reports an "unlikely coalition of business, labor and consumer interests plans to prod lawmakers to tackle health-care overhaul, but agreement among the group so far extends only to a consensus that the lack of affordable health care is a critical problem." Rather than "coalesce around a single idea for how to overhaul health care, leaders of the Business Roundtable, AARP and the Service Employees International Union said yesterday that they plan to force lawmakers to address the issue of health-care overhaul through a mix of advertising, lobbying and public outreach." The "likelihood of these three groups -- which have vastly different constituencies and political leanings -- agreeing on a single approach is unlikely. But the fact that they're looking to coordinate their efforts shows how dominant the issue of overhauling health care is becoming." Later this week, "another group of 16 disparate organizations, including health insurers, physician associations, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and health advocacy groups, plans to introduce its own bipartisan approach to address the plight of uninsured Americans."

In his Washington Post column (1/17, D1), Steven Pearlstein says, "There, at the National Press Club, stood the president of the Business Roundtable, representing the country's largest corporations; the president of the Service Employees International Union, the country's most vibrant union and one of its fastest-growing; and the president of AARP, the formidable seniors lobby. They put aside their usual differences to deliver a clear, simple message to President Bush and congressional leaders of both parties: We stand ready to give you the political cover you need for a centrist, bipartisan fix for a broken health-care system. Or, if you refuse, we stand ready to embarrass you and run you out of office." The "outlines of a genuinely comprehensive reform plan are coming into focus." It "starts with universal coverage, accomplished either through a mandate on everyone to purchase basic health insurance or a mandate on all employers to offer it. It includes subsidies for families with incomes up to 300 percent of the poverty level to help defray the cost of that insurance and the deductibles and co-payments that go with it."

Bill Would Authorize $3.2 Billion Annually For Amtrak. The Washington Post (1/17, A4, Weiss, 690K) reports Sens. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) and Trent Lott (R-Miss.) "introduced legislation yesterday that would authorize $3.2 billion a year for Amtrak over six years in exchange for greater efficiency and increased investments by states." Supporters said the plan "would place Amtrak on a firm financial footing after years of instability." A similar bill "was passed by the Senate in November, 93 to 6, but was not taken up by the House of Representatives. Lautenberg said prospects were much improved with Democrats now in control of both houses of Congress."

Federal Workers Support More Options For Thrift Savings Plan. The Washington Post's (1/17, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "TIPS. Bonds. Roth 401(k) accounts. These are among the investment options that government employees would support adding to the Thrift Savings Plan, according to a survey released yesterday." The Post adds, "The survey, released at a meeting of the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, found that thrift plan participants are generally more satisfied with the plan than private-sector employees are with their 401(k) plans," but the "thrift board has been considering new rules and investment options for the TSP for much of the past year, in part because of recent changes to pension law and because some members of Congress and the National Association of Real Estate Investment Trusts have pushed for adding a real estate fund as a way of helping government employees diversify their portfolios." The Post adds, "Sixty percent said providing a Roth 401(k) account would make the TSP a better program, and 46 percent said offering a wide selection of investment options would improve the plan."

Bush Honors Baseball's Cardinals At White House. The AP (1/17, Feller) reports President Bush "said Tuesday that even in a losing streak, it is possible to win by sticking with your goal and showing character no matter what the doubters say about you. He was talking, of course, about baseball." Bush "honored the World Series champion St. Louis Cardinals by commending them for winning the hard way. To be sure, the Cardinals were not a powerhouse on their way to the White House." Bush "lauded the team's entire operation — its management, coaches, players and fans. He had plenty of nice words for his old business partner, Cardinals Chairman Bill DeWitt Jr., who worked with Bush when the president was managing partner of the Texas Rangers."

WSJournal Says Deficit Picture Brightening. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "The myth persists in some media circles that the federal budget deficit is 'surging' or ballooning or something terrible -- all of which is served up as ammunition for those in Congress who want a tax increase. At the risk of being drummed out of the guild, we thought you'd rather have the real story." The deficit "has in fact declined by some $165 billion over the past two fiscal years, and according to the most recent data has continued to fall in the first quarter of fiscal 2007." All in all, "despite huge outlays for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the nation's fiscal picture is brightening. We hate to ruin the press corps's day with such cheerful news, but there it is."

Census Bureau Urged To Count Inmates At Home Addresses. The New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The Census Bureau typically uses the decennial census to test data-collection methods that become routine later on. The 2010 census should include a test run at counting the nation's 1.4 million prison inmates at their permanent addresses instead of in prisons. That would help bring an end to a corrosive but little known practice that distorts the political process in virtually every corner of the country." State lawmakers treat inmates "as residents of the prisons when drawing legislative maps, to inflate the head count in lightly populated rural areas where prisons are typically built. This creates legislative districts where none would ordinarily be, shifting political influence from the heavily populated urban districts where inmates live. Once inflated, these towns and counties siphon an outsized portion of state and federal aid."

OTHER NEWS:

Plunge In Oil Prices Continues. ABC World News (1/16, story 6, :20, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "Oil prices continued to plunge today, dropping to an almost two-year low with no sign that a cut in production is coming anytime soon. Oil closed down almost $2 a barrel [to $51.21 per barrel]. That's the lowest since May 2005. There's also been a slide at the pump, with the average price of a gallon of gas down 8 cents last week [to $2.23 per gallon]." The CBS Evening News (1/16, story 5, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "[T]he news about oil and gas prices lately just keeps getting better and better." CBS (Mason) reported, "Gas is falling because crude is plummeting. The price of oil down $10 since the end of last year, has plunged $25 a barrel since its high last July, a 33 percent drop." CBS added, "The era of cheap gas isn't coming back. Mother Nature is just giving us a break. Gas prices are expected to head back up in the spring."

Saudi Energy Minister Rejects Call For Further OPEC Production Cut. The Financial Times (1/17, Hoyos) reports Saudi Energy Minister Ali Naimi said OPEC "did not need to further reduce its production. The oil price fell sharply following the remarks." The news "dimmed the prospect of an imminent emergency meeting of the group and prompted international oil prices to fall $1 to $52 a barrel, a 19-month low. Mr Naimi said: 'Do not panic. Actually there is no reason for a meeting.' He added: 'The market is in a healthy condition and moving in the right direction.'" The Times adds, "Edmund Daukoru, Nigeria's energy minister, was less sanguine about the market, believing it to be oversupplied. But he said: 'I think we have to take a wait-and-see [approach]. After we implement 500,000 barrels a day [cut], we have to see how the market responds.'" The Saudi and Nigerian "positions contradict the view expressed by other Opec members, including Iran and Venezuela, who have recently publicly backed further action."

Dow Soars To New Record Closing. USA Today (1/17, 4B, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Investors returned from the long weekend Tuesday in the mood to buy blue-chip stocks and pushed the Dow Jones industrial average to another high. Cheered by another fall in the price of crude oil and encouraging corporate earnings reports, the Dow added 26.51 points to 12,582.59, its third-consecutive record close. The Dow is up 1.0% this year." The Standard & Poor's 500 "gained 1.17 points to 1431.90, thanks largely to stocks in the fertilizer, railroads and retail real estate investment trust industries. The S&P 500 is up 1.0% this year." The Nasdaq "fell 5.04 points to 2497.78. The index is still up 3.4% this year, though." The Wall Street Journal (1/17, C1, McKay, 2.04M), NBC Nightly News (1/16, story 8, :10, Williams, 9.87M) and ABC World News (1/16, story 7, :10, Snow, 8.78M) also noted the market numbers.

Forecasts Suggest Housing Market Still Struggling. The Wall Street Journal (1/17, Wei, Hagerty, 2.04M) reports, "Mortgage lender IndyMac Bancorp Inc. slashed its forecast for fourth-quarter earnings and home builder Centex Corp. projected a loss from continuing operations for its latest quarter as the US housing industry struggles with slow sales and rising loan defaults." The Journal adds, "Though some economists say the worst of the housing slump is over, the latest developments show that bad news from lenders and builders can still jolt the market. Steeper discounts from builders desperate to unload excess homes could add further downward pressure on prices, as could rising foreclosures, which dump more properties on the market."

Obama Enters Presidential Fray To Glowing Reviews. Sen. Barack Obama announced yesterday the formation on a exploratory committee with an eye on a 2008 White House run. Obama's move is being treated as a major news story, with all three networks running extensive reports on it, and major newspapers devoting front-page headlines to Obama and what his entry into the race could mean. In general, the coverage is markedly laudatory of the Illinois senator, with pieces noting his quick rise and the diversity of the emerging Democratic field. The Washington Post (1/17, A1, Balz, 690K), for example, runs a front-page piece titled "Race And Gender Make Democrats' Field Historic," in which it says "Democrats moved a step closer yesterday to what shapes up as one of the most historic and compelling contests ever for their party's presidential nomination." The news media, adds the Post, "will find the story line" of a contest between Obama and Sen. Hillary Clinton "irresistible, and Democrats around the country are eagerly anticipating the competition." In a similar story, USA Today (1/17, 4A, Lawrence, 2.27M) also notes the "historic Democratic nomination race dominated by a black man and a first lady-turned-senator."

The Chicago Tribune (1/17, Dorning, Parsons, 617K) reports Obama would be "the most formidable African-American candidate ever, offering a call to common purpose as a remedy to bitter partisan divisions and marking a potential turning point in the nation's race relations." The CBS Evening News (1/16, story 4, 3:15, Borger, 7.66M) described Obama as "the candidate who says it's time for a younger generation to change America's future," and notes that "just two years ago, Obama was a novice mounting the national stage, a young Illinois state Senator with a great story. … His message is twofold, that American politics is too divisive, and the baby boomers, who have been fighting the same old fights for years, need to move over." NBC Nightly News (1/16, story 3, 1:40, Reid, 9.87M) showed the senator saying, "I certainly didn't expect to find myself in this position a year ago. But as I've spoken with many of you in my travels across the states these past months, I've been struck by how hungry we all are for a different kind of politics." The AP (1/17, Pickler) praises him this morning, calling him a man of "uncommon political talents," and McClatchy (1/17, Thomma) reports his decision "propels him into the top tier for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination and puts him in position to test how much his party and his country hunger for change."

Even what commentators view as his greatest weakness – his lack of experience – is seen as a possible advantage this time around. ABC World News (1/16, story 3, 2:55, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Obama's message, his charisma, and his personal story, he's the son of an African father and white mother from Kansas, have found an audience. In recent trips to Iowa and New Hampshire, Obama drew raves for presenting fairly traditional liberal views at fresh and inspiring." Obama "has few legislative accomplishments. But he's aggressively trying to turn his inexperience into an asset, by arguing those with the most experience created an ugly partisan atmosphere -- and led the nation into the war in Iraq."

The Wall Street Journal (1/17, A12, Calmes, 2.04M) reports Obama "now will test just how eager voters are, in the wake of his Democratic Party's recent takeover of Congress, to further shake up Washington. … For many in his party, and some independents, the freshman senator has come to personify a hopeful prospect of change from the polarizing politics of recent years." Democratic strategist Stephanie Cutter, "a top adviser to Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign and now neutral in Democrats' 2008 contest, said Mr. Obama is 'perfectly positioned to run against Washington,' and that theme also serves 'to defuse the experience argument' against him." Likewise, the Los Angeles Times (1/17, Hook, Finnegan, 850K) says Obama "is gambling that voters will see his lack of national governing experience as an asset, not a liability," and adds "the electorate is seething with discontent with the Washington establishment."

The Washington Post (1/17, A1, Murray, Cillizza, 690K), meanwhile, reports, that "despite all the hype about his potential candidacy, some of Obama's closest associates worry that the senator remains untested. After winning a tough Senate primary in 2004, he sailed through the general election, aided by a Republican nominee with extensive personal travails. 'There will be bumps; there always are,' said one senior Obama adviser, speaking on the condition of anonymity. 'He's going to have to manage expectations and show he has the strength and endurance for the long haul.'" However, says the AP (1/17, Pickler), "for all those historians and political naysayers…Obama's allies like to point out that Abraham Lincoln served just two years in the House before becoming president. It's a comparison certain to be repeated as Obama, with slightly more than two years in the Senate, continues to align himself with the Civil War president." The AP adds, "The senator's expected campaign kickoff is scheduled for Feb. 10 in Lincoln's hometown of Springfield, Ill. -- where both men served in the state legislature."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/17, Feldmann, 59K) says that with his exploratory committee, what Obama is "really testing, political analysts say, is the strength of his fundraising ability. To make a serious play for a major-party nomination, a candidate needs to raise tens of millions of dollars in the next few months – a task that…Clinton should accomplish easily." But "the Illinois Democrat may begin to see the downside of being a media darling. In his latest book, 'The Audacity of Hope,' he describes President Bush warning him just after he joined the Senate about life in the spotlight – especially for a senator who practically waltzed into his seat (after his competition imploded). The media are notorious for building people up, only to tear them down."

Yet USA Today (1/17, Keen, 2.27M) notes Obama "wouldn't be the youngest presidential nominee or chief executive. … Nor would Obama be the least experienced nominee or president. Wendell Wilkie had never been elected to any office before he became the Republican presidential nominee in 1940. Woodrow Wilson had been New Jersey's governor for two years when he was elected in 1912. George W. Bush served six years as Texas governor before being elected president." However, "some Democrats say they need a more seasoned nominee who's prepared to tackle foreign policy issues such as the war in Iraq and dangerous relationships with Iran and North Korea. Obama's inexperience is 'the big question mark' about his candidacy, says Rep. Beth Arsenault, a Democrat who was just elected to the New Hampshire Legislature." USA Today also reports, "None of the Democratic activists interviewed about Obama's chances suggested that his ethnicity matters, and the fact that he is black has not been a dominant factor in his campaigns."

George Stephanopoulos, on ABC World News (1/16, story 4, 1:20, Snow, 8.78M) noted the last ABC News poll showing that Sen. Hillary Clinton "was pretty far ahead of Senator Obama" nationally, 39% to his 17%." Said Stephanopoulos, "Not to worry if you're…Obama yet. Here's why. … Democratic primary voters like" Clinton "a little more than they like Obama, 56% (have favorable opinion of Clinton) compared to 44% (who have a favorable opinion of Obama). But she's a known quantity. Look at that 'no opinion,' only 4% (have no opinion of Clinton). 33% of voters don't know who Barack Obama is yet. As they learn more, he's going to close that gap. Here are his three, big advantages versus Hillary Clinton. Number one, he is the face of change. Number two, the war, as Jake said, the only candidate who is against the war from the start. Number three, he's going to cut into her support among African-American voters." Obama's entry into the race, added Stephanopoulos, "starves" less known candidates "of oxygen. It's going to be more difficult if you're a senator like Joe Biden or Chris Dodd or John Kerry to get media attention. Or a governor like Tom Vilsack or Bill Richardson. Going to be very, very difficult for them to raise money." Similarly, the Boston Herald (1/17, Ratliff, 184K) says Obama's move puts "more heat on…Kerry to decide whether he'll stay on the sidelines or step onto the stage."

The Baltimore Sun (1/17, West, 257K) reports Democrats "active in other campaigns, or watching from the sidelines, said Obama's candidacy poses a significant threat to the other leading candidates." Clinton, "widely regarded as the early front-runner, is counting on support from African-Americans, who strongly backed her husband, Bill, in his two presidential runs and who historically cast about one of every four votes in Democratic primaries. 'Now, all of a sudden, she has a competitor,' said Democratic pollster Paul Maslin, an adviser to Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, who abandoned the 2008 race last month shortly after being out shone in New Hampshire by Obama."

The New Hampshire Union-Leader (1/17) says that "during his much-publicized 'Obama-mania' visit on Dec. 10, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama looked, acted and sounded like a Presidential candidate when he spoke to a 1,500 people at a state Democratic Party rally in downtown Manchester. So it was no surprise to New Hampshire yesterday that Obama announced the formation of an exploratory committee to raise money in preparation for a Presidential run." Jim Demers, a lobbyist and former state representative "who said he expects to be an unpaid volunteer for Obama in the First-in-the-Nation Primary state," said yesterday, "I'm in the process of helping them find some staff. I have more than 35 resumes, and they hope to have a campaign manager very soon." Demers "said Obama called him yesterday morning, and 'he was extremely pumped. The call came after the announcement at 10 a.m. and I could feel the energy and excitement.'" The Hill (1/17, Schor) reports Kathy Sullivan, chairwoman of New Hampshire's Democratic Party, said yesterday, ""Obama could do quite well in New Hampshire. … [He] has a message of hope and unity, which I think is a good message. People are very tired of the divisiveness that's been a hallmark of the Bush administration." Sullivan "has spoken with Obama about his nascent bid in recent days, though she declined to give details"

In a piece titled "Obama Starts '08 Bid, Reshaping Democratic Field," the New York Times (1/17, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports that "in Washington, Mr. Obama's announcement caused a stir among Democratic political operatives, who rushed to make inquiries about joining his campaign. A list of telephone numbers for local offices in Iowa, New Hampshire and Chicago -- none of which have even opened yet -- were being circulated via e-mail."

The Washington Times (1/17, Bellantoni, 88K) notes Obama made his announcement in a Web video found at www.barackobama.com and "touted in an e-mail titled 'My plans for 2008.'"

Morris Says Obama's Recent "Pro-Nepotism" Vote May Come Back To Haunt Him. In a column in The Hill (1/17), political analyst Dick Morris writes that Obama "made his first misstep a few days ago when he joined only a handful of Democrats in opposing a Senate reform banning the increasingly widespread practice of legislators hiring their family members on their campaign or PAC payrolls." New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "who opposes wives cashing in on their husbands' positions, voted righteously in favor of the reform and will probably use the Illinois senator's vote against him in the presidential primaries. When a legislator hires his or her spouse on the campaign or PAC payroll, he is effectively converting contributions to his campaign committee into personal income that flows into the family's checking account, blurring the line between contribution and bribe." Morris adds, "Obama's inexplicable pro-nepotism vote may have been cast in sympathy with Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr. (D-Ill.), whose hiring of his wife, Sandi, to work on his campaign prompted an FEC ruling allowing the practice. … But whatever the reason for his vote, Obama has screwed up. The public will not take kindly to a senator who pledged to clean up the political process voting to allow wives to be hired with special-interest campaign funds."

McCain Says He'd Like To Mend Ties With Dobson. The AP (1/17, Davenport) reports that Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) "said Tuesday he hopes to patch things up with conservative Christian leader James Dobson, who recently said he wouldn't support the Republican's presidential bid under any circumstances. In a radio interview with KCBI, a Dallas Christian station, Dobson argued that McCain didn't support traditional marriage values and complained that the campaign finance legislation he co-authored hurt Christian broadcasters. 'Speaking as a private individual, I would not vote for John McCain under any circumstances,' Dobson said on KCBI." The AP notes, "During a campaign stop" yesterday "in Columbia, S.C., McCain said: 'I'm obviously disappointed and I'd like to continue and have a dialogue with Dr. Dobson and other members of the community.' … 'I'm happy to say that I've established a dialogue with a number of other leaders,' including the Rev. Jerry Falwell, 'Purpose Driven Life' author Rick Warren and Dr. Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention."

Tancredo Says He Will Form Presidential Exploratory Panel. The AP (1/17, Talhelm) reports that CO6 Rep. Tom Tancredo (R), "an outspoken opponent of illegal immigration, said Tuesday he will form an exploratory committee this week for a possible presidential campaign. After making a weekend trip to Iowa, home to the first nominating caucus in January 2008, Tancredo said voters there told him other presidential candidates don't share their views. 'They believe that there is a void in this race that none of the other candidates are willing or able to fill,' said Tancredo, who plans to remain in the House. Tancredo has said immigration would be a central issue if he does run. Campaign spokesman Tim Haley said on Tuesday that Tancredo would also push opposition to abortion and other conservative themes as well."

NBC Nightly News (1/16, story 4, :20, Williams, 9.87M) made brief mention of Tancredo's announcement that he would form a presidential exploratory panel, noting that the Congressman, "who admits he is a long shot, is running on one issue here for the most part, against illegal immigration."

The Washington Post (1/17, A6, 690K) reports that Tancredo, referring to Iowans he spoke with during his visit to the Hawkeye State this past weekend, said, "The one thing I heard over and over is that they don't believe the other contenders care about the same things that they do." No other presidential candidate, Tancredo "added, 'reflects the grass-roots, majority belief of Americans that our borders must be secured, that employers who hire illegals must be prosecuted, and that no one who has broken our immigration laws should ever be put on a 'pathway to citizenship.'"

CQ Politics (1/17, Horrigan) reports, "Though little known to most of the nation's voters, the five-term congressman from suburban Denver has a following among some conservative activists -- particularly those who favor his leadership role in efforts to crack down on illegal immigration and also limit the numbers of legal immigrants in the United States. The 61-year-old Tancredo's ostensible reason for visiting Iowa was to promote his book on his trademark issue, 'In Mortal Danger: The Battle for America's Border and Security.'"

The Washington Times (1/17, Dinan, 88K) reports that Tancredo "on Monday ruled out a run for the U.S. Senate seat that will open in 2008 with the retirement of Sen. Wayne Allard. … Bay Buchanan, a friend and confidante of Mr. Tancredo's who runs his political action committee, Team America, said that immigration is the issue that will help Mr. Tancredo stand out from the pack of candidates. She also said his record, consistently conservative up and down the line, will go over well with Iowa's pro-life, conservative caucusgoers. 'He is an across-the-board social conservative -- one that the Christian right can feel completely comfortable with, that he has been with them on those issues for his whole life,' she said."

The Denver Post (1/17, Mulkern, 256K) reports, "A Tancredo presidential bid would be a quixotic quest, analysts said." However, political observers also said that "Tancredo's position on immigration would grant him credibility with some conservative caucus voters in Iowa and elsewhere. 'I wouldn't underestimate the power of this immigration issue to become one of the litmus tests' for Republican candidates, said Chuck Todd, editor of the Hotline, a nonpartisan political blog attached to National Journal." The Post adds, "Tancredo's presence in Iowa would put pressure on" Arizona Sen. John McCain (R), "who would have a hard time appeasing the wing of the Republican Party that agrees with Tancredo on immigration, said Norman Ornstein, political analyst with American Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank. Tancredo also could boost" ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) "by allowing him to withhold criticism of McCain and let Tancredo voice it instead."

Gingrich, Gordon Call For More Investment In Defense Technology. In a Washington Times op-ed (1/17), Newt Gingrich and Rep. Bart Gordon, Chairman of the House Committee on Science and Technology, say, "Unfortunately, the nation has forgotten one of the most important ways our economic prosperity and national security are linked — investment in fundamental scientific research. Investments made in fundamental scientific research after World War II and during the Cold War have been essential to making our fighting men and women today the best equipped in the world." But our "commitment to that defense-oriented fundamental research — the kind of research that pays off not in a year or two but in the long run, sometimes decades in the future — has eroded. If we do not renew this commitment, it will harm our global economic competitiveness as well as the effectiveness and safety of our troops."

Fundraising Race Among Presidential Hopefuls Well Underway. USA Today (1/17, Schouten, 2.27M) reports, "The competition among presidential contenders for the Democratic Party's most influential donors and fundraisers grew more intense Tuesday with Sen. Barack Obama's decision to raise money to explore a 2008 race. The move by the Illinois senator comes as many of the party's top-tier fundraisers sit on the sidelines and size up the potential rivalry between Obama and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton." USA Notes, "Chicago investment banker Lou Susman, a major Democratic fundraiser, said just hours after Obama's announcement that he would work with the Illinois senator." On the GOP "side, financial backers of President Bush have started to migrate to" Arizona Sen. John McCain, whose PAC "raised more than twice the amount from Bush's 2004 donors than the PAC of a potential rival," ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R), according to The Arizona Republic." Meanwhile, ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) "recently raised $6.5 million in one day and has attracted several big Bush fundraisers, including Mel Sembler, former ambassador to Italy." Ex-DNC Chairman Steve Grossman said of key Democratic fundraisers eyeing the '08 presidential field: "People are playing their cards very close to their chests."

Frist Plans 2010 Gubernatorial Run In Tennessee. The Hill (1/17, Youngman) reports former Majority Leader Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) "is seriously considering a gubernatorial run in Tennessee in 2010, possibly setting up a White House bid further down the road." Sources "in Washington and Tennessee say Frist, who will turn 55 next month, is leaning heavily toward a run for the governor's office, where he could gain executive experience that might position him to try for the presidency in either 2012 or 2016." The Hill adds, "Waiting three to eight years before making a gubernatorial or presidential bid would provide Frist needed distance from his unenviable tenure as Senate majority leader, a period that culminated in the Democrats' takeover of Congress last November. Such a significant layoff would also allow Frist to distance himself from allegations of conflict of interest involving his ownership of stock in Hospital Corporation of America, a company founded by his brother and father, allegations that could have further derailed his White House hopes this year."

Speculation Grows About Elway Senate Run. The Hill (1/17, Blake) reports whether Hall-of-Fame quarterback John Elway "has the drive to score a big win for Colorado Republicans in 2008 is another matter, and it's the subject of growing speculation now that Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) is not running." Elway's office "at the Colorado Crush of the Arena Football League said yesterday that Elway 'has no intentions of running,' and observers say a 2008 Senate bid that could muddy his popular image is unlikely, though attractive to the party." But a "candidate with top name recognition and a golden image like Elway's would have a serious leg up." Former Rep. Scott McInnis (R-Colo.), "who said he will run if former Gov. Bill Owens doesn't, told the Associated Press last month that if Owens bows out, the major parties would also likely search for celebrity candidates such as Elway. He said he thought 'Elway could clear the field.'"

Samuelson Says Both Parties Failing To Make Hard Choices. In a Washington Post (1/17, A19, 690K) op-ed, Robert J. Samuelson writes that the House's vote to increase the minimum wage is "a metaphor for what ails our politics: It's mostly about gestures and giveaways; it's not about hard choices." Republicans and Democrats alike "are long on self-promotion and short on self-discipline. ... Let me engage in a fantasy. Let me assume that Democrats and Republicans actually intended to address two serious national problems: first, our huge dependence on insecure sources of foreign oil; and second, the persistent mismatch between public resources (taxes) and public obligations (spending)." On oil dependence, Samuelson proposes an energy tax, increased fuel-efficiency standards, and opening the ANWR to oil production. On the budget imbalance, Samuelson calls for a tax increase on dividends and capital gains, restraints on Congressional spending, and an increase in the eligibility age for Social Security and Medicare. Samuelson adds, "That something like this won't soon be proposed -- let alone passed -- speaks volumes about our politics."

Virginia Lawmaker Draws Fire For Criticism Of Slavery Apology. The Washington Post (1/17, B1, Gardner, 690K) reports, "A veteran Virginia lawmaker from suburban Richmond ignited a hot exchange in the House of Delegates on Tuesday after criticizing a proposal for the state to issue an apology for slavery and likening it to requiring Jews to apologize for 'killing Christ.'" Republican Del. Frank D. Hargrove Sr. "told lawmakers that his comments were intended only to make the point that 'not a soul in this legislature' had anything to do with slavery -- and that there is no point in dwelling on a chapter of U.S. history that all agree was repugnant." The Post adds, "Hargrove's remarks, first made in a newspaper interview on the holiday honoring civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., prompted a blistering censure from the 17-member Legislative Black Caucus. The Anti-Defamation League condemned Hargrove's comments about Jews." His statements "caused further consternation for Virginia Republicans, who are recovering from the defeat of U.S. Sen. George Allen last year and who are preparing for a tough election year in which all 140 General Assembly seats will come open."

TV Programs Portraying Several Conservative Women. In a USA Today op-ed (1/17, 13A), Melana Zyla Vickers, a columnist for TCSDaily.com, says, "Long neglected, often stereotyped, red-state America can see a glimpse (or two) of hope emerging on the small screen. And that's good news for all viewers. It's no exaggeration to say that conservative female characters have been rarer on prime-time TV than either space aliens or same-sex kissing." This season, "there's Harriet Hayes (Sarah Paulson), the socially conservative Christian comedienne on NBC's Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip, a drama about the making of a weekly comedy show. There's also Kitty Walker (Calista Flockhart), the Republican aide on ABC's Brothers & Sisters, a California family drama. Vague hints of the new diversity came in 2005-06, with Bree Van De Kamp (Marcia Cross) owning a gun on ABC's Desperate Housewives, the muscular if apolitical patriotism of Sidney Bristow (Jennifer Garner) on Alias, and patriotic, God-referencing dialogue from the soldiers' wives on CBS' The Unit."

Hill, North Korean Officials Meet In Germany. The AP (1/17, Lim) reports Assistant Secretary Christopher Hill and his North Korean counterpart Kim Kye Gwan will meet Wednesday in Germany for a second day of talks, South Korea's foreign minister said. Hill and Kim Kye Gwan met in Berlin "for several hours Tuesday," according to the State Department. South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-soon told reporters the two would meet again Wednesday. Song said the "meeting should produce the groundwork for reaching agreements on measures to implement the initial steps of" an accord reached in September 2005. Hill and Kim were trying "to set the groundwork for the next round of six-party talks, to ensure those talks will be productive," State Department spokesman Tom Casey told reporters in Washington Tuesday.

AFP (1/17) notes that Hill "was reportedly in the German capital to attend a forum and the meeting was not expected." The assistant secretary is scheduled to begin visits Friday to South Korea, China and Japan to continue consultations on the six-party talks, the State Department said last week.

South Korea Denies Report It Neglected Refugees From North. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (1/17, 2.04M), Kim Heung-soo, director of press relation at South Korea's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade, writes, "In response to the article 'Defections Tweak Seoul' (Jan. 9), Evan Ramstad made a number of incorrect assertions about the South Korean government's handling of Mr. Choi Wook-Il, a South Korean citizen who recently escaped 31 years of captivity in North Korea." The article "claims the South Korean consulate in Shenyang refused to assist Mr. Choi, until public pressure forced officials to provide refuge for the 67-year-old." However, Kim says the consulate began "working to secure Mr. Choi's protection…ever since it became aware of his defection from the North."

DIA Director Says Moscow, Beijing Eyeing Space Weapons. The Washington Times (1/17, Gertz, 88K) reports, "China and Russia are developing space weapons and are among several nations working on systems to threaten U.S. satellites with lasers or missiles, says the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency." Lt. Gen. Michael Maples last week, in Senate Intelligence Committee testimony, "for the first time raised Pentagon concerns about secret Chinese and Russian space weapons programs." Maples "did not discuss the reported testing of a Chinese anti-satellite laser against a U.S. satellite, which triggered high-level Bush administration worries about Beijing's growing space-weapons program. ... Russia developed anti-satellite weapons during the Cold War, and U.S. officials think the Russian military is continuing work on the weapons, which include both anti-satellite missiles and ground-based lasers."

Egypt Refuses To Shutdown "Offensive" TV Station. The Christian Science Monitor (1/17, Gauch, 59K) reports Egypt's Al Zawraa television station is broadcasting "blatant anti-Americanism…24/7… Even though Iraq and the US have asked Egypt to pull the plug, the station remains on the air." While Nilesat, which broadcasts Al Zawraa, "argues that it's airing the channel for purely commercial reasons, analysts point to the political benefits for Egypt. Some say the country's reluctance to shut down the channel shows that Egypt, predominantly Sunni, may be taking a stand against what it sees as the unjust aggressiveness of Iraq's Shiite-led government and the dangers of Iran's influence there." American officials have reportedly called the station "utterly offensive," saying that closing it down is "a priority." But one Egyptian government official "reiterated Nilesat's stand that the station remains on air purely for commercial reasons."

Daniel Pearl's Father Urges US To Scrutinize Content Of Al Jazeera English. Judea Pearl, father of slain Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, writes in the New York Times (1/17, 1.16M) that the "influential Qatari cleric Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi," the host of a weekly program on Al Jazeera called "Sharia and Life," uses his program "to preach his new morality" supporting suicide attacks against Israelis and American civilian in Iraq "to millions of Arabic-speaking viewers, including Hamas operatives, Al Qaeda recruits, schoolteachers and impressionable Muslim youths." However, Pearl writes, "None of this might seem to matter much to Americans except that for two months now Al Jazeera has been taking its mixture of news coverage and extremist propagandizing to our front door through an English-language station." Although he says he "wouldn't call for banning Al Jazeera English in the United States even if that were possible," Pearl says "it is important to extend a hand to the network because it can become a force for good; but it is as important for our news organizations to scrutinize its content and let its viewers know when anti-Western wishes are subverting objective truth."

Israeli General Resigns Following Criticism Of Lebanon War. The New York Times (1/17, Myre, 1.16M) reports the Israeli military's chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, "submitted his resignation after facing months of fierce criticism over the military's performance in last summer's war in Lebanon," officials said early Wednesday. In a separate development, an Israeli prosecutor on Tuesday ordered a criminal investigation "to determine whether Prime Minister Ehud Olmert exercised improper influence in the privatization of the country's second-largest bank in 2005." The two developments were "the latest blows to a political and military leadership that have been tarnished by its collective handling of the Lebanon war and a number of scandals." The Israeli public has "widely blamed" General Halutz, along with Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz, "for mismanaging" the war in Lebanon.

The Washington Post (1/17, A10, Wilson, 690K) says Halutz resigned "abruptly" after one of his predecessors "presented findings of an internal review that sharply criticized the military's leadership during the war with Hezbollah last summer." However, the Washington Times/AP (1/17, Teibel) notes that he has been "under pressure to step down since the end of the 34-day war."

UN's Ban Pledges To Work With US. AFP (1/17, Knox) reports President Bush and UN chief Ban Ki-moon "worked to push past any lingering US-UN ill will and vowed to work together on issues like Middle East peace and violence in Darfur." During "an hour-long meeting" Tuesday, the two also discussed "Iran, Iraq and climate change," according to UN sources. After the meeting, Ban told reporters he would push "vigorously" for UN reforms and urged the world community to give war-torn Iraq "all possible assistance." He also said the Middle East "is a source of grave concern. This deteriorating situation in Iraq and Israel needs (the) urgent attention of the international community."

On its front page, the Washington Times (1/17, A1, Curl, 88K) reports Ban also "pledged to complete much-needed reforms at the United Nations and urged all nations to make efforts to secure Iraq, saying the war-torn nation 'is the whole world's problem.'" After meeting with President Bush in the Oval Office yesterday, Ban said, "The United Nations should change with much more efficiency and effectiveness and mobility, and highest level of ethical standard."

The Washington Post (1/17, A13, Lynch, 690K) says Bush "welcomed Ban with a slap on the back and urged him to 'pick up the phone' and call whenever he wanted to discuss political affairs, according to U.N. sources."

Russia Placed On High Terror Alert. The AP (1/17, Gutterman) reports Russian authorities have ordered security forces "on high alert after receiving information from foreign officials pointing to the threat of a terrorist attack on public transportation," officials said Tuesday. Authorities are verifying information about the potential threat, they said. A federal anti-terrorism headquarters received information "from foreign partners...about the possibility a subversive terrorist act could be committed on ground transport and in the metro," according to a statement confirmed by a Federal Security Service official. It was "unclear what country the information about the potential threat came from," and the statement "did not say whether the threat was limited to any particular location in Russia."

The New York Times (1/17, Chivers, 1.16M) adds, "Russian intelligence officials placed the country on an unusual high alert on Tuesday night, appealing to citizens for vigilance and saying that the government had been informed by 'foreign partners' of a possible terrorist act."

Castro Seen Preparing For Transition Of Power. The AP (1/17, Shrader) reports Cuban President Fidel Castro "has been meeting with a trickle of international guests in recent months," a US government official said Tuesday. The official "declined to say with whom Castro was meeting," but the meetings, "generally with visitors from Latin America, suggest he may be setting the stage for a transition of power that he hopes will protect the government he has built over four decades." Meanwhile, last week National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said that Castro and his brother Raul "are trying to create a 'soft landing' during the transfer of control," but stressed that "from the point of the United States policy, we don't want to see that happen. We want to see the prospects for freedom in that country enhanced as a result of the transition" from Fidel Castro.

However, the Washington Times (1/17, Hirsch, 88K) reports Castro's "exit from Cuba's political scene is unlikely to spur major changes in the situation there, two House members who recently visited the country told reporters yesterday." Reps. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat, and Jo Ann Emerson, Missouri Republican, were part of a 10-member congressional delegation that visited Havana last month. McGovern insisted, "There's no indication at all that what this administration's been telling people for a long time, that there's going to be this massive uprising, is going to happen -- that's not going to happen." Both House members said that "without a shift in US policy, political changes are not likely in Cuba."

Separately, the AP (1/17, Cheng) reports the intestinal disease Castro is reportedly suffering from is "usually easy to treat -- but if complications develop in an elderly patient like the Cuban leader, it can quickly become a death sentence." The Spanish newspaper El Pais reported Tuesday that t Castro is suffering from diverticulitis, which the AP says has a mortality rate "as high as 90 percent" in the elderly.

UN Says Global AIDS Effort For Children Falls Far Short. The New York Times (1/17, Altman, 1.16M) reports, "Some countries are making progress in treating children with AIDS and preventing others from becoming infected, but the overall global response is 'tragically insufficient,' Unicef said yesterday." In a report, the UN agency found, "Children affected by AIDS are now more visible and are taken more seriously in global, regional and national forums where they had received little consideration before." Better testing to find children with HIV and "simpler formulations of the antiretroviral drugs that combat the infection have increased the number of children under treatment," Unicef said.

Scotland Consider Independence Move. The Washington Times/AP (1/17, Ben McConville) reports, "The anniversary yesterday of the Scottish Parliament's vote for the Treaty of Union is focusing attention more on the perennial discord than the ties that bind these two members of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland." Polls show advocates of Scottish independence "are gaining strength in their campaign for a referendum on breaking the union." British Prime Minister Tony Blair, however, "said any attempt to split England and Scotland would be a 'crazy' idea."

Defense, State Departments Urged To Coordinate Military At Embassies. The Washington Times/UPI (1/17, Waterman) reports, "A report by Senate Republican staffers urges the departments of Defense and State to better coordinate the role of military personnel in US embassies and warns that a growing military presence is causing anxiety among some host governments." A report last month by the outgoing Republican majority on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said, "Blurred lines of authority between the State Department and the Defense Department could lead to interagency turf wars that undermine the effectiveness of the overall US effort against terrorism." The report also recommends that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "pursue a more systemic solution" and negotiate "a global memorandum of agreement" with the new defense secretary.

WSJournal Criticizes Dodd, Delahunt's Defense Of Chavez. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/17, A18, 2.04M) writes, "We've known for some time that Hugo Chávez is a menace to the economic well-being of his own people. But the question that seems increasingly urgent is whether he's becoming a threat to US security interests -- both in the Western Hemisphere and beyond. Specifically, we'd like to know what Senator Chris Dodd and Congressman Bill Delahunt make of Mr. Chávez's weekend summit with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad." Chávez, the Journal continues, "has had American enablers who excused his growing repression, or blamed it on a reaction to US policy. Foremost among them has been Mr. Dodd," who has defended Chávez as "democratically elected" despite his "clear trend toward authoritarianism." Other politicians, such as Delahunt, "embraced and flattered Mr. Chávez for his PR stunt of offering cut-rate oil to poor Americans. Perhaps it's time these Americans paid attention to the kind of 'socialism' and 'revolution' that their support is helping Mr. Chávez to build in Venezuela."

TERRORISM NEWS:

AG Criticizes Judges For Terror Rulings (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says federal judges are unqualified to make rulings affecting national security policy, ramping up his criticism of how they handle terrorism cases.

In remarks prepared for delivery Wednesday, Gonzales says judges generally should defer to the will of the president and Congress when deciding national security cases. He also raps jurists who "apply an activist philosophy that stretches the law to suit policy preferences."

The text of the speech, scheduled for delivery at the American Enterprise Institute, was obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press. It outlines, in part, what qualities the Bush administration looks for when selecting candidates for the federal bench.

"We want to determine whether he understands the inherent limits that make an unelected judiciary inferior to Congress or the president in making policy judgments," Gonzales says in the prepared speech. "That, for example, a judge will never be in the best position to know what is in the national security interests of our country."

Gonzales did not cite any specific activist jurists, or give examples of national security cases, in his prepared text. The Justice Department is appealing an August decision by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit, who ruled the government's warrantless surveillance program unconstitutional and ordered it stopped immediately.

The Justice Department appealed her decision and the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati has ruled that the administration can keep the program in place during the appeal.

Attorneys representing terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay are challenging the legality of a law, signed by President Bush in October, that authorizes military trials. Those challenges raise the possibility that trials will be struck down by a federal appeals court or the Supreme Court.

Gonzales, a former Texas Supreme Court justice, has in the past warned about judges who inject their personal beliefs in cases. But his prepared remarks Wednesday mark his sharpest words over concerns about the federal judiciary - the third, and equal, branch of government.

Judges who "apply an activist philosophy that stretches the law to suit policy preferences, they actually reduce the credibility and authority of the judiciary," Gonzales says. "In so doing, they undermine the rule of law that strengthens our democracy."

Even so, Gonzales characterized efforts to retaliate against unpopular rulings as misguided, noting a failed South Dakota proposal to sue or jail judges for making unpopular court decisions. He also called for Congress to consider increasing the number of federal judges to handle heavy workloads, and to offer them higher salaries to lure and keep the best jurists on the bench.

Gonzales: Gitmo Trials Delayed Because Of Challenges By Detainees' Lawyer (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON – Trials for detainees at Guantanamo Bay have been delayed because of numerous challenges by their own lawyers, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday in defending the Bush administration's treatment of terror suspects.

A leading human rights attorney called the attorney general's comments “a convoluted view of the world.”

Gonzales, meeting with Associated Press reporters and editors, said the trials of terror detainees may begin as early as this summer, and that rules for military commissions in carrying them out will be sent to Capitol Hill this week.

But he acknowledged the delays, of up to five years in some cases, in deciding the legal fate of detainees being held at the military facility in Cuba.

“It's not for lack of trying,” Gonzales said. “We are challenged every step of the way.”

“A lot will depend on the courts and the legal challenges brought by detainees at Guantanamo,” he said. “But we are trying as hard as we can to bring these individuals to justice.”

The Bush administration has been widely criticized for its detention of about 395 men at Guantanamo, some without being officially charged, on suspicion of links to al-Qaeda or the Taliban. The government has characterized the detainees as enemy combatants who should have fewer legal protections than civilians in U.S. courts.

Military officials say 60 to 80 detainees will be charged and brought to trial. Another 85 men have been cleared for release or transfer to other countries.

Last October, President Bush signed a law authorizing military trials and harsh interrogations of terrorism suspects. Defense lawyers have challenged the validity of the law and have raised the possibility that the military trials will be struck down by a federal appeals court or the Supreme Court.

“We've been trying for five years to get the majority of the detainees in federal court,” Ratner said. “They've resisted from the first day, when they took people to Guantanamo.”

The Guantanamo issue was one of several topics during the hourlong AP interview that had Gonzales on the defensive over Bush administration policies criticized by Democrats and civil libertarians as overstepping legal boundaries.

Others included:

Little-known but recently revealed powers authorizing the Pentagon to examine banking records of Americans suspected of terrorism or espionage. Congress authorized such investigations decades ago, and recently affirmed them in the USA Patriot Act, but some lawmakers question whether it is an improper expansion of the Defense Department's domestic role.

“If Congress gives them the authority, I think they probably ought to be exercising that authority in connection with national security investigations,” Gonzales said.

Bush's use of so-called signing statements, which accompany legislation he inks into law. Gonzales said the president used the statements to identify for federal agencies which parts of the law he believes could be viewed as unconstitutional. But critics believe Bush is using them to publicly interpret how to expand his powers.

The issue boiled over earlier this month when it appeared that the president authorized his administration to open mail without a warrant. Gonzales denied that, and said the government continues to only open mail with court approval. The signing statements “do not give the president any more authority than he already has,” he said.

Justice Department requests for the resignations of several U.S. attorneys. Democratic senators have suggested that the department's demands were politically motivated or intended to circumvent the Senate confirmation process. “Nothing could be further from the truth,” Gonzales said.

Additionally, Gonzales announced the indictments of 148 illegal immigrants who acquired other peoples' Social Security numbers and other personal information to get jobs at Swift & Co. meat packing plants.

The indictments, in six states, follow federal raids on the plants last month in the largest-ever workplace crackdown on illegal immigration. The raids led to the arrests of nearly 1,300 employees and temporarily halted operations at the Greeley, Colo.-based meat processor.

“Obviously, we're concerned about identity theft in this country,” Gonzales said. He said the Bush administration is studying ways to curb identity theft, including better ways for police to report the crime, and to reduce the access that thieves have to Social Security numbers.

The federal indictments include: 53 in Texas, 30 in Iowa, 26 in Nebraska, 20 in Minnesota, 18 in Utah and one in Colorado. Local prosecutors are bringing state charges against the immigrants, including 80 in Cache County, Utah, and 18 in Weld County, Colo.

Excerpts From Gonzales Interview (AP)

Excerpts from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' interview Tuesday with reporters and editors from The Associated Press.

On his upcoming priorities:

I'm doing, making sure that we're doing everything that we can to prevent another terrorist attack. ... But in addition to terrorism we'll also be focusing on things, what additional measures we can do to protect our children.

(We) want to engage in a dialogue with the Congress about what additional tools are necessary to protect children, particularly with respect to, quite frankly, maintaining information within Internet service providers. We are discovering in connection with certain investigations relating to child pornography and pedophiles, oftentimes the information is no longer available within Internet service providers and there is no obligation to retain that data.

On sentencing:

I am concerned about the disparity we're seeing in sentencing around the country. We're seeing disparities with respect to certain kinds of cases. Ten percent, I think, disparity from the guidelines with respect to offenses involving children. That is troubling.

We're seeing disparities with respect to races, different races. It appears that maybe if you're of a certain race, maybe you get a tougher sentence, or a lighter sentence. And I think in this country you can't have that.

On Guantanamo detainees:

I mean I have every expectation that we'll see commissions hopefully this summer. But again a lot will depend on the courts and the challenges, legal challenges brought by, by detainees at Guantanamo.

But we are trying as hard as we can to, to bring these individuals to justice. And I think we now have, we have a framework under the Military Commissions Act to do, that provides certainty as to the legality of, of these proceedings.

On criticism about replacing U.S. attorneys:

U.S. attorneys, like the attorney general of the United States, we serve at the pleasure of the president of the United States. We can, we can be removed at any time for any reason by the president of the United States.

And, of course, like any big organization -- and the, and the Department of Justice is a big organization -- we constantly make evaluations as to the performance of individuals. And sometimes decisions are made that we can, hopefully, achieve greater success, better performance, by making changes in personnel. And so I would just leave it at that.

With respect to politicizing the process, I mean nothing could be further from the truth.

On immigration:

I will play a role if it's appropriate. You know, obviously the administration needs to settle given the recent elections, and you know, changing circumstances as to what we'd like to see happen and develop a strategy about how to ... achieve that outcome. Obviously, you know, we're talking about dealing with the Congress -- or working with the Congress.

On President Bush's use of signing statements:

Let me just say that what we are doing is nothing new. It began with Thomas Jefferson and I could give you a whole list of presidents that have used signing statements. ... It's a discussion between the president and the American people, the Congress and particularly the executive branch about provisions in a bill which he is concerned about may be unconstitutional if applied in a certain way.

In the particular -- the most recent case relating to physical searches of mail, what the president was trying to do was to preserve existing authority already to engage in physical searches of certain kinds of mail without warrants. That authority already exists. ... And what the president wanted to make clear is that that this new reauthorization of the Postal Act did not in any way affect the existing authority the president has to engage in physical searches of mail under certain circumstances. That was the purpose of that signing statement.

U.S. Official Apologizes For Guantanamo Remarks (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

A Pentagon official who criticized large U.S. law firms for representing terrorism suspects at the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has apologized for his comments, saying that his discussion on a local radio program does not reflect his "core beliefs."

Charles D. "Cully" Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, said yesterday that he regrets what he told Federal News Radio on Thursday, when he suggested that chief executives of U.S. companies should question being represented by lawyers who do pro bono work for terrorism suspects. The Washington Post editorial page reported Stimson's comments Friday.

In a letter to the editor that appears today on The Post's editorial page, Stimson said he believes that both sides of a legal case should have "competent legal counsel." Stimson is a former prosecutor and defense lawyer.

"Regrettably, my comments left the impression that I question the integrity of those engaged in the zealous defense of detainees in Guantanamo," Stimson wrote. "I do not."

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said yesterday that Stimson's original comments "do not reflect the department's position, nor are they the views of the senior leadership."

DOJ_NMG_0117408

The remarks drew condemnation on the floor of the Senate yesterday from Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), and more than 130 law school deans have signed an Internet petition declaring themselves "appalled" by them.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales pointed at the detainees' attorneys himself yesterday, telling the Associated Press that their numerous challenges have delayed trials for their clients at Guantanamo Bay.

In an interview with The Post later yesterday, Gonzales said the remarks were "not intended as criticism of defense attorneys doing their jobs" but were "a statement of reality."

"We had to fight many legal battles to get where we are today," he said.

An Apology To Detainees' Attorneys (WP)

During a radio interview last week, I brought up the topic of pro bono work and habeas corpus representation of detainees in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Regrettably, my comments left the impression that I question the integrity of those engaged in the zealous defense of detainees in Guantanamo. I do not.

I believe firmly that a foundational principle of our legal system is that the system works best when both sides are represented by competent legal counsel. I support pro bono work, as I said in the interview. I was a criminal defense attorney in two of my three tours in the Navy Judge Advocate General's Corps. I zealously represented unpopular clients -- people charged with crimes that did not make them, or their attorneys, popular in the military. I believe that our justice system requires vigorous representation.

I apologize for what I said and to those lawyers and law firms who are representing clients at Guantanamo. I hope that my record of public service makes clear that those comments do not reflect my core beliefs.

Law School Deans Criticize Pentagon Statement On Detainees (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 17, 2007

More than 130 deans of American law schools have signed a letter deploring a Pentagon official's statement criticizing major law firms for representing detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

The law deans wrote that they were "appalled" by an interview last week in which the Pentagon's point man on detainee affairs, Charles Stimson, said corporations should be disturbed by the law firms' pro bono work for detainees and might want to reconsider sending business to the firms involved.

"We find Secretary Stimson's statement to be contrary to basic tenets of American law," the deans wrote. "Our American legal tradition has honored lawyers who, despite their personal beliefs, have zealously represented mass murderers, suspected terrorists, and Nazi marchers…. In a free and democratic society, government officials should not encourage intimidation of or retaliation against lawyers who are fulfilling their pro bono obligations."

A Pentagon spokesman said Friday that Mr. Stimson's views were not shared by the department's leadership. The letter asks the administration to repudiate the statement.

The missive was circulated by the dean of Yale Law School, Harold Hongju Koh, and the dean of Northeastern University's law school, Emily Spieler. The signers include the deans of law schools at Columbia, Fordham, New York University, and New York Law School.

A liberal Web log, tpmmuckraker.com, noted that two of the law firms representing a former White House official now on criminal trial in Washington, I. Lewis Libby, have also done work for Guantanamo detainees. The firms are Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP of Manhattan and Dechert LLP of Philadelphia.

Gitmo Defense Counsel Stand Accused (WP)

By Andrew Cohen, Special To Washingtonpost.com

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Here is how our executive branch last week waged its legal war on terrorism against the detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. While federal lawyers and intelligence officials earnestly prepared behind the scenes to put on trial some of the major terror suspects, a skuzzy Pentagon lawyer was front and center on the radio attacking the motives and integrity and even the patriotism of detainee defense attorneys and the law firms that support them.

One hand of government prepares in secret for the upcoming battle by identifying workarounds to constitutional due process and the congressional mandate that information gleaned from torture may not be used in the military commissions that may be up and running this summer. The other hand of government works in broad daylight to undercut perceptions about the loyal opposition by suggesting that the law firms whose attorneys work for free on these detainee cases -- it's called pro bono work and it is the law's highest calling -- may be taking money from terrorists or other nefarious sources.

On Friday we learned from the New York Times that the "Bush administration has set up a secret war room in a Virginia suburb" so that government attorneys and military officials can sort through "classified files" containing among other things the "interrogation reports" of top-shelf detainees like Khalid Sheik Mohammed. Their goal is to prepare to try Mohammed and other high-level terror suspects (like fellow 9/11 planner Ramzi Binalshibh) under the Military Commissions Act of 2006, a new federal law that set the rules that govern how the men may be tried.

"Prosecutors could use hearsay evidence or second-hand testimony, but could not use information obtained under torture," report the Times' Neil Lewis and David Johnston. "Even so," they add, "that would mean virtually any information obtained by the C.I.A would appear to be admissible because, under Justice Department legal opinions, none of the harsh techniques amounted to torture." That's certainly convenient in theory -- we'll see how viable it is in practice. Remember, the new Congress has the right to look anew at the Commissions Act and the federal courts have yet to resolve the new questions it raises.

If there is nothing surprising about a group of prosecutors preparing for trial -- even the sort of one-sided terror mega-trial that U.S v. Mohammed would become -- it is, as The Washington Post suggested Friday, downright shocking that a government attorney would denigrate the work of attorneys and their colleagues who have chosen to help men who sometimes quite literally have no one else on their side. The malfeasant culprit is a man named Charles "Cully" Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, and there is simply no excuse for the tone or the tenor of the remarks he made Thursday on Federal News Radio.

Usually, administration officials take pot shots at the detainees -- calling them "killers," for example, even when the vast majority of them are not. But Stimson took his shots at the powerful law firms that have allowed and in many cases encouraged their bright attorneys to represent the detainees. According to The Post, Stimson said: "when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms...."

Stimson also attacked the motives of the men and women, and their bosses, who have accomplished so much in defending the rights of the grim men in Guantanamo Bay. "Some will maintain that they are doing it out of the goodness of their heart, that they're doing it pro bono, and I suspect they are; others are receiving monies from who knows where, and I'd be curious to have them explain that." You don't need to understand the rich history of pro bono work in this country to understand how odious Stimson's remarks are, or how much of a threat they constitute to men and women of goodwill everywhere.

For the sake of argument, however, let's look a bit at the American Bar Association's Model Rules of Professional Conduct -- guidelines for how lawyers ought to behave. Rule 6.1 "Voluntary Pro Bono Publico Service" states that "every lawyer has a professional responsibility to provide legal services to those unable to pay. A lawyer should aspire to render at least (50) hours of pro bono... legal services per year and should "provide any additional services through delivery of legal services at no fee or substantially reduced fee to individuals, groups or organizations seeking to secure or protect civil rights, civil liberties or public rights." I can think of no other cause that better satisfies this solemn responsibility than providing legal help to the Gitmo detainees. Can you?

Now let's spend a minute looking at Stimson's responsibilities as a government lawyer or as a spokesman for federal attorneys. First, Rule 3.4 "Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel" states that a lawyer "shall not... allude to any matter that the lawyer does not reasonably believe is relevant or that will not be supported by admissible evidence, assert personal knowledge of facts in issue except when testifying as a witness, or state a personal opinion as to the justness of a cause, the credibility of a witnesses, the culpability of a civil litigant or the guilt or innocence of an accused."

Even though Stimson is not now technically a prosecutor, he was one, once, and thus should know about Rule 3.8, too. It states that a prosecutor in a criminal case shall "refrain from making extrajudicial comments that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused..." and shall "make reasonable efforts to assure that the accused.... has been given reasonable opportunity to retain counsel." No doubt Stimson and his supporters would argue that the detainees do not deserve these "courtesies" because they are not defendants in our civilian courts. That is no argument against treating opposing counsel with the respect and dignity they deserve.

American Bar Association President Karen J. Mathis wrote Friday: "Lawyers represent people in criminal cases to fulfill a core American value: the treatment of all people equally before the law. To impugn those who are doing this critical work -- and doing it on a volunteer basis -- is deeply offensive to members of the legal profession, and we hope to all Americans." She is right. Stimson should be immediately fired for what he said last week and, furthermore, he should be investigated for breaching the code of professional ethics. Not only were the remarks nasty, they were politically and diplomatically unwise.

What Stimson said, and why, and how, constitutes conduct unbecoming a member of government and a member of the bar. One hand may be acting aggressively, if not mercifully and justly, toward prosecuting suspected terrorists. But the other hand, Stimson's hand, is undercutting the very principles we fight for. This is how our government waged the legal war on terror in our name last week.

Editorial: Clueless 'Cully' Stimson (BOSH)

By Boston Herald Editorial Staff

Boston Herald, January 17, 2007

Well, it's official now: Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs Charles "Cully" Stimson has made himself a household name virtually overnight with a comment that is beyond idiotic.

Interviewed by Federal News Radio on the fifth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo Bay prison, Stimson said, "It's shocking . . . The major law firms in this country . . . are out there representing detainees."

Then the former Navy lawyer went so far as to suggest a boycott of those firms, noting, "when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms."

Many of the nation's largest law firms are defending detainees pro bono, including Wilmer Hale, Covington & Burling, and Pillsbury Winthrop. It's what good, public-spirited law firms - and lawyers - do and have done since the very founding of this nation. It was, after all, John Adams who defended the British soldiers accused of killing Americans in the Boston Massacre. What is it about that long and proud tradition that Stimson doesn't get?

Now deans of the nation's major law schools have signed a letter taking him to task for his remarks and asking the Bush administration to repudiate them.

A Pentagon spokesman has already distanced the Defense Department from Stimson's comments. And Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told The New York Times [NYT], "Good lawyers representing the detainees is the best way to ensure that justice is done in these cases."

Anyone clueless about that concept ought to be out the door.

Letter Tells Of Difficulties In Prosecuting Detainee Abuse (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — A Justice Department team responsible for reviewing accusations of abuse of detainees by civilian government employees in Iraq and Afghanistan has encountered "delays" and "unique difficulties," the department said in a letter on Tuesday.

The letter, to Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, said prosecutors found that some accusations were not credible. Some victims could not be identified, it said, and a few had been released from custody and could not be found.

In one case, two lawyers were prepared to travel to an unidentified Middle Eastern country to interview people who say they had been abused, but canceled the trip because the country's officials refused to allow the prosecutors to meet with them.

"As with an American suspected of a crime, those Americans who are the subject of the referrals are innocent until proven guilty," the letter said. "When career prosecutors conclude that we cannot prove allegations of a crime beyond a reasonable doubt, the department — consistent with its longstanding practices and policies — will not prosecute."

The Justice Department provided the report in response to questions posed by Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, who in a letter on Dec. 18 asked government lawyers for a progress report. Democrats have expressed skepticism about the department's inability to bring cases to trial.

The letter described the reasons no charges would be brought in most of the cases, saying, "All were declined for insufficient evidence to warrant criminal prosecution for one or more of the following reasons: insufficient evidence of criminal conduct; insufficient evidence of the subject's involvement; insufficient evidence of criminal intent; low probability of conviction."

A government lawyer who worked on some of the cases said Tuesday that the problems made prosecutions unlikely in nearly all of the 21 abuse accusations the team reviewed.

But the official, who did not want to speak on the record about pending investigations, said prosecutors had tried hard to assemble cases.

“We took these allegations very seriously,” the official said. “We tried hard to get the complete story, to get these cases to prosecution. A lot of effort has gone into this.”

Of 10 accusations referred to the Justice Department by the inspector general of the Central Intelligence Agency, one remains under investigation, the official said. The unclassified version of the letter, which is heavily edited to remove classified information, provides no details.

Some human rights lawyers said the open case could be that of an Iraqi man who died during an interrogation at Abu Ghraib prison in November 2004 after he was turned over to the C.I.A. by the military. Of 10 accusations referred by military authorities against civilian contractors, one was dropped, the official said. Nine remain open, but the officials said it was uncertain if any action would be taken because the offenses could be misdemeanors.

One additional case, stemming from an F.B.I. accusation of abuse at the detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, also remains open. The official said there had been no referrals from any agency to the Justice Department after January 2006.

Appeals Court Throws Out Sentence Of Man Convicted In Plot To Bomb Los Angeles Airport (AP)

By David Kravets, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A federal appeals court on Tuesday threw out the sentence of a man who was convicted of plotting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport at the turn of the millennium.

Ahmed Ressam was arrested near the U.S.-Canadian border in December 1999 after customs agents found 124 pounds (56 kilograms) of explosives in the trunk of his car.

Prosecutors said he was intent on bombing the airport on the eve of the millennium. The arrest raised fears of terrorism attacks and prompted the cancellation of millennium celebrations at Seattle's Space Needle.

Ressam was sentenced to 22 years in prison after being convicted off all nine charges. On Tuesday, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco reversed his conviction on one of the charges and sent the case back to a lower court to issue a new sentence and explain the rationale behind the 22-year term. No new sentencing date was immediately set.

The decision does not necessarily mean Ressam will get a shorter term. Judges are given wide latitude to sentence defendants as they see fit.

Defense attorney Thomas Hillier II said the reversal might not reduce his client's sentence but "helps in fending off the government's argument that the original sentence was too lenient."

Two of the three appellate judges said Ressam was improperly convicted of carrying an explosive while committing a felony by lying on a customs form.

The government failed to show the "explosives somehow aided or emboldened" him to provide a false name at the border because he had not intended to detonate explosives at the border when he was arrested weeks before Jan. 1, 2000, Judge Pamela Rymer wrote for the majority.

After his conviction in 2001, Ressam began cooperating with authorities in hopes of winning a reduced sentence. He faced a maximum of 65 years in prison.

Over the next two years, according to court documents, he provided information on more than 100 potential terrorists and testified against coconspirator Moktar Haouari and Sept. 11 plotter Mounir el-Motassadeq.

Ressam told authorities he saw Zacarias Moussaoui, , a Moroccan-born Frenchman, at a training camp in Afghanistan in 1998. He also told investigators about the type of shoe bomb Richard Reid attempted to detonate on a U.S.-bound airline flight in 2001, and provided information about a network of Algerian terrorists in Europe.

U.S. District Judge John Coughenour of Seattle, who sentenced Ressam, said the information he provided was "startlingly helpful."

But Ressam's cooperation came to a halt by early 2003, resulting in charges being dropped against two other co-conspirators. His lawyers said years of solitary confinement, broken by periods of intense interrogation, had taken their toll on his mental health and corrupted his memory.

Emily Langlie, spokesman for U.S. attorney John McKay in Seattle, said the government was mulling whether to ask the 9th Circuit to rehear the case with 15 judges. They maintain Ressam should get a 35-year term.

"I don't see any reason why that should change," Langlie said.

Millenium Bomb Plotter's Sentence Is Thrown Out (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo, Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, January 17, 2007

A federal appeals court threw out the 22-year prison sentence of Ahmed Ressam, convicted of plotting to blow up Los Angeles International Airport, and sent his case back to a lower court for resentencing.

The U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco said today the sentence should be recalculated in part because the court overturned one of Ressam's convictions, for carrying an explosive during the commission of a felony. The charge carried a 10-year minimum sentence under federal guidelines.

"We vacate the entire sentence so that the district court can resentence in light of this decision and developments in the law of sentencing," the court said in its ruling.

The U.S. Justice Department had sought a tougher sentence for Ressam after he stopped cooperating with investigators. The 9th Circuit declined to address the government's appeal because of its reversal of one of his convictions.

"We are studying the ruling to determine whether or not to seek an appeal," said Dean Boyd, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington. Thomas Hillier, a federal public defender who represented Ressam, didn't immediately return a message seeking comment.

Ressam, a native of Algeria, was convicted in 2001 of conspiracy and carrying explosives and sentenced to 22 years in prison in 2005. Ressam was arrested in Port Angeles, Wash., in December 1999 as he drove off a ferry from British Columbia, Canada, with a trunk filled with bomb-making materials.

After his conviction, Ressam cooperated with the government until early 2003, the appeals court said. Ressam then sought to be sentenced and the U.S. filed a motion to allow for a prison term shorter than the normal range. Ressam was sentenced to 22 years after he failed to resume cooperating, the ruling said.

Hot-button Law Prof Ready To Take The Podium (STPPP)

By Paul Tosto

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, January 17, 2007

It may be the most anxiously awaited constitutional law class ever at the University of Minnesota.

At the podium Tuesday will stand Robert Delahunty. A recognized scholar and U.S. Justice Department veteran, he is better known as co-author of one of the most controversial legal opinions in the nation's war on terrorism.

His one-term appointment to the U triggered waves of praise — and scorn — from students and faculty in the fall.

While he's kept a low profile, supporters and detractors continue to slug it out in letters and on the Web. The latest volley came two weeks ago, when eight of Delahunty's former Justice Department bosses wrote to praise him — and to scold U professors for deriding his hiring as being akin to the U paying Enron executives to teach accounting.

With that kind of tension, how will spring term begin Tuesday?

"I expect it to be a normal class and for him to do a pretty good job," said Jon Taylor, a first-year law student who opposed Delahunty's selection. He and other students met with Delahunty in the fall to ask questions about the memo. The reception was mixed.

"It didn't change my mind," said Taylor, who petitioned law school leaders to reconsider their choice.

Written while Delahunty was a Justice attorney, the 2002 memo concluded al-Qaida and Taliban prisoners were not protected by international treaties or federal law.

Critics charged the memo paved the way for the Bush administration to mistreat prisoners and ignore the Geneva Conventions. Amnesty International has called for Delahunty and other attorneys to be investigated for failing to meet professional standards in advising the president — accusations his supporters ridicule.

Delahunty joined the University of St. Thomas Law School faculty in 2004. The St. Thomas law dean defended Delahunty then, noting his "long and distinguished career" working for several presidents, including Bill Clinton.

He fell out of the public eye until last fall, when the U began looking to fill a constitutional law teaching slot after a professor took an unexpected leave.

The class is required for first-year students, and the spring class is an extension of the fall course, so it was a critical position to fill. The U first looked to William Mitchell College of Law and then to St. Thomas, where Delahunty's federal experience appeared to make him the perfect choice.

U law school leaders signed him, apparently without realizing he was co-author of the controversial memo and that his hiring could divide the law school. They found out quickly, however, when professors began tossing barbs over issues of academic free speech and the ethics of lawyers.

Delahunty said Friday he hopes he and the students can focus on constitutional law once the classroom door closes.

"I think everyone who wanted to say their piece has said their piece," he said. "My job is to teach these students. I don't think they're served by the spectacle of teachers falling out with each other."

He said he's left an open invitation to his students to answer any questions.

"Academic diversity is good for our school, and the university should not have ideological or political litmus tests for its professors," said Sam Diehl, a third-year law student and president of the Federalist Society, a group of conservative and libertarian law students at the U. The society, he added, has invited supporters and opponents to debate Jan. 23.

Taylor said his opposition was never about ideology; he worried Delahunty's hiring might tarnish the law school's reputation.

Of the petition drive: "I think we totally accomplished a lot," Taylor said. "We feel like across the country people will look more closely at professors … the legal community respects human rights even if a few professors don't."

Delahunty said he doesn't relish the controversy and has no desire to prolong it: "I am looking forward to teaching my students at both the U and St. Thomas next term."

Class starts Tuesday morning, 9:05 a.m., Mondale Hall.

Paul Tosto covers higher education and can be reached at ptosto@pioneerpress.com or 651-228-2119.

Jury Sees Tape From London Bomb Scare (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan And Karla Adam

LONDON, Jan. 16 -- The grainy security video showed a London subway car crowded with midday riders, a man with a backpack among them. He looked around, then turned his back toward a woman with a child in a stroller. Suddenly, a large puff of dust shot out of his pack, and panic erupted among the other passengers.

British prosecutors played the video to a jury in London on Tuesday. The man, they said, was Ramzi Mohammed, 25, one of six men on trial for conspiracy to murder commuters that day, July 21, 2005. The dust, they said, was residue from a bomb hidden in his backpack. Its detonator fired and caused the puff of dust, prosecutors said, but the shrapnel-laced main charge failed to explode.

Prosecutor Nigel Sweeney told jurors that three other bombs carried onto subway trains and a bus that day also failed to explode, preventing a repeat of a nearly identical attack two weeks earlier, July 7, that had killed 52 commuters and wounded about 700 others.

With the four July 7 bombers dead, the six July 21 defendants are the first people to face trial on charges relating to a pair of incidents that were the first major Islamic extremist attacks on British soil and created chaos in one of the world's biggest cities. The attacks spurred a continuing national debate over how young Muslim men, all either British citizens or residents, could have become so radicalized that they could have plotted mass murder in Britain.

The video footage played at the high-security Woolwich Crown Court showed panicked commuters, still jittery two weeks after the July 7 bombings, running off the train at the next stop, while an off-duty firefighter remained on board to confront the man with the backpack. Sweeney told the jury that Mohammed dropped his load to the train floor and told the firefighter, "What's the matter -- it is bread," before running away into the chaos on the train platform.

Mohammed and his five co-defendants -- Muktar Said Ibrahim, 28; Yassin Hassan Omar, 26; Hussain Osman, 28; Manfo Asiedu, 33; and Adel Yahya, 24 -- watched silently as Sweeney played the surveillance footage. They have denied the charges.

All six are London residents originally from Africa and face charges of conspiracy to commit murder. Eleven other people charged with helping them, or with failing to alert police to their plot, face trial later this year.

Britain has perhaps the world's highest concentration of closed-circuit surveillance cameras in public places. Those cameras were a critical tool used by police to identify the suspects in the July 7 and July 21 incidents and trace their movements on the day of the attacks and leading up to them.

The footage played in court showed the man identified as Mohammed running from the Oval subway station into a nearby housing project, where he pulled off a hooded sweatshirt with "New York" emblazoned across the front. Sweeney told jurors that this was a reference to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States, which included the destruction of the World Trade Center in New York. Mohammed was arrested several days after the July 21 incidents.

Sweeney also showed jurors photos of the abandoned backpack oozing a substance that police explosives specialists later identified as hydrogen peroxide. In the trial's opening session Monday, Sweeney told the jurors that the backpack bombs carried onto three subway trains and a bus that day were made from hydrogen peroxide mixed with flour for making chapati, an Indian flatbread.

Jurors on Tuesday also saw surveillance footage allegedly showing Ibrahim attempting to detonate his bomb on the upper level of a double-decker bus, causing panicked passengers to flee.

They also saw footage alleging to show Omar entering and leaving the subway train he is accused of trying to blow up.

Sweeney told jurors that as Omar ran away from the Warren Street station, he approached a woman in full Muslim dress and demanded that she take him home.

"When she declined, he said words to the effect of, 'What kind of Muslim are you not helping another Muslim?' " Sweeney said.

The trial is expected to last three or four months.

U.S. Examines Footage Of Embassy Attack (AP)

By Nicholas Paphitis

FBI agents are helping investigate last week's rocket-propelled grenade attack on the U.S. Embassy, trying to enhance security camera footage, the American ambassador said Tuesday.

The Jan. 12 attack was the first major strike on a Western target by suspected left-wing Greek militants in six years. It smashed a window and damaged a third-floor bathroom in the heavily fortified glass and concrete embassy. Nobody was hurt.

FBI experts flew in over the weekend and were working on the security footage, said U.S. Ambassador Charles Ries.

"It shows the missile streaking across the street and into the embassy," he told state NET television. "It was dark, it's not as good as we want. We're bringing in some experts to see what they can do in terms of looking at the files, ways to enhance it."

"The FBI is involved ... providing us their best people," he said.

Police have blamed Greek left-wing militants for the attack, but there have been no arrests and no claim of responsibility.

Greek law enforcement authorities are also seeking access to footage recorded by traffic cameras just outside the embassy compound.

But the move has provoked a debate about privacy rights, and the country's Data Protection Agency has imposed restrictions blocking police access to the footage.

The camera network was part of a $1.3 billion security umbrella bought for the 2004 Athens Olympics. Government spokesman Evangelos Antonaros said it proved useful during the games.

"How can some people now persuasively claim that this efficient system should not be used to protect Greek citizens' life and security?" Antonaros said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Vast Data Collection Plan Faces Big Delay (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

The Treasury Department reported to Congress yesterday that a data-collection program to give counterterrorism analysts routine access to as many as 500 million cross-border financial transactions a year could not be implemented until 2010. The department had hoped to implement it by the end of this year.

The Cross-Border Electronic Funds Transfer Program was part of the 2004 Intelligence Reform Act, and Congress directed the Treasury secretary to determine if the program would be effective in tracking terrorist financing. In a report to Congress to be released today, the Treasury Department concluded that the program was technologically feasible and has value, but said it needs to determine whether the counterterrorism benefit outweighs banks' costs of compliance and to address privacy concerns.

The program is opposed by bankers, who view it as burdensome and invasive.

Unlike another Treasury program, which uses administrative powers that bypass traditional banking privacy protections to tap into the vast global database of transactions maintained by the Brussels-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, the cross-border plan is the result of legislation sought by Treasury and would require congressional oversight.

Both programs were inspired by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Banks and money services are required by law to keep records on all wire transfers of $3,000 or more. The proposed program would mandate that each of those transactions -- if they cross the U.S. border -- be reported to the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network (FinCEN).

The type of data captured would include the names and addresses of senders, the amount and dates of the transfers, the names and addresses of the beneficiaries and their financial institutions.

Treasury officials said in interviews and in the report to Congress that the data would give analysts more information to ferret out illicit activity as they try to detect links between suspects.

FinCEN said that Australia and Canada had used similar data effectively. Australia has used it to catch tax evaders and predict the movement of drugs into and out of the country. But those countries deal with much smaller numbers of transactions.

Treasury receives more than 16 million currency transaction records and suspicious activity reports a year from banks and other financial institutions, which help officials track money launderers and terrorist activity.

Bankers say the additional reporting requirement would be a tremendous burden.

"We're talking about a volume of transactions that dwarfs anything that has been done in the name of [financial regulatory reporting] up to now," said Richard R. Riese, director of the American Bankers Association Center for Regulatory Compliance.

Beyond the reporting burden, he said, privacy concerns are significant. "All this information will now end up in the hands of the U.S. government for them to sift through at their leisure without any apparent process to assure that it is being used for the most significant national security investigations," Riese said. He likened it to a "fishing expedition" -- "except that the government no longer has to go and put their hook in the water. We have to give all the fish."

To streamline reporting, Treasury officials are recommending a "first in" and "last out" system so that only a single U.S. financial institution -- the last one in a transfer out of the country, or the first one in a transfer in -- would have to report each transaction.

"It's another example of the U.S. government's pattern of sweeping up massive amounts of data that it can't possibly analyze, that is not likely to have any significant security benefit, but does threaten privacy" -- that of Americans and of foreigners doing business with Americans, said Barry Steinhardt, director of the American Civil Liberties Union technology project.

European officials, too, raised privacy concerns. "If the program affects non-U.S. citizens, it should be developed in close cooperation with these other countries," said Sophie in't Veld, a member of the European Parliament from the Netherlands.

Stephen R. Kroll, former Democratic special counsel for the Senate Banking Committee, said the statute "wasn't designed to require reporting of every wire transfer that goes in and out of America -- both because that's billions of transactions and because most of them are perfectly ordinary."

He said the law was designed to give the Treasury Department power for "targeted data collection," aimed, for example, at a country where there is known terrorist activity.

In an October interview, Robert W. Werner, who then was director of FinCEN, said most of the data collected would be "commercial oriented" transactions and "irrelevant" to FinCEN's mission to detect and prevent illicit activity. "The key is to have a system that allows you to be able to pull the relevant data without people worrying that irrelevant data is being browsed and used inappropriately," he said.

FinCEN would also need to develop the technical capability to store and analyze the information, the study noted. FinCEN is considering setting up a "federated data warehouse" to store the data, which would be held separately from other financial records data.

Officials said there would be strict rules to ensure that the data is not shared inappropriately, including audit trails to check for improper access. The program would be developed through a public rulemaking process over an extended period, officials said.

"We know there will be costs. We believe there is value. How do those two play out?" said Eric Kringel, senior policy adviser at FinCEN. He said that as a regulatory body, FinCEN "would not want to proceed" without determining if the benefit is worth the cost.

FinCEN has proposed taking a year to conduct a $1.1 million cost benefit analysis. Implementation would cost $32.6 million and take 3 1/2 years, officials said.

Protesters Found In Database (WP)

By Walter Pincus

DOJ_NMG_0117416

A Defense Department database devoted to gathering information on potential threats to military facilities and personnel, known as Talon, had 13,000 entries as of a year ago -- including 2,821 reports involving American citizens, according to an internal Pentagon memo to be released today by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The Pentagon memo says an examination of the system led to the deletion of 1,131 reports involving Americans, 186 of which dealt with "anti-military protests or demonstrations in the U.S."

Titled "Review of the TALON Reporting System," the four-page memo produced in February 2006 summarizes some interim results from an inquiry ordered by then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld after disclosure in December 2005 that the system had collected and circulated data on anti-military protests and other peaceful demonstrations.

The released memo, one of a series of Talon documents made public over the past year by the ACLU under a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, said that the deleted reports did not meet a 2003 Defense Department requirement that they have some foreign terrorist connection or relate to what was believed to be "a force protection threat."

The number of deleted reports far exceeds the estimate provided to The Washington Post just over a year ago by senior officials of Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), the Defense Department agency that manages the Talon program. At that time, then-CIFA Director David A. Burtt II said the review had disclosed that only 1 percent of the then 12,500 Talon reports appeared to be problematic.

The ACLU said in its own report that past disclosures about Talon "cried out for congressional oversight yet Congress was silent." It said the new memo indicated there "may be even more disturbing" information to discover and declared "it is time for Congress to act."

The ACLU noted the memo showed that Talon reports had a much wider circulation than previously disclosed, with about 28 organizations and 3,589 individuals authorized to submit reports or have access to the database. The organizations with access include various military agencies as well as state, federal and local law enforcement officials.

In early 2006, Burtt also said CIFA had not devised a formal way to notify its users when it decided to delete a Talon report on American citizens. The newly released memo says that a software enhancement was being initiated to permit users to edit and delete entries from the database and that it was scheduled for completion in April 2006.

A Pentagon spokesman said there are 7,700 reports in the Talon database. Some involve U.S. citizens, but the spokesman declined to say how many. Over the past year the program has instituted multiple layers of review for screening which reports should go into the database, the spokesman said.

CIFA has begun a process for analysts to review materials to make sure they fit the program's criteria before being uploaded and made available to Talon users. CIFA was established in 2002 in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, originally to coordinate the counterterrorism and counterintelligence operations of the various branches and agencies of the Defense Department. It has grown rapidly over the past four years, but not without problems. Along with discovery of the Talon data collection, CIFA was linked to the lobbying and earmarking activities that led to the conviction of former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.). Burtt and his top deputy retired in August 2006, and federal investigators are still looking at CIFA contracting activities.

Last week, the New York Times disclosed that CIFA had been using national security letters to gather financial data on U.S. citizens, but a Pentagon spokesman said yesterday that such information was for particular investigations and not made part of the Talon database.

Talon was started in May 2003 to capture raw, non-validated information about suspicious activity or potential terrorist threats to military personnel or facilities at home and abroad.

Civilian Pilots Provide Target Practice (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

As his watch ticks toward midnight, Paul Gardella checks the oil on the small Cessna 182 parked on a cold, dark airstrip in Fairfax County. He knows what he soon could be facing: Coast Guard helicopters chasing him. F-16s intercepting him. Ground-to-air missiles tracking his every turn.

That's because Gardella -- a software engineer and former military officer -- is taking on a new role.

Enemy of the U.S. government.

"In the Navy, I was on the other side. I was on the side of the ones that were shooting," he muses.

Gardella, 50, is among a group of pilots who pose as nighttime intruders, penetrating restricted airspace over Washington in drills that take place every few weeks. While area residents slumber, the volunteers allow the U.S. military to practice intercepting them -- or worse.

The pilots are with the Civil Air Patrol, a national organization with a proud history of service. During World War II, its daredevil pilots chased German U-boats along the U.S. coast. In the ensuing decades, volunteers ran bomb-shelter exercises and helped the Air Force search for crashed planes.

Now, with the country facing terrorist threats, the Civil Air Patrol is returning to its homeland-defense roots.

"I understand there has to be practice," said Gardella, a laid-back father of three from Burke. If bad guys are what Uncle Sam needs, he declared, "I'm happy to help out."

In the low-slung flight operations center at Fort Belvoir, Gardella and three other pilots met on a recent wintry night to prepare for their mission. Clad in olive flight suits with Civil Air Patrol patches, they sat on couches in a wood-paneled room, studying maps and listening to a flight briefing from Gene Hartman, 72, a patrol member from Springfield.

It was Gardella's first homeland security exercise, but his companions were veteran invaders.

Air Force Col. Keith Zuegel, 47, won a Silver Star for bombing an Iraqi-held air base in the 1991 Persian Gulf War. After being promoted to a desk job, he joined the Civil Air Patrol to fly in his spare time. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he was asked to take part in military exercises again -- this time, over Washington.

As the target.

"I said, 'Can you assure me I won't be shot down?' " the Vienna resident laughed.

Kylie McDonald, 35, has been flying the missions for two years. The Centreville resident grew up in a military family and always felt the tug of national service.

"Now I'm getting a similar opportunity, even though I'm a civilian," said McDonald, who works for a company that provides aviation services.

Outside the room, in a pressed navy-blue uniform, sat Jane Davies, 52, of Springfield, who joined the Civil Air Patrol in 1969 as a "Star Trek"-obsessed teenager. She is commander of the patrol's D.C. area branch, or wing, which includes more than 200 adult volunteers and nearly 300 cadets under age 21.

Only a small group of them are allowed to fly the Civil Air Patrol's red-white-and-blue Cessnas, Davies explained. Other patrol members are trained in activities such as hunting for vanished planes or handing out relief supplies after floods or hurricanes. For decades, the roughly 56,000 members nationwide have helped out the Air Force or local governments with such tasks.

Now they are back doing homeland security -- "exactly what we did 65 years ago," Davies said, referring to the founding of the Civil Air Patrol by aviation enthusiasts at the dawn of World War II.

Nationally, the patrol takes part in a variety of anti-terror activities. Some pilots periodically snap aerial photographs of sensitive sites such as nuclear plants or dams for the government. Sometimes patrol members are asked to fly military officers or government officials over certain areas.

"We're not necessarily made privy to what they're looking at," said Rick Greenhut, head of homeland security for the patrol. "We're kind of the bus driver."

Perhaps the most exciting missions, though, are the exercises known as Falcon Virgo, which take place over cities such as New York and Washington. They are directed by officials from the 1st Air Force at Tyndall Air Force Base in Florida, who coordinate air defense for the continental United States.

Details of the Falcon Virgo exercises are often secret.

"They ask us not to discuss it, for everyone's safety," McDonald said. The volunteer pilot simply informs friends she's "on a special mission for homeland security."

But this much is known: The exercises test Washington's air-defense radar system and the aircraft that might have to confront an intruder. Those include the Air Force jets that fly continuously over the capital, planes that scramble from Andrews Air Force base and Coast Guard helicopters.

Participants include officials up the chain of command who must decide whether to intercept or shoot down an aircraft. Many involved in the exercises are not told that the Cessnas are "friendlies" until after they have been picked up by radar -- but well before any decision would be made to shoot them down.

During some exercises, the military also tracks the Cessnas with ground-to-air missiles. "Which can be kind of disconcerting if you're flying them," observed Lt. Col. Gerry Sohan of the Air Force District of Washington. None are fired, though.

The Civil Air Patrol is an auxiliary of the Air Force, which evaluates each wing every two years and provides about $30 million a year for planes, fuel and other expenses. The patrol owns more than 500 Cessnas, the biggest fleet in the world.

But the Air Force doesn't pay the volunteers, thus saving a huge amount of money.

"Just for the national capital region, one exercise would probably save close to $10,000," said Mark O'Brien, an employee with the 1st Air Force who is in charge of liaison with the Civil Air Patrol.

Civil Air Patrol members pay $65 a year in dues and buy their own uniforms. In return, they get the opportunity to fly at reduced rates or take cheap flying lessons. But, Gardella said, they receive something more important.

"Most of my flying has been for myself, for my own enjoyment," he said, referring to his many years as a private pilot. "I started to feel the Lord gave me the ability and resources and passion to fly, and so I ought to give something back."

That explains why he was lifting off into the sky in a Cessna shortly before midnight with Zuegel at his side. It was to be a long night; they were supposed to invade Washington twice.

Gardella isn't allowed to reveal what transpired in the nightlong exercise. But, contacted a few days later, he said he finished with such an adrenaline rush that he actually went to work instead of taking time off to sleep.

And were his co-workers impressed that he had been out all night trying to help defend the United States from enemies, zooming his little Cessna into restricted airspace to be a target for fighter planes, helicopters and ground-to-air missiles?

"They're not that into it," he said. "They're like, 'That's nice.' "

New Scanner Gets Off On Wrong Foot; Fliers End Up Shedding Shoes Anyway (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, January 17, 2007

ORLANDO — Many air travelers who were screened Tuesday by a revolutionary new machine aimed at letting them keep their shoes on through airport security got an unexpected surprise — they had to take their shoes off anyway.

About half of the travelers using Orlando International Airport's first-in-the-nation ShoeScanner underwent the very hassle the machines were designed to ease — putting shoes through checkpoint X-rays — because the ShoeScanner detected metal in their shoes.

"It's a waste of time," Tracey Grenkoski of Orlando said after spending more than a minute on a ShoeScanner only to be told to remove her high-heeled shoes. "What's the point of me standing there if I still have to take my shoes off?"

Grenkoski had company. Of 50 travelers who used the ShoeScanner in a one-hour period here Tuesday, 28 had to remove their metal-laden shoes, according to USA TODAY's observation.

Steven Brill, whose Manhattan company, Verified Identity Pass, operates the ShoeScanners, said 52% of hundreds of passengers using the machine Tuesday morning had to remove shoes. In about a third of the cases in which travelers were told to take their shoes off, the ShoeScanner couldn't do an electronic scan for weapons because people moved their feet, he said.

Up to 1,500 of Orlando's 47,000 daily departing passengers will use its ShoeScanners.

ShoeScanners were intended to boost the fledgling Registered Traveler program, which promises fast trips through airport security for people who voluntarily pay about $100 a year and pass a background check.

The program, which has operated only in Orlando, started Tuesday in Terminal 7 at New York's Kennedy International. It opens Thursday in Indianapolis and next week in Cincinnati and San Jose, Calif. All are awaiting approval from the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) to use ShoeScanners.

Brill's company submitted the machine last year to the TSA for approval. General Electric's GE Security, which makes the $200,000 machine, hoped it would detect explosives and distinguish between metal commonly found in shoes and metal that could be a weapon, said company product manager Daniel Mahlum. The company is trying to upgrade the machine so it can allow passengers to wear shoes that contain harmless metal.

For now, TSA spokesman Christopher White said, if the ShoeScanner senses any explosives or metal, "it's going to require additional scrutiny."

Brill said he expects people in Registered Traveler to stop wearing shoes with metal.

Some Orlando passengers didn't mind having to remove their shoes after they were screened for explosives.

"It doesn't make much (time) difference," said Bob Halcrow, noting that even with a one-minute shoe scan, there was no line at the Registered Traveler lane. Regular security checkpoints had a 20-minute backup.

Registered Traveler Starts At JFK Airport (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

A long-delayed program aimed at speeding trusted travelers through airport security took a small but dramatic step Tuesday when it opened at one terminal in New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport.

The opening marks the official launch of Registered Traveler beyond Orlando International Airport, which since July 2005 has run the only airport-sponsored program to put airline travelers at the front of security lines if they pay about $100 a year and pass a background check.

Many airlines give first-class and other preferred passengers their own line leading to security checkpoints. Registered Traveler opens such privileges to a potentially much wider market.

"People have been clamoring for this for years," said Caleb Tiller of the National Business Travel Association. "It's available to anybody. Airline programs are really limited to passengers carrying a certain class of ticket or a certain mileage status."

Indianapolis International Airport plans to start a Registered Traveler program Thursday. Airports in San Jose, Calif., and Cincinnati are scheduled to join next week, said Steven Brill, whose Manhattan company, Verified Identity Pass, will manage the programs.

Other airports are likely to follow when they see Registered Traveler grow, Brill said. "The next five airports are infinitely easier than the first five, and the five after that are a cakewalk," he said.

Some travelers are skeptical. "I'm very doubtful it will expand," Patrick Richmond said Tuesday as he bypassed Orlando's regular 20-minute security line for the Registered Traveler "line" that had two other passengers. "The cost seems enormous."

Orlando has four $200,000 machines — two at each checkpoint — that read fingerprint-embedded ID cards to verify the identities of people in the program and that check their shoes for weapons. The ShoeScanner machines aim to spare passengers from having to take off their shoes when going through security.

Indianapolis and San Jose will have six each, and there will be two at Cincinnati and at Kennedy's Terminal 7, which British Airways owns.

"That makes no difference to me whatsoever," Richmond said of the four airports joining Orlando. "I never go to any of those cities."

More than 30,000 people have joined Registered Traveler at Orlando, which does not have airline-run security lines for elite travelers. About 5,000 total have signed up at the other four airports since enrollment began last fall.

Some Orlando passengers said Tuesday that being able to keep their shoes on while passing through security was a step forward. "It's a little bit less of a hassle," said Derek Simonds of Deland, Fla. "But to have Registered Traveler at other airports would be tremendous."

Last year, 22 airports told the Transportation Security Administration they were interested in starting Registered Traveler, including Los Angeles, Chicago O'Hare, Denver, Miami and Washington's Dulles and Reagan National.

Miami security director Lauren Stover said the ShoeScanner could make Registered Traveler more appealing.

She said the airport is still weighing the "customer-service value and the impact it will have on (security) wait times for passengers throughout the airport."

Keep Your Shoes On, For A Price (NYT)

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

Of all the hassles at the airport in this age of heightened security, perhaps the most annoying is the requirement to take off your shoes to send them through the X-ray screener. That burden will be lifted at some airports shortly — for those willing to pay about $100 a year for the privilege.

The Transportation Security Administration has recently approved a new device that will scan your shoes while you are still wearing them. It uses quadrupole resonance technology, similar to a medical M.R.I., to determine whether explosives or weapons might be hidden in your shoes. It is the first important new technology to emerge from the for-profit registered traveler programs.

The hitch is that, for now, you have to pay to join a program in which private companies pledge to move you through the security lines a bit faster if you submit to a government background check in advance and supply biometric data — like a thumbprint or iris scan — that can be used to identify you at the airport.

The lead company in the field, founded by Steven Brill, operates the registered traveler lanes in Orlando, Fla., where use of the shoe scanner started yesterday, and plans to open lanes at four more airports in coming weeks. That will include Kennedy Airport, where one lane opened yesterday but with its shoe scanner not yet operational.

The scanner was developed for Mr. Brill's company by G.E. Security, a subsidiary of General Electric. It is part of a kiosk that also includes a device to scan fingertips for traces of chemicals that might indicate recent contact with explosives. That technology, if approved by the federal government, could make it possible for travelers to be X-rayed for hidden explosives without first having to take off their coats. Another company is exploring backscatter X-ray technology that can see through clothing to detect hidden objects, although that carries privacy implications. Also down the road is a technology to scan laptops without removing them from their cases.

These technology advances could become the major contribution of registered traveler programs, which otherwise simply offer those willing to pay an annual fee a designated fast lane to a set of the airport's standard metal detectors and X-ray scanners. The kiosks cost a hefty $150,000, probably too much for the government to swallow. But G.E. would surely relish a broad market, and volume production would presumably reduce the price. Someday these technologies may trickle down to us all, and the registered traveler companies will have to keep finding new devices to stay ahead.

Muslims Cite Discrimination In Denial Of Flight (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

An Islamic civil rights group is calling for an investigation to determine why 40 Muslims were not allowed to board a flight from Germany to Detroit after their pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia.

Northwest Airlines officials said the passengers arrived too late to catch the flight, but some of the Muslims, appearing at a press conference yesterday with the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), called it religious discrimination.

The Muslims arrived at the Frankfurt airport at 7:30 a.m. Jan. 7 on a charter plane from Saudi Arabia. They did not show up at the ticket counter until about 20 minutes before the Detroit-bound Flight 51 left at 10:20 a.m., said Dean Breest, a Northwest Airlines spokesman.

The airline industry and governmental agencies have check-in and boarding deadlines to help ensure on-time departures, and Northwest Airlines policy states that passengers must check in for international flights at least 60 minutes before departure and be aboard the aircraft at least 30 minutes before departure.

"The rules are the rules," said Roman Blahoski, spokesman for Northwest Airlines. "It does not matter who they are; they would be turned away because the flight had already closed."

Mr. Blahoski said, "Northwest takes these accusations very seriously," but "these passengers were denied boarding because they did not meet the standard check-in deadline."

Imam Sayed Hassan Al-Qazwini of the Islamic Center of America in Dearborn, Mich., told reporters that the travelers, who included two imams, were stranded and left on their own to find flights home.

Mr. Breest, however, said those who arrived at the gate in time with boarding passes were allowed onto the plane, and that those who could not be accommodated were rescheduled for other flights.

"It has nothing to do with religion, but when you have to be on the plane," Mr. Breest said. "They just were not there in time.

"We're sorry, but we did get them to the next destination as soon as possible. We were still able to process some of them and get them on the flight, then rebooked the rest of the group the same day for flights via Amsterdam."

Mr. Al-Qazwini demanded an apology from the airline as well as unspecified compensation.

If the airline does not meet their demands, Mr. Al-Qazwini said, he may call for a Muslim boycott of Northwest.

In November, six imams who were removed from a US Airways flight after exhibiting suspicious behavior called for a boycott of that airline. The Muslims retained CAIR as their legal representatives and have threatened to file a lawsuit.

US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said: "We're in contact with them but we have no resolution."

Intelligence Agency's $100M Leasing Deal Examined (USAT)

By Matt Kelley, Usa Today

Auditors: CIFA lacked authority to sign contract

WASHINGTON — A Pentagon domestic intelligence agency overpaid and might have broken the law in awarding a $100 million contract to lease office space, federal investigators say.

The Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA) awarded the no-bid deal in 2003 to TKC Communications. Federal auditors say the agency lacked the authority to sign the contract and overpaid by more than $2 million.

Internal watchdogs at the Pentagon and Interior Department, as well as Congress' Government Accountability Office, began questioning the contract last year. Still, federal contracting records show CIFA has paid TKC more than $11 million since Pentagon auditors raised their concerns in May, including more than $6 million in late November.

Interior investigators wrote in a report released last week that department officials defended the deal as legal and refused to stop paying the company. "Congressional involvement may be required to sort out this contract," the investigators wrote.

The contracting questions come as CIFA faces criticism over its surveillance tactics. Created in 2002, the agency oversees investigations and efforts to block terrorism or espionage against military bases or personnel in the USA.

The agency has issued hundreds of "national security letters" to obtain the banking records of suspects, a practice The New York Times revealed this weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0117421

The American Civil Liberties Union criticized the practice, as it did in December 2005 after reports that a CIFA database included information about non-violent war protesters. Vice President Cheney defended the surveillance as legal during a TV interview Sunday.

The 10-year contract with TKC calls for the company to obtain and renovate office space in the Washington area for other contractors working for CIFA. TKC has leased nine floors of an office building near the Pentagon, and has been paid about $66.7 million for its work, federal records show.

The agency used an Interior Department office that was created to help all federal departments order supplies or services more quickly. Auditors from the Pentagon, Interior and Congress have repeatedly criticized using the Interior office, saying it often means the deals aren't scrutinized as carefully as other Pentagon contracts.

Thomas Gimble, acting Defense Department inspector general, is expected to testify before a Senate Armed Services subcommittee today about the contract, spokesman Gary Comerford said.

The Interior Department report released Jan. 9 says the contract was "likely void from its inception" because only the federal General Services Administration has leasing authority.

A Pentagon audit released last month cites other problems with the contract. CIFA didn't notify House and Senate intelligence committees about the contract as required and apparently paid the company out of the wrong accounts, the audit found.

Brooke Smith, TKC Communications' chief operating officer, said the company didn't know about the audits until a reporter asked about them Tuesday. CIFA spokeswoman Louise Dreuth did not respond to questions about the contract Tuesday.

TKC got the no-bid contract because it's a subsidiary of two Alaska Native corporations, which get preferred treatment under federal contracting laws.

Congressional investigators reported last year that CIFA officials specifically requested the company because it had done work for another Pentagon agency.

In a written response to that GAO report, Interior official Thomas Weiner disagreed, saying TKC won the deal because its proposal met the agency's requirements. Investigators said government and company employees contradicted him.

WAR NEWS:

President Says His Iraq Policy Was Failing (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

President Bush said that his Iraq policy was headed to "a slow failure" until he changed course last week with the announcement that he was sending more than 21,000 additional U.S. troops to bolster flagging security in Baghdad.

The comment, perhaps the president's frankest admission that the previous strategy was not working, came during an interview yesterday with Jim Lehrer of PBS's "NewsHour," in which Bush detailed some of his decision-making regarding Iraq.

"I had a choice to make," Bush said. "Do what we're doing -- and one could define that maybe a slow failure. Secondly, withdraw out of Baghdad and hope for the best. I think that would be expedited failure. And thirdly is to help this Iraqi government with additional forces -- help them do what they need to do, which is to provide security in Baghdad."

Bush added: "I chose the latter because I think it's going to more likely be successful."

The interview was part of an ongoing White House campaign to sell the new Iraq policy in the face of intense skepticism from Congress and the American public. Bush acknowledged this view while sharpening his criticism of the Iraqi government over its handling of the execution of Saddam Hussein and security in Baghdad.

Bush said the Hussein execution was "fumbled" and "reinforced doubts in people's minds that the Maliki government and the unity government of Iraq is a serious government."

"It looked like it was kind of a revenge killing," Bush added. "And it sent a mixed signal to the American people and the people around the world. And it just goes to show that this is a government that has still got some maturation to do."

Bush also said the U.S. and Iraq governments share blame for the failure to stop sectarian violence from escalating in the aftermath of February's bombing of one of Shiite Islam's holiest sites, the Askariya shrine in Samarra.

"We should have found troops and moved them," Bush said. "But part of it was that the Iraqis didn't move troops. And I take responsibility for us not moving our own troops into Baghdad."

Asked why the troops were not provided, Bush replied: "I think the commanders there felt like it was important to make sure the Iraqis did first, or that the Iraqis made a focused, concerted effort. And they just didn't. There were supposedly six brigades committed and they sent two." He said that will change with the latest Baghdad security plan.

Bush was also asked by Lehrer why he was not willing to ask more Americans to sacrifice something, given the importance he has attached to the struggle in Iraq.

"I think a lot of people are in this fight," Bush replied. "I mean, they -- they sacrifice peace of mind when they see the terrible images of violence on TV every night. I mean, we got a fantastic economy here in the United States, but yet, when you think about the psychology of the country, it is -- it is somewhat down because of this war."

Bush said talk of sacrifice in Washington means raising taxes.

"If that's the kind of sacrifice people are talking about, I'm not for it because raising taxes will hurt this growing economy," the president said.

Bush Chides Iraq Over Recent Executions (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, January 17, 2007

President Bush said Tuesday the unruly execution of Saddam Hussein "looked like it was kind of a revenge killing," making it harder to persuade a skeptical U.S. public that Iraq's government will keep promises central to Bush's plan for a troop increase.

In his toughest assessment yet, Bush criticized the circumstances of Saddam's hanging last month, as well as Monday's execution of two top aides, including Saddam's half brother.

"I was disappointed and felt like they fumbled the — particularly the Saddam Hussein execution," the president said in an interview with PBS' Jim Lehrer.

A cell phone video of Saddam's Dec. 30 hanging showed the deposed Iraqi leader being taunted as he stood on the gallows with a noose around his neck. An official video of the execution of Saddam's half brother showed that the hangman's noose decapitated him. Both hangings provoked outrage around the world, but particularly among Saddam's fellow Sunnis in Iraq.

Bush said he had expressed his displeasure about the way Saddam's execution was handled to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The president announced what he called a new strategy for the war last week, with much of it hinging on his trust in al-Maliki's government to make radical changes.

"It basically says to people, `Look, you conducted a trial and gave Saddam justice that he didn't give to others. But then, when it came to execute him, it looked like it was kind of a revenge killing,'" the president said.

"It makes it harder for me to make the case to the American people that this is a government that does want to unify the country and move forward," Bush said. "And it just goes to show that this is a government that has still got some maturation to do."

Bush agreed to the interview, to be telecast Tuesday evening on PBS' "NewsHour With Jim Lehrer," as well as one last weekend on CBS' "60 Minutes" to help sell his revised war plan to the public.

Polls show that Americans are overwhelmingly unhappy with Bush's Iraq policy. Seventy percent oppose sending more troops to Iraq, as he intends to do, according to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll last week

Bush said if a pollster asked for his opinion about Iraq, "I would be one of those that said, 'No, I don't approve of what's taking place in Iraq.'"

He said that keeping his old policies in place in the war would lead to "a slow failure," but withdrawing from Iraq, as some critics suggest, would result in an "expedited failure."

"I am frustrated with the progress," the president said. "A year ago, I felt pretty good about the situation. I felt like we were achieving our objective, which is a country that can govern, sustain, and defend itself. No question, 2006 was a lousy year for Iraq."

Senate Democrats plan by Thursday to introduce a resolution denouncing the president's plan, with floor debate to begin next week — around the time Bush delivers his State of the Union speech on Jan. 23.

The bill, by not eliminating funding for either current troops or the additions, would be merely an expression of Congress' position. But it would help Democrats gauge Republican support for more aggressive legislative tactics, as well as embarrass Bush.

On Tuesday, Democrats were reaching out to potential Republican cosponsors. Several GOP senators have spoken out against sending more troops.

"The hope is to introduce a bill that would be a bipartisan resolution," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

House Democrats say they will wait for the Senate to debate the resolution before taking up their own. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., told reporters Tuesday he anticipates the Senate will have a "significant bipartisan vote" that will help set the tone for the House debate.

White House press secretary Tony Snow suggested that Congress' Democratic leaders think through the ramifications of any vote.

"In an age of instant and global communication, what message does it send to the people who are fighting democracy in Iraq, and also what message does it send to the troops?" he said. "But, you know, the House and Senate are going to do whatever they do. What the president is determined to do is continue moving forward in a way that creates conditions for success in Iraq."

As the president pressed the case for his troop additions, there were ugly reminders from Iraq of the tough job ahead.

More than 100 people died in several attacks on predominantly Shiite areas, including an explosion outside a Baghdad university that killed at least 65 people and a blast at a marketplace for used motorcycles. The United Nations, meanwhile, said more than 34,000 Iraqi civilians died last year in sectarian violence.

Bush Widens Iraq Criticism Over Handling Of Executions (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — President Bush said Tuesday that Iraq had “fumbled” the executions of Saddam Hussein and two of his deputies, and that the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki “has still got some maturation to do.”

The president’s remarks were the most extensive yet on the executions, and they pointed up the continued tensions between Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki as they try to forge a joint plan to calm the violence plaguing Iraq.

Mr. Bush expressed particular displeasure with the handling of Mr. Hussein’s hanging in late December, at which guards chanted their allegiance to the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who backs Mr. Maliki and whose militia has been a major source of anti-Sunni violence.

“It basically says to people, ‘Look, you conducted a trial and gave Saddam justice that he didn’t give to others,’ ” Mr. Bush said in an interview with Jim Lehrer of PBS. “But then when it came to execute him, it looked like it was kind of a revenge killing.”

The president has said that Mr. Maliki has given him assurances that political considerations will not hinder Iraqi and American forces from going after the militias, including Mr. Sadr’s.

But the notion that Mr. Maliki’s government will crack down on Mr. Sadr, a course considered crucial to the success of Mr. Bush’s new plan for Iraq, has been met with skepticism. And Mr. Bush said the handling of the execution only added to the questions.

“It reinforced doubts in people’s minds that the Maliki government and the unity government of Iraq is a serious government,” Mr. Bush said, “which makes it harder for me to make the case to the American people that this is a government that does want to unify the country and move forward.”

Mr. Bush spoke with Mr. Lehrer, host of the “The NewsHour With Jim Lehrer” on PBS, as part of a media tour aimed at rebuilding support for the war and, more specifically, the new war plan he announced last week. Officials have said that Mr. Bush was in part trying to build credibility after so many setbacks in Iraq by nodding to troubles there.

“We have to swallow hard and remind people the president realizes how hard it is,” said a White House official involved in the strategy.

The interview on PBS was the second shown in three days in which Mr. Bush went into detail acknowledging setbacks and public frustration.

“If you were to take it and put me in an opinion poll and said, ‘Do I approve of Iraq?’ I’d be one of those that said, ‘No, I don’t approve of what’s taking place in Iraq,’ ” Mr. Bush said in the interview.

“On the other hand, I do believe we can succeed,” he said.

Mr. Bush said on “60 Minutes” on Sunday night, “No question decisions have made things unstable,” though he added, “But the question is, can we succeed? And I believe we can.”

Democrats and even some Republicans have interpreted Mr. Bush’s plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq as a refutation of the suggestions of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which had as its chairmen Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman, and a longtime Republican aide to Mr. Bush’s father, James A. Baker III.

Mr. Bush said he did not disagree with the report's overall suggestion that United States military operations shift their focus to training the Iraqis and going after terrorists. But he said the Iraqis were not yet strong enough to take the lead in combating sectarian strife.

"They have a good strategy inherent in their report towards the role of U.S. troops inside Iraq," Mr. Bush said. "It's just that there needs to be an interim stage in order to achieve that objective."

Bush: Saddam Hanging Botched (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, January 17, 2007

President Bush on Tuesday criticized the handling of Saddam Hussein's execution, saying it looked like "kind of a revenge killing" that had eroded the American public's faith in the Iraqi government.

Bush said the hanging showed that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government "still has some maturation to do" as U.S. and Iraqi forces make a new push to secure Baghdad.

The president's criticism, in an interview with public television's Jim Lehrer, came on a particularly bloody day in Iraq. At least 65 people died in an explosion outside a Baghdad university. Overall, more than 140 Iraqis were killed or found dead.

Bush said that while he was "pleased" with the trials received by Saddam and his top aides, he was troubled with the circus atmosphere surrounding Saddam's execution Dec. 30. Cellphone video showed Saddam being taunted as he stood on the gallows.

"I was disappointed and felt like they fumbled the — particularly the Saddam Hussein — execution," Bush said. Bush acknowledged that the way the execution was conducted made it harder for him "to make the case to the American people that this is a government that does want to unify the country."

Bush has called on al-Maliki, a Shiite, to reach out to disgruntled Sunnis and to help disarm sectarian militias as 21,500 additional U.S. troops begin arriving in Iraq.

An official video of Monday's execution of Saddam's half brother showed him being decapitated by the noose. Al-Maliki said Tuesday's violence was the work of people seeking revenge for the executions. He called those responsible "a desperate group of terrorists and Saddamists." Also Tuesday:

•The U.S. military said four U.S. soldiers were killed Monday in the northwestern province of Ninevah.

•In Baghdad, deadly attacks were staged in primarily Shiite neighborhoods, including an explosion that killed 13 at a marketplace for used motorcycles and a drive-by shooting. Raad Abbas, 26, who was wounded in the attack at the motorcycle market, said he had gone there because the city had been quieter of late.

"Shortly after midday, I heard an explosion. Motorcycles were flying in the air. People were falling dead and wounded," Abbas told the Associated Press.

At Al-Mustansiriya University, Dean Taqi al-Moussawi told Al-Iraqiya TV that there had been two explosions. Another suicide attacker was thwarted, he said. Most of the dead were women waiting for vehicles to take them home.

"The terrorists want to stop education," he said. "Those students had nothing to do with politics. They only came to the university to learn."

•A new United Nations report said 34,452 Iraqi civilians were killed last year — an average of 94 per day — and 36,685 were wounded.

The U.N. report was based on information from Iraq's government and hospitals. "Unfortunately it is a war," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. "The actual number, whatever it is, is too high."

Botched Hangings In Iraq Speed Sectarianism (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

CAIRO, Jan. 16 — The botched hanging of Saddam Hussein and two lieutenants in Iraq by its Shiite-led government has helped to accelerate Sunni-Shiite sectarianism across an already fragile Middle East, according to experts across the region.

The chaotic executions and the calm with which Mr. Hussein confronted the gallows and mocking Shiite guards have bolstered his image among many of his fellow Sunni Muslims.

But something else is happening too: a pan-Muslim unity that surged after the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite militia, is waning.

And while political analysts and government officials in the region say the spreading Sunni disillusionment with Shiites and their backers in Iran will benefit Sunni-led governments and the United States, they and others worry that the tensions could start to balkanize the region as they have in Iraq itself.

"The reality of the current situation is that we are approaching an open Sunni-Shiite conflict in the region," said Emad Gad, a specialist in international relations at the government-financed Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "And Egypt will also be a part of it as a part of the Sunni axis. No one will be able to avoid or escape it."

This changing dynamic in the region, described by many scholars, analysts and officials in recent days, is a result not only of the hangings, the Iraq war and the Lebanese political struggle. It has also been encouraged by Sunni-led governments like those in Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, and some Sunni religious leaders alarmed by the rising influence of Iran, the region's biggest Shiite power. Far from Cairo, in a sprawling farming village in the Nile Delta region north of the city, Hamada Abdullah, a Sunni Muslim, said that after the war between Hezbollah and Israel, he posted a small picture of Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader, on the bare wall of his home. It did not matter that Sheik Nasrallah was a Shiite Muslim aligned with the Shiite state of Iran.

To Mr. Abdullah, Sheik Nasrallah was first and foremost a bold Arab resistance leader. But since the hanging of Mr. Hussein and since Hezbollah has pushed to topple the Sunni-led government in Lebanon, he has begun to reconsider.

He says he is suspicious of Sheik Nasrallah and his politics. "His whole army in the south of Lebanon, they are Shiites," Mr. Abdullah said. While some American officials and Sunni leaders say that increased tension leads to reduced Iranian influence, others say that sectarian loyalties are difficult to control.

"When Hezbollah did what they did in Lebanon in the summer, no one thought of it as a Shiite party; it was a nationalist party," said Taher Masri, a former prime minister of Jordan. "Now with the events in Iraq culminating in the way Saddam Hussein was executed and the lack of condemnation and total silence of Hezbollah, many people are examining the position of Hezbollah as a Shiite party."

Some of the region's Sunni-led governments and religious leaders used the hanging of Mr. Hussein on a Sunni Muslim holy day as a weapon in the jockeying for regional power.

"Sunni states are using this sectarian card to undercut Iran's influence because they feel that Iran was able to penetrate the Arab world after the fall of Iraq, which was acting as a shield against Iranian influence," said Marwan Kabalan, a political science professor at Damascus University.

Sunnis make up a vast majority of the Islamic world. Shiites, who lead Iran and the Iraqi government, are the next largest sect. The two split over who would lead Islam after the death of the Prophet Muhammad.

While the two have theological differences — and similarities — the gathering conflict is being stoked by a determination by Sunni leaders to preserve, or reinvigorate, their waning influence in the region — while emboldened Shiites have pressed for more influence.

After the war between Hezbollah and Israel, Shiite leaders seemed to reach their zenith as an antidote to a Sunni Muslim leadership widely viewed as corrupt, impotent and stooges of the West, analysts said.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and Sheik Nasrallah of Hezbollah, each won wide followings across the region for their willingness to defy the United States. Hezbollah and its allies pressed for more power in Lebanon and when rebuffed, began demonstrations intended to topple the government.

Now, fueled by state controlled media in many Sunni Muslim states, a divide, or at least an estrangement, is growing across the Middle East between Sunni Muslims and Shiites. Egyptians, for example, are inundated nearly daily with headlines, commentaries and television reports alleging Shiite transgressions.

An Egyptian-government controlled satellite service, called Nilesat, has been broadcasting across the Arab world Al Zawraa, a television station that shows what is billed as heroic footage of the Sunni insurgency in Iraq, American soldiers being killed and wounded, and unflattering images of Shiite leaders.

"Raising the ugly face of Shiites, expanding Iranian influence in the region," read a headline in a recent edition of Rose el-Youssef, a pro-government Egyptian newspaper.

In December, a top religious leader close to the Saudi royal family, Abdul Rahman al-Barak, said that Shiites, whom he called rejectionists, were worse than Jews or Christians.

"By and large, rejectionists are the most evil sect of the nation and they have all the ingredients of the infidels," he wrote.

Such talk is causing a creeping sectarian tension, political analysts said. In Mr. Abdullah's village in the Nile Delta region of Egypt, where many people had posted a picture of Sheik Nasrallah, there is a growing sense of disunity with Shiites that mirrors partly what is happening in Iraq. "Saddam Hussein was the one courageous man among Arab leaders," said Ibrahim Mustafa Ibrahim, a school janitor. "We saw how he was executed. We saw everything."

Forget Cash -- Lobbyists Should Set Support For Lawmakers In Stone (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

It looks increasingly likely that the Democrats will pass some sort of ethics reform legislation that, on the off chance that it would close some cash spigots to lawmakers, could require more creative approaches by lobbyists.

Well, not too creative. Fortunately, neither the House nor Senate proposals, we're told, restrict our favorite way for lobbyists to curry favor and gratitude -- and get extended face time with lawmakers: funding those eponymous charitable or educational centers -- the Sen. Preston Flubus Center for the Study of Left-Handed People, and the like.

Granted, these member-connected projects, such as the Joyce Murtha Breast Cancer Center in Rep. Jack Murtha's Pennsylvania district, are often worthwhile. Ditto the Sen. Trent Lott Library at the University of Mississippi or even the Burns Telecom Center at Montana State University in Bozeman, there because of former senator Conrad Burns. There are countless other buildings, programs and chairs named for lawmakers. (Best to give to the building funds, as the programs and chairs most likely will disappear the moment the lawmaker leaves office.) But either way, special-interest groups get to give money for things very near and dear to the hearts of lawmakers -- literally to a monument lasting far longer than a member's tenure. Nothing is as important to our representatives save reelection itself. And some contributions lead to those annual gala dinners at members' alma maters or schools where more face time may be had.

Best of all, such contributions don't even require disclosure. The institutional recipients may disclose the donations in their annual reports, or use the donor list to raise more money, but the individual members obviously don't need to.Once Lawless, Always Lawless?

New Defense Secretary Robert Gates is said to be putting together his inner office staff and perhaps bringing more new blood to the Pentagon. But it's not going to be easy.

First, there's the problem of recruiting top people to join an embattled administration in its last two years. It's especially hard to recruit someone not in government for a job that requires confirmation. In addition, Gates was happily ensconced in academia for several years and hardly thinking of returning in this position. Finally, he comes from the intelligence community, not the DOD world.

But maybe he could follow the example of Bill Casey, his late boss at the CIA, who was looking for ways around the agency bureaucracy to set up back channels with business leaders to make contact with some of the world's more odious dictators, such as Libya's Moammar Gaddafi.

As Gates recounts in his 1996 book "From the Shadows," Casey "bypassed" the operations directorate structure, "reached down and found an individual case officer he liked and trusted, and gave him the task of making these contacts. The officer's improbable pseudonym was 'Lawless.' "

Still is. And now Richard Lawless works for Gates. He's the deputy undersecretary of defense for Asia and Pacific affairs. Maybe Gates will introduce himself.Cheney's Smooth Talking

Administration officials -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and others -- seemed a bit off-stride, less self-assured, last week as they got a bipartisan hammering on the Hill and from the media about the war in Iraq.

It fell, once again, to Vice President Cheney to show how to take the long view in handling this sniping. On "Fox News Sunday," he told Chris Wallace: "Well, I think if you look at what's transpired in Iraq, Chris, we have, in fact, made enormous progress," and he noted that Saddam Hussein is dead. "The fact is we've come a long way from where we started in Iraq," he said. "Now, no war ever goes smoothly all the way. . . . Lots of times you have to make adjustments, and that's what we're doing here."

That's the ticket. Always bumps in the road in any war.Lawyers Group Name on Trial

Seems that the Association of Trial Lawyers of America (ATLA) was onto something when members voted to change its name to the American Association for Justice (AAJ).

Its archrivals at the U.S. Chamber Institute for Legal Reform (ILR) have proof that it was a smart move, according to a Jan. 4 memo to donors by ILR President Lisa Rickard. ILR paid for two national surveys and focus groups in three cities and found that the name ATLA produced a decidedly "unfavorable" response from participants.

But the name AAJ scored substantially better on the favorability scale, she said, "at 56 points, a 13-point difference, which is a statistically significant gap." What's more, "the name change has a lasting impression." However, when told of the name change, focus groups were aghast and quite "skeptical." And trial lawyers still come off badly.

So here's the plan: "If we begin to use the name American Association for Justice in referring to ATLA," Rickard said, "we become willing participants in their scheme to hide their real identity and we elevate their favorability rating. ILR will continue to refer to AAJ as the trial lawyers association in all public comments and written materials and we encourage all of you to do the same."

AAJ -- that's the trial lawyers -- spokeswoman Chris Mather said this "endorsement from the Chamber of Commerce gives me second thoughts" about the name change. She suggested the ILR might be called the "Chamber of Corporate Criminals." "They defend Halliburton, Philip Morris, Exxon and Enron," she said. "We are fighting for people and they are fighting for corporate bottom lines."

These folks really, really don't like each other.

Like Nixon Or Like Ike? (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

For the Republicans, there are two ways out of Iraq. They can either go out like Eisenhower or like Nixon.

As the first Republican to occupy the White House since the coming of the New Deal, Dwight Eisenhower could have chosen to divide the public and try to roll back Franklin Roosevelt's handiwork. In fact, he didn't give that option a moment's consideration. Social Security and unions, he concluded, were here to stay; any attempt to undo them, he wrote, would consign the Republicans to permanent minority status. Ike also ended the Korean War without attacking Democrats in the process.

His vice president, Richard Nixon, became president largely because of the public's massive discontent with the Vietnam War. We now know that Nixon and Henry Kissinger had no illusions that the war could be won, and Nixon probably could have withdrawn U.S. troops in a way that didn't polarize the public. Such a stance, however, ran counter to Nixon's deepest instincts. For Nixon, politics was about dividing the electorate and demonizing enemies. Even as he drew down U.S. forces, he did all he could to inflame the war's already flammable opponents in the hope that however much the people might dislike the war, they would dislike its critics more.

Today's Republicans now must choose between Eisenhower's way and Nixon's way. If they're like Ike, they will recognize that the war is lost and that public support for it isn't likely to be rekindled. A USA Today/Gallup Poll conducted over the weekend shows more than 60 percent support for a congressional resolution opposing President Bush's escalation. Even reliably conservative Republicans who are up for reelection in 2008 from shaky states or districts are bailing on the war (New Hampshire Sen. John Sununu is questioning the surge) or on their careers (Colorado Sen. Wayne Allard just announced he's not going to run again). To continue dispatching and keeping troops in a country racked by an intra-Islamic civil war, looked at from this perspective, only guarantees that November's Republican defeat will be a prelude to 2008's Republican rout.

A Nixonian perspective also acknowledges that the war cannot be won but believes that blame for the defeat can still, somehow, be placed on the Democrats. If only the Democrats can be held responsible for defunding the troops, if only the U.S. presence in Iraq can be prolonged until it falls to the next administration (which may be Democratic) to end it, if only enough Republicans on the Hill can be dissuaded from voting with the Democrats' attempts to rein in the war, if only the surge engenders some wild and crazy antiwar demonstrations, then maybe, just maybe, there's a way to keep the war going without destroying the GOP. These options may seem a bit far-fetched, but who believes that Karl Rove hasn't at least thought about them in his more contemplative moments?

How Rove defines his job these days is an interesting question. Since November, he's no longer the Republicans' master political strategist -- not just because November was such a debacle but also because the political interests of the Bush White House, congressional Republicans and the Republican presidential candidates are de-aligned and in some cases even adversarial. The man who'd hoped to make Bush the second coming of William McKinley -- a harbinger of a long-term Republican realignment -- now handles a president whose electoral impact on his own party could be nearer to Herbert Hoover's.

For a time, at least, the Republicans' presidential hopefuls can't really rule out a Nixonian tack. For New York's reflexively combative Rudy Giuliani, such politics may come naturally. But the need to win support among Republican primary voters -- the last group in American politics still sticking with Bush and his war -- could compel any number of primary candidates to bash Democrats for their dovishness. Besides, will Bush and Vice President Cheney really cease to defend their war even if the Republicans' eventual nominee wants to wrap it up? If Republican congressional leaders tell Bush that his war has no more support, will Bush and Cheney fold, or will they insist on continuing the war with invocations of executive power or any other doctrine that might work? (Memo to David Addington: The divine right of kings? The infield fly rule?)

The guy to watch in all this is the pooh-bah of Fox News, Roger Ailes. Nixon's onetime aide guides a TV network that is Nixonian to its bones -- Fox's raison d'?tre is to bash liberals, real or imagined. But Ailes can't be insensible to the war's effects on Republican electoral prospects. If Fox News were to break with Bush on Iraq, that would be proof positive that even the Nixonians believe there's no way, politically, they can salvage this miserable war.

The Right Bet In The Mideast (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

It was axiomatic during the Cold War that presidents should not gamble with matters of national security. The stakes were too high. The Bush administration's Iraq policy has long suffered from a lack of that prudence -- and the misplaced gambler's instinct is especially evident in the administration's plan to send more troops to Baghdad.

President Bush's "surge" is a mistake because it is piling more precious chips -- more human lives -- on what so far has been a losing bet. The public sent a clear message in the November election that it wants to take some of those chips off the table. That cautionary theme -- that it's time to reduce America's bet on the long shot that Iraq's sectarian mess can be fixed quickly -- was ably distilled by the Iraq Study Group in its December report.

Bush chose to go the other way, to pursue "an experiment based on high risks," in the words of Anthony H. Cordesman, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies who has written extensively about Iraq.

What prompted Bush's decision, by the president's own account, was his concern about the consequences for regional stability of an American failure in Iraq. To avoid the Baker-Hamilton problem of negotiating from weakness, Bush has chosen instead to signal American resolve in the region in various ways: by sending more troops to Baghdad; by seizing Iranian agents operating in Iraq; by sending additional warships into the Persian Gulf; and finally, according to the well-sourced foreign policy Web site TheSwoop.net, by working covertly with Saudi Arabia to support the Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora against the Iranian-backed Shiite militia Hezbollah.

These moves are especially risky now because they are played against the background of a Middle East riven by conflict between Shiite and Sunni Muslims. This sectarian war is destroying Iraq, and a similar war is perilously close in Lebanon. In this larger arena, U.S. strategy is hard to understand: We are allied with the Shiite government in Iraq against Sunni insurgents; and we are allied with the Sunni government in Lebanon against Shiite insurgents.

Edward Luttwak, a contrarian strategist, argued in the Wall Street Journal last week that by riding Shiite and Sunni horses at the same time, we have accidentally hit upon the divide-and-rule strategy that "past imperial statesmen strove to achieve with much cunning and cynicism." I fear that Luttwak is being uncharacteristically overoptimistic. The reality is that in neither Iraq nor Lebanon are we checking the rising regional power, Iran.

And it seems to me that our adversaries are doing a better job at this business of cynical alliances: Iran and Syria are the key supporters, respectively, of Shiite death squads and Sunni insurgents in Iraq. Yet although they are backing different sides in Iraq, Iran and Syria remain close and effective allies. Two years ago, a pro-Syrian Lebanese warned me in an e-mail that the United States would be caught in a "sandwich strategy" in Iraq -- squeezed by Sunni and Shiite fighters who shared a hatred of American interference. His warnings have proved chillingly accurate. He wrote me a few days ago to reiterate that, for Arabs who oppose American intervention, the operating rule is: "You kill us, we kill you."

The lesson of the Cold War was to be tough -- but also to be careful. I wish I saw more evidence of that prudence now. When U.S. officials encourage the Saudis to check Hezbollah by sending money to Sunni groups in northern Lebanon, do they understand that this region is a stronghold of al-Qaeda and that they are pushing Sunni-Shiite tensions toward the point of explosion? When officials contemplate regime change in Syria, as the Bush administration again seems to be doing, do they understand that they may be creating a wider band of chaos that would stretch from Lebanon to the Iranian border?

When the administration decides to send more ships into the Gulf as a signal to Iran, do officials understand that there are members of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards who might favor a torpedo attack -- so as to provoke an American retaliation and suck us deeper into an apocalyptic battle for control of the region?

In this volatile part of the world, there's just one area where I wish President Bush would take more risks -- and that's in diplomatic efforts to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. If you want to strike a blow at Iran, Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads all at once, that's the way to do it. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made a start this week, but this is one poker game where we should be adding more chips -- doubling down the American stake in peace.

WASHINGTON

Being president can be really, really hard.

DOJ_NMG_0117429

"Sometimes you're the commander in chief," W. explained to Scott Pelley on "60 Minutes." "Sometimes you're the educator in chief, and a lot of times you're both when it comes to war."

President Bush has been dutifully making the rounds of TV news shows, trying to make the case that victory in Iraq is "doable." He thinks the public will support the Surge if he can simply illuminate a few things that we may have been too thick to understand. For instance, he says he needs to "explain to people that what happens in the Middle East will affect the future of this country." Yes, Mr. President, we get it.

He also told Jim Lehrer last night that in 20 years, radical Shiites could be warring with radical Sunnis and Middle Eastern oil could fall into the hands of radicals, who might also get weapons of mass destruction.

So after scaring Americans into backing the Sack of Iraq by warning that radicals could get W.M.D., now he's trying to scare Americans into supporting the Surge in Iraq by warning that radicals could get W.M.D.

So many deaths, so little progress.

It's unnerving to be tutored by an educator in chief who is himself being tutored. The president elucidating the Iraqi insurgency for us is learning about the Algerian insurgency from the man who failed to quell the Vietcong insurgency.

During his "60 Minutes" interview, Mr. Bush mentioned that he was reading Alistair Horne's classic history, "A Savage War of Peace," about why the French suffered a colonial disaster in a guerrilla war against Muslims in Algiers from 1954 to 1962.

The book was recommended to W. by Henry Kissinger, who is working on an official biography of himself with Mr. Horne.

Mr. Horne recalled that Dr. Kissinger told him: "The president's one of my best students. He reads all the books I send him." The author asked the president's foreign affairs adviser if W. ever wrote any essays on the books. "Henry just laughed," Mr. Horne said.

It seems far too late for Mr. Bush to begin studying about counterinsurgency now that Iraq has cratered into civil war. Can't someone get the president a copy of "Gone With the Wind"?

Maybe it was inevitable, once W. started reading Camus's "L'Etranger," set in Algeria, that he would move on to Mr. Horne. As The Washington Post military correspondent Tom Ricks wrote in November, the Horne book has been an underground best-seller among U.S. military officers for three years, and "Algeria" has become almost a code word among counterinsurgency specialists for the mess in Iraq. The Pentagon screened the 1966 movie "The Battle of Algiers" in 2003, but the commander in chief must have missed it.

I asked Mr. Horne, who was at his home in a small village outside Oxford, England, what the president could learn from his book.

"The depressing problem of getting entangled in the Muslim world," he replied. "Algeria was a thoroughly bloodthirsty war that ended horribly and cost the lives of about 20,000 Frenchmen and a million Algerians. There was a terrible civil war. ...De Gaulle ended up giving literally everything away and left without his pants."

President de Gaulle had all the same misconceptions as W., that his prestige could persuade the Muslims to accept his terms; that the guerrillas would recognize military defeat and accept sensible compromise; and that, as Mr. Horne writes, "time would wait while he found the correct formula and then imposed peace with it."

Mr. Horne also sees sad parallels in the torture issue: "The French had experience under the Nazis in the occupation and practiced methods the Germans used in Algeria and extracted information that helped them win the Battle of Algiers. But in the long run it lost the war, because it caused such revulsion in France when the news came out, and there was huge opposition to the war from Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir."

In May 2005, Mr. Horne gave a copy of his book to Rummy, with passages about torture underlined. "I got a savage letter back from him," the author said.

The best thing now, he said, is to try to "get around the mullahs" and "get non-Christian forces in there as quickly as possible, mercenaries. As Henry said the other day, if only we had two brigades of Gurkhas to send to Baghdad."

Meanwhile, maybe W. should move on to reading Sartre. "No Exit," perhaps.

No Better Idea (LAT)

Max Boot

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

Both sides' strategies in Iraq are big ifs with big risks. The president's is worth a try.

PRESIDENT BUSH'S plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq has not, to put it kindly, been well received. But does anyone have a better idea?

Should we just declare defeat and go home? Not even most leading Democrats are willing to go that far. At least not yet. Most instead talk of gradually drawing down forces and possibly redeploying them either to Iraq's borders or to other bases in the region. There is something to be said for this strategy. But it also entails huge risks.

If the U.S. is seen as retreating — which is how it would look even if it were labeled "redeployment" — the fragile Iraqi security forces might completely disintegrate. U.S. advisors with Iraqi units could be imperiled. An all-out civil war could break out. Neighboring states such as Jordan could be destabilized by massive refugee flows. Western Iraq could become a Taliban-style haven for Sunni terrorists. Southern Iraq could become a launching pad for Shiite extremists bent on liberating their oppressed brethren in Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf states.

It is doubtful that an "over the horizon" presence of U.S. forces could do much to mitigate these catastrophic effects. Iraq is a big country — about the size of California. You cannot police Los Angeles from San Francisco any more than you can police Ramadi in western Iraq from Irbil in northern Iraq, much less from Kuwait.

It sounds reassuring to say that U.S. forces could be positioned on its borders to "contain" Iraq's civil war, but it's not clear what they would do there. Sure, they could prevent Iranian or Syrian troop formations from entering Iraq. But a conventional invasion is unlikely. U.S. soldiers would have much less success stopping the influx of foreign terrorists, cash and arms that goes on now disguised as normal commercial traffic. Besides, is it really politically possible for U.S. troops to cavalierly sit by while a few miles away ethnic cleansing or even genocide is being perpetrated?

Such a dire outcome is by no means foreordained if U.S. troops start withdrawing. Perhaps, as some advocates of drawdown suggest, the Iraqi government will succeed in establishing law and order on its own. But that's not the way I'd bet. And that's not the way Bush is betting.

After years of taking a rosy view of the war, he has finally acknowledged that conditions are grim and require more troops. Ironically, he is being pilloried for this stance by many of the same people who have been saying for years that we didn't have enough troops in Iraq.

Perhaps the objection now is that 21,500 troops won't make much difference. It's true that, according to the new Army-Marine Counterinsurgency Manual, effective operations generally require at least one soldier or police officer per 40 or 50 inhabitants. That would suggest doubling our current force of 132,000 to secure Baghdad and the entire Sunni Triangle (population 13 million). But it would be difficult to find that many soldiers in the overstretched and undersized U.S. armed forces.

That doesn't mean, however, that the reinforcements Bush is sending are useless. As called for under a plan formulated by military historian Frederick Kagan and retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, the five newly arriving brigades should be deployed alongside Iraqi units to live in Sunni and mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad. This is a classic counterinsurgency approach focused on securing the populace, and it has never really been tried before in the capital. It could work, especially if the surge is long lasting and if it's coupled with other vital steps — such as increasing the number of American advisors in the Iraqi security forces, instituting a biometric identity card to make it easier to detain terrorism suspects and enhancing the capacity of the Iraqi legal system to incarcerate more violent offenders.

If everything goes right, large swathes of Baghdad could gradually be brought under control. Then American and Iraqi units could pursue a "spreading inkblot" strategy — another classic counterinsurgency concept — to increase the pacified zone outward.

Of course that's a big if. It may be that we still don't have enough troops to successfully carry out this strategy. It may be that we don't have the will to see it through. It may be that we don't have enough reliable Iraqi partners. But considering the massive investment we have already made in Iraq, and the lack of good alternatives, it seems worth one final effort to see if we can salvage something from this dire situation.

Petraeus Time (WSJ)

By Reuel Marc Gerecht

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Can one back President Bush's new strategy in Iraq? Yes. For all its serious faults, his new approach is the first one since the fall of Baghdad to offer a chance to reverse the radicalization of Iraq. But it needs revision quickly.

Too much of this new plan leaves unchanged the disastrous approach of John Abizaid and George Casey, the two top generals on Iraq. The new offensive, assuming it doesn't peter out through a slow arrival of soldiers, or become enfeebled by "Iraqi leadership" in its execution, envisions a too-small U.S. force doing too much. Recent remarks by Defense Secretary Robert Gates -- predicting troop reductions within a year, and saying that we might not need an additional five brigades in Baghdad for a successful operation -- are a frightening echo of the self-defeating, undermanned optimism that came from the U.S. military under Mr. Gates's predecessor. * * *

The good news is that by emphasizing a military, not political, strategy to diminish Iraq's debilitating violence, the president has correctly set aside one of the primary factors destroying the Shiite Arab center. While waiting for a "political solution" to the Sunni insurgency, we watched Shiite timidity and patience turn to anger -- and to a revenge which now threatens the integrity of the Shiite-led Iraqi government. Gens. Abizaid and Casey had gambled that they could stand up an effective Iraqi military and police against the Sunnis before violence threatened everything in Baghdad. That bet collapsed with the destruction of the Shiite shrine in Samarra in February 2006 -- but the administration kept playing the same hand as if nothing had happened. The reversal of this soft-power, politics-not-troops mentality is an essential step forward.

Still, David Petraeus, who will succeed Gen. Casey as the overall boss in Iraq and who is one of America's finest, most adaptable commanders, may have to perform a miracle to compensate for this shortfall in manpower, especially if the required five brigades for Baghdad take months to arrive, and if Washington allows the offensive to move forward before he is even in charge. The president can pre-empt these lethal problems by ensuring Gen. Petraeus's rapid arrival in Iraq and by allowing him to determine how many soldiers he needs.

Nevertheless, there is a dismaying hesitancy in the military's and the White House's deliberations on this conflict. Although the president wants a new approach, the Pentagon, the State Department and even the National Security Council appear wedded to the past. The contradiction between what the president says and what his government does has never been greater. We need to move rapidly: The enemy is digging in and the drift to full-scale civil war is gaining speed.

The administration needs to rethink its understanding of Iraqi culture and politics, as the "new" strategy still contains ideas that have catastrophically guided American officials in the Green Zone ever since Sunni Arab insurgents started killing Americans in significant numbers. U.S. officials still believe they must soon see sectarian reconciliation, a reversal of de-Baathification, and a nonsectarian, equitable distribution of oil wealth.

All these achievements are meant to placate the aggrieved Sunni Arabs, who represent 15% of the population. But no one knows how many Sunni Arabs sympathize with their brethren who've been killing Shia. It certainly seemed like a very large number before the Shiites started counterattacking through their militias. The statements of Iraqi Sunni Arab organizations, the coverage of the Iraqi Sunni press and the region's Sunni Arab media, which often quotes and echoes the opinions of Iraqi Sunnis, suggest strongly that there is substantial communitarian support for both domestic and foreign suicide bombers.

For the serious ex-Baathists, Sunni supremacists and Iraqi Sunni fundamentalists -- the lethal hardcore of the insurgency -- it's still a good bet that they're not into democratic negotiations. They probably don't think much at all about an equitable distribution of oil revenues -- or wanting their jobs back in the new army's officer corps.

De-Baathification for the Shiites and the Sunnis is really about only one thing: the army. But from the moment the U.S. started building a more representative Iraqi military in 2003, there was no way in hell the old Baathist Sunni officer corps could come back. And now, with the Shiites killing Sunnis, even the most enlightened of the proscribed Baathist officers (this isn't a large group) know that return would be suicide. No one knows how many Sunni Arabs would turn against their uncompromising, murderous brethren and align themselves with Shiites if the right "deal" were struck. It's a very good guess that such men, if they exist in any number, would get mowed down by their radical compatriots.

If the U.S. and Iraqi governments are going to bring peace to the "Sunni triangle," they must break the back of the insurgency. A minority, used to the prerogatives of a communitarian dictatorship, the Sunnis have been trying to derail the new Iraq: They must come to know that they will lose everything if they don't abandon violence as their principal political tool. They must know that if they choose to cease their violent opposition, they will not be murdered for doing so. This means, as it has always meant, a combined American and Shiite Iraqi occupation of major Sunni Arab cities. If the Sunni community hasn't hopelessly gone into a dominance-or-death opposition, then it could still come to its senses, provided the violent hardcore among them is neutralized and the Shiites and the Kurds allow them sufficient access to oil wealth. Shiite death squads have certainly taught the Sunnis of Baghdad that there are worse things than infidel U.S. troops in their neighborhoods.

Baghdad is the first step. And as retired general Jack Keane and the military historian Frederick Kagan have been pointing out, restoring security in Baghdad will take at least 18 months and all the troops the president pledged. To quote Gen. Keane: "We need all five brigades in Baghdad as soon as possible. It will take three to four months to clear neighborhoods of death squads and insurgents, and at least the rest of the year to establish proper security for the population." This is going to be a long, hard slog. And the Americans, not the Iraqis, are going to have to lead it.

The president's stated contention -- that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's army and police will lead efforts to cleanse the city, while the Americans just support them -- will produce dismal results. Mr. Maliki's pride doesn't win battles. George Bush has been fond of underscoring the counterinsurgency success in Tal Afar, in which the Iraqi army played an important supporting role. If Gen. Petraeus is really put into a supporting role in the Battle of Baghdad, then we've lost already.

Gen. Petraeus will have to deal with Muqtada al-Sadr. The thuggish son of Iraq's most revered clerical family, he has become for many Shiites in Baghdad a rapturously praised defender. This esteem is merited: He, not any American general, increased the security of the average Shiite in the capital. And if he is smart, he'll attack the Americans before they have the chance to deploy much new strength. If the Americans successfully down Sunni insurgents in the capital, then they will go after Mr. Sadr.

But the U.S. military should absolutely not go after Mr. Sadr first. We may barely have sufficient forces to handle a one-front war against Sunni insurgents and holy warriors. We need to show the Shiite community, which by no means has embraced Mr. Sadr's radicalism en masse, that the Battle of Baghdad's primary thrust isn't against the capital's large Shiite ghetto.

The key here is how Shiites view the first encounter. If it goes against the insurgents, then a subsequent attack on Mr. Sadr and his militia might not provoke a large-scale uprising. And he just may play along. He and his forces were mauled by the Americans in 2004. Since then they haven't been particularly bold in attacking U.S. soldiers. Mr. Sadr has recently manifested some statesmen-like behavior, and has been more correct in his behavior toward Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the spiritual guide of Iraq's Shia and a bulwark of moderation. Yet Washington ought to plan on Mr. Sadr hitting U.S. forces -- another reason why Gen. Petraeus, who appears acutely sensitive to the Sadr conundrum, should be given as many brigades as the U.S. can rapidly pull together.

Wars are often decided by one battle, where the genius and resources of one commander proves decisive. We are undoubtedly at that point in Iraq. The Bush administration should ensure that Gen. Petraeus has everything he needs, and that any opposition inside the military to him and a larger, longer counterinsurgency campaign is squelched. America and Iraq probably won't get a second chance.

Senators To Introduce Resolution Opposing Bush's Iraq Policy (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Senate leaders will introduce a bipartisan resolution of opposition to President Bush's new Iraq policy as early as today, taking the lead from House Democrats who are increasingly divided on how far to go to thwart additional troop deployments to Iraq.

The resolution -- crafted by Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) -- will not come to a vote before Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday. But by sending it to Biden's committee this week, Democratic leaders will give senators from both parties multiple opportunities to voice concerns about the president's policy.

In another high-profile move, Democratic leaders yesterday tapped Sen. James Webb (D-Va.), a Reagan administration Navy secretary who secured victory in November on an antiwar push, to deliver the party's nationally televised response to Bush's speech.

House leaders opted to allow the Senate to strike first, reasoning that a strong, bipartisan vote there would splinter Republican support in the House, Democratic leadership aides said. The Senate resolution will not only express opposition to the president's deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Iraq but also lay out policy alternatives that have bipartisan appeal, according to a senior Senate Democratic aide familiar with the negotiations.

House leaders are beset by division over efforts to choke off the deployment through Congress's power of the purse. Moreover, antiwar groups are growing uneasy about a nonbinding resolution of opposition.

Thomas Andrews, a former House Democrat who heads the Win Without War coalition, said any such resolution would allow Republicans to voice their opposition to the president's policy, giving them political cover when they later oppose binding legislative efforts to stifle that policy.

"The whole thing could let Republicans off the hook with a meaningless, toothless vote," said Andrews, who has been meeting with senior Democrats on war issues. "It's a pressure valve that could work against us."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) promised yesterday that the House will move forward with its resolution, but he added that more legislation will follow.

"Iraq will not disappear with the vote on a resolution," he said. "Substantively, we're going to move ahead" through the appropriations process.

But it is not clear what that substantive legislation will be. The chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), and his allies on the House Armed Services Committee are continuing to push for a requirement that the administration may deploy troops only from military units that are certified as combat-ready. That requirement would seriously curtail future deployments.

Murtha's committee will begin closed-door hearings today with military officials on Army, Marine Corps, Navy and Air Force readiness; equipment conditions; the state of the National Guard and reserves; and the readiness of military medical personnel.

"We will most likely move carefully within constitutional bounds to cordon the funding in the Iraq supplemental appropriations bill . . . so that our troops in the field will be supported and the personnel, as well as the equipment, exhausted by the Iraq war can be rested, retrained and refurbished," said Rep. David Wu (D-Ore.), a Murtha ally on the issue.

Democratic voters appear to be solidly behind that effort. In a poll released yesterday by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, 61 percent of Americans said they oppose Bush's decision to increase U.S. troop strength in Iraq, while 62 percent of Democrats said Congress should withhold funding for the plan.

Antiwar activists yesterday presented Democratic House members an "appeal for redress," signed by more than 1,000 active-duty service members, reservists and National Guardsmen -- including more than a hundred officers -- urging that U.S. troops be withdrawn from Iraq.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is backing Murtha's insistence that Bush must meet benchmarks for troop preparedness and safety before funds for deployments are released, said Brendan Daly, the speaker's spokesman.

But some senior Democrats are skeptical that such a move would be politically wise, constitutionally permissible or legislatively possible. The Pew poll found that overall support for the withholding of funds was a tepid 43 percent. One senior Armed Services Committee member asked why Democrats would want to put their fingerprints on a war policy that is likely to prove fruitless long before legislation could have any impact.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.) noted that many of the additional troops Bush wants to deploy will already be in Iraq by the time Congress completes work on an emergency war-spending bill. That bill will not even be sent to Capitol Hill until next month.

Moreover, setting aside the money for the president's "surge" from the funds to support the 132,000 troops that are already there may be impossible.

"If you've got a shirt that's 90 percent cotton and 10 percent polyester, it's pretty hard to separate the fibers," Obey said.

Anti-Buildup Measure To Have Bipartisan Stamp (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, an outspoken Republican critic of the administration's Iraq policy, will join two leading Democrats in introducing a resolution opposing President Bush's buildup of troops in Iraq, putting a bipartisan stamp on the looming Congressional showdown over the war.

Lawmakers and aides said Mr. Hagel had been consulting for the past few days with the two Democrats, Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and Carl Levin of Michigan, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, to develop the wording of the resolution, which could be introduced as early as Wednesday.

"Senator Levin, Senator Biden and I have been working together on it and we are pretty close," Mr. Hagel, a potential Republican presidential candidate, said Tuesday night as he left the Senate.

Mr. Hagel said the intent of the resolution was not to "bash the president" or to call for the immediate withdrawal of United States troops from Iraq, but a responsible way for senators to register their opinion on the increase of more than 20,000 additional troops announced by Mr. Bush last week.

While Senate opponents of the buildup were preparing to move forward, Senate Republicans backing the president were trying to map their own strategy, considering proposals that could appeal to Republicans frustrated with events in Iraq but keep them from supporting the most critical resolution.

"There will be alternatives," said Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona, the third-ranking Senate Republican.

At the White House, officials were continuing to discuss the new plan with members of Congress, with an emphasis on lining up Republicans behind Mr. Bush's approach. "We knew this was not going to be an easy policy to explain or one that was going to be met with open arms," said a White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

That official said that the message to Congressional Republicans was similar to the one the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, conveyed Tuesday at his press briefing: that approval of any resolution critical of Mr. Bush's approach, even if nonbinding, would send a damaging message.

"In an age of instant and global communication, what message does it send to the people who are fighting democracy in Iraq?" asked Mr. Snow. "And, also, what message does it send to the troops?"

Mr. Bush on Tuesday stepped up his challenge to Congress to provide an alternative plan if it is going to criticize his.

"My only call to Congress is that if you've got a better way to succeed, step up and explain it," he said in an interview on "The NewsHour With Jim Lehrer" on PBS. "What's your prescription for success? And I think they owe that explanation to the American people."

In the House, the Democratic leadership said it would wait for the Senate to act before bringing its own resolution up for a vote. "We think it will be useful for the Senate to go first," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer, Democrat of Maryland and the majority leader, who predicted a bipartisan vote in the House against the troop buildup.

Members of both parties in the Senate have said as many as a dozen Republicans may ultimately support a resolution against the president's policy. Mr. Hagel's participation could ease the concerns of other Republicans about breaking from the president.

But some Republicans, including Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, suggested that Republicans critical of the plan could be reluctant to cast such a clear vote in opposition to the president and might be willing to hold off until they hear from Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the newly selected ground commander in Iraq.

The level of Democratic support for a resolution is not certain, though the overwhelming majority of Senate Democrats have expressed opposition to the buildup.

"If they have the language right, I will be right there," said Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska.

Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, has promised to raise procedural arguments against any proposal he sees as undermining the president.

Mr. Hagel was brutally critical of the president's new strategy during a Foreign Relations Committee hearing last week and spent some time on the floor Tuesday night discussing the Iraq resolution privately with Mr. McConnell. But Mr. Hagel said he did not anticipate an angry reaction from his colleagues for joining with Democrats, since he had such a strong record of opposition on the issue.

White House officials have dismissed Mr. Hagel as an established critic of the war who is now seeking to stake out antiwar ground in the nascent Republican primary fight for president.

Still, the officials said in interviews that while they believed any substantial Republican support for the resolution would be a symbolic blow, they were far more concerned about threats from Congressional Democrats to take aim at spending on the president's new plan. Officials say that they will rely upon Mr. McConnell to help head off any such move.

Senate Democrats Ready Resolution On 'Surge' (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, January 17, 2007

Senate Democrats will introduce their Iraq "surge" resolution as soon as today, as Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) moves to increase the pressure on President Bush to make dramatic changes to his war policy, a Democratic leadership aide said Tuesday.

At the same time, Reid's "war room" has launched the Iraq Accountability Project, designed to publicize Democratic oversight activities of the Bush administration's prosecution of the war.

Although details of the resolution were still being worked out at press time, the leadership aide said it would be a "vote on whether or not [members] support the president's plan" to boost troop levels by more than 21,000 in Iraq. It does not appear likely, however, that it will include language condemning the approach or explicitly disavowing a surge. Rather the resolution appears to be focused more on putting Members on record as to whether they support Bush.

Aides said Reid is attempting to carefully craft the resolution to appeal to as many Republicans as possible in the hopes of piecing together a truly bipartisan coalition. As a result, the language of the resolution will remain as neutral as possible to allow Republicans to feel comfortable casting their votes with Democrats on such a high-profile issue.

Additionally, while there has been talk in Democratic circles of holding a vote on the resolution the day of Bush's State of the Union address, a Reid aide said it was unlikely that would occur, since it likely would provoke claims of partisanship.

A number of Republicans, including Sens. Norm Coleman (Minn.), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and presidential hopeful Sam Brownback (Kan.), already have come out against the plan, while other members of the GOP — notably Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, who also has presidential ambitions — have been critical of the surge notion and Bush's handling of the war.

Last week Reid told reporters that he believed he would have at least 12 Republican supporters and predicted that he easily would make the 60-vote threshold needed to beat back any attempt to filibuster the resolution by Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

According to aides familiar with the Iraq Accountability Project, it is part of Democrats' broader public relations push to further strengthen public opinion against the White House's handling of the war as well as heighten the profile of Congressional oversight activities.

As part of the project, the war room will release a weekly schedule of Senate committee hearings focused on various aspects of the war, ranging from contractor abuses to emerging terrorist threats and appropriations requests. This week the Senate Judiciary Committee is holding hearings on "the plight of Iraqi Refugees," while the Foreign Relations Committee is holding a series of hearings on the "remaining options" for dealing with Iraq, according to a release from the war room.

At the end of each week, the war room will release "highlights of important hearing testimony, summaries of the latest news out of Iraq and a compilation of key themes emerging from hearings across multiple committees," according to a Reid aide.

Reid appears to be modeling the Iraq Accountability Project on his successful opposition to the White House's Social Security reform plan in 2005. At the time, Reid used a series of well-publicized Democratic Policy Committee hearings on Social Security, floor speeches by traditionally high-profile Members such as Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and "red state" lawmakers including Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), and public events to vilify the plan and build an early tide of public opposition to it.

Democrats Aim To Exploit GOP Split Over War (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 17, 2007

Congress is gearing up for a big vote next week to oppose President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, beginning with a nonbinding resolution that could draw strong Republican support.

It's the first step in a long struggle between the White House and the new Democratic-controlled Congress over the endgame in Iraq.

If a nonbinding resolution opposing the surge of 21,500 troops into Iraq is approved, Democrats could quickly move stronger legislation to build a congressional firewall against any future move to broaden the war to Iran or Syria. Others are testing the waters for GOP support for the ultimate weapon in a showdown with the White House – curbs on funding.

But the key to an effective push back – including the 67 votes needed to overturn a presidential veto – is building bridges to Republicans. The blitz of oversight hearings continuing this week gives lawmakers on both sides of the aisle time to sound each other out.

Congressional committees plan 10 hearings this week on issues ranging from defense contracting practices and US force protection to alternative Iraq strategies and the influence of Iraq's neighbors. Especially on the Senate side, Republicans have been among the strongest critics of administration policy.

"It's fair to say you saw 21 very concerned senators today," said Sen. Chuck Hagel (R) of Nebraska, after hearings on the administration's plan for Iraq before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week. An early opponent of the war, Senator Hagel called Mr. Bush's proposed troop surge "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam."

"It's now up to the Congress to give to our friends in the Middle East some reassurance that we can govern," he says. "Someone has to start framing up some reality, and this administration is disconnected from reality."

In public comments, Senate majority leader Harry Reid has claimed up to a dozen Republicans who could join Democrats in votes opposing the surge of troops into Iraq.

"It's possible that you could see 12 Republicans split" with the president, says Jennifer Duffy, who covers the Senate for the Cook Political Report. "They're in the minority now, Bush is a lame duck, and Republicans think that Iraq played a big part in losing their majorities. It's become every man for himself."

GOP leadership aides say that the size of the defection will depend on the precise wording of the resolution, which has yet to be finalized. Should Democrats go too far in their criticism of the commander in chief at a time of war, it could pull the GOP caucus closer together.

"One thing that will unite the Republican conference is if there is an attempt to cut off funds to our troops at a time of war. That will provoke a backlash from the American people," says Sen. John Cornyn (R) of Texas.

Sens. Gordon Smith (R) of Oregon and Norm Coleman (R) of Minnesota, who are up for reelection in 2008, were among the first Republicans to break with the White House over Iraq. Last week, they were joined by other critics from within GOP ranks.

"I am skeptical that a surge of troops will bring an end to the escalation of violence and the insurgency in Iraq," says Sen. George Voinovich (R) of Ohio. "I don't see that you'll end up having the democracy I once hoped for. I'm absolutely against the surge."

The pressure is especially strong on Republicans in states swinging Democratic. Sen. John Sununu (R) of New Hampshire, who is also up for reelection next year, says that the burden has to shift to the Iraqi government. "There's very strong expectation that they follow up on commitments, and this isn't an open-ended commitment. I have [doubts] that troops preparing to be used in Iraq can be effective against sectarian organizations," he says.

"I'm also disappointed that there still is not a formal framework for other countries in the region to play a more effective, constructive role in supporting the Iraqi government," he says.

Sen. John Warner, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, has been attempting to develop a bipartisan consensus on Iraq. "So far, he has expressed concern about putting US forces in the middle of a sectarian conflict," says spokesman John Ullyot, who says the senator will make his position known this week.

Meanwhile, Republicans still supporting the White House on the war say it's important that Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the new American commander in Iraq, appears quickly before Congress.

"He's the strongest spokesman the administration has, and he needs to get here fast," says Sen. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina.

Sen. Jeff Sessions (R) of Alabama, who has been a strong supporter of the administration's policy on Iraq, says that he's encouraged that the White House is taking up some of his concerns. In talks with the president last Monday, he raised the issue that Iraq needs to quickly "create a court system that deals with threats to the Iraqi state promptly."

He adds: "When people don't feel safe, you can't wait five years to create a court system."

Groundwork For A War Debate (WSJ)

By David Rogers

Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Democrats Expect A Series of Fights Over Iraq Spending

WASHINGTON -- Republican votes will decide the coming debate in Congress over the Iraq war, so Democrats are first working to build bipartisan support for nonbinding criticism before taking on the White House over funding.

The two-part strategy is on display this week as top Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee expect to announce agreement on a resolution challenging President Bush's decision to increase U.S. troop levels. As those talks proceed, the House Appropriations Committee will also begin hearings this morning to lay the groundwork for tougher fights over war-related spending requests this spring and summer.

The Iraq debate won't be one single battle but a series of firefights over the coming months during which events on the ground in Baghdad will be pivotal. Much as Democrats are emboldened by November's victories, they also have their own divisions on the issue. And Mr. Bush, whose powers as commander in chief give him immense leverage, has said he has no intention of backing down.

But the landscape has changed and left him more vulnerable on three points:

November's election shook rank-and-file Republicans, who are fearful of going into 2008 with the war still a major issue.

The planned troop increase has aggravated divisions in the Republican foreign-policy establishment, best captured by the opposition from Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, a Vietnam veteran with ties to two former secretaries of State, James Baker and Colin Powell.

The growing financial strain of Iraq will be spelled out as never before in a series of defense and war-related spending requests by the White House next month, expected to total more than $700 billion through Sept. 30, 2008.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice presidential nominee who already is running for the White House in 2008, is pressing hard for a vote to cut off funding for any military escalation in Iraq. But Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith, whose December floor speech against the war captured the post-election shift among Republicans, cautions Democrats against moving too fast.

"Democrats are wise not to push this too hard, but I think within this year, the issue will have ripened enough that the correct course of action will be clear," Mr. Smith said.

In the House, the skittish Republican mood was apparent last week as party leaders faced warnings that there must be real progress in Iraq before July 4 to keep members in line. That date also coincides with when Democrats hope to have begun debate on the 2008 defense appropriations bill.

The measure will include not only funding for basic defense operations but, for the first time, a request by the White House budget office for what it anticipates will be the annual war costs in Iraq and Afghanistan for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

The total package, to be revealed with the president's budget next month, could exceed $600 billion. On top of this, the administration is expected to ask for 2007 emergency supplemental funding, providing an estimated $100 billion in emergency appropriations to sustain military operations overseas for the remainder of this fiscal year ending Sept. 30.

Taken together, that means lawmakers will be asked to address -- in a matter of months -- defense and war-related requests in the range of $700 billion. Driven up by Iraq, annual spending on defense already matches -- in terms of dollars adjusted for inflation -- expenditures at the height of the Vietnam War. And these numbers could further shake Republican resolve.

"I think it will have an impact. Money issues may be put in play for real," said New Hampshire Sen. Judd Gregg, the ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee.

"For those of us from the Northeast, it's pretty evident that people are losing patience and want to get out," said Rep. Rodney Frelinghuysen (R., N.J.), a member of the defense appropriations panel. "A lot of people are peeling off from supporting the president."

Among Republicans, Sen. Hagel is most crucial given his standing on the Senate Foreign Relations panel, war experience and long attachment to prominent Republican foreign-policy figures. "This is not just Chuck Hagel charging out based on some 12 months in Vietnam," Mr. Hagel said in an interview. And if he should enter the 2008 presidential campaign, it could emphasize the divide among Republicans.

Mr. Hagel has stressed to Democrats that they must let "the system work" to build ties with Republicans on the war debate. "The American people have to have some hope that we're not just a bunch of political animals and we can come together."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) has kept himself one step removed and left the early negotiations to his Armed Services and Foreign Relations committee chairmen, Sens. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) and Joseph Biden (D., Del.), respectively. One option would be to have the resolution reported out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to give it more standing, and House Democrats have signaled that they could use the Senate product as a model for their own resolution next week. "I expect it to be a bipartisan vote," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D., Md.)

The nervousness among House Republicans is striking after November's losses. "Two years before the elections, people are worried about their political skins," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.). A Pew Research Center survey shows Republican voters rallying behind the president, but independents were the swing force in 2006 and by a 2-1 margin the same Pew poll shows independents opposing the plan to send more troops.

Thus, Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), who will manage the Iraq spending bill this spring, is convinced he can get bipartisan support even as he proposes to add restrictions that could impede the planned deployment of four more Army combat infantry brigades into Iraq. And, rather than cutting funds, lawmakers could add more money to defense bills, but then attach readiness requirements that must be met for it to be used. "It is not going to end because of any legislative action we take, but the legislative actions we take can help to bring it to an end," said House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D., Wis.).

Dems Struggle To Shift Focus To Afghanistan From Iraq (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 17, 2007

In addition to addressing the White House's Iraq "surge" plan, Democrats could be facing another quandary: redirecting attention to the war in Afghanistan and the search for al Qaeda's leader, Osama bin Laden.

Several top Democrats, including 2008 presidential hopefuls Sens. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), said a troop increase should occur in Afghanistan rather than Iraq.

Clinton, Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) and Rep. John McHugh (R-N.Y.) returned from a congressional delegation to Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq and are expected to talk about the trip today.

But congressional plans have yet to emerge for keeping a firm grip on Afghanistan, which is dealing with rampant poppy production and is at risk of sliding back into the hands of Taliban insurgents.

Several lawmakers fear that the Iraq plan will overshadow any efforts related to Afghanistan.

"Afghanistan is the biggest concern, but I see no concerted effort" to deal with the issues there, Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) said. "Iraq is the dominant thing and we have to deal with that."

Two years ago, Lautenberg sent a letter to Bush asking him why the United States had not captured bin Laden after then-CIA Director Porter Goss said he had an "excellent idea" where the 9/11 plotter was hiding.

"I would like to continue that pursuit," Lautenberg recently said of the military's efforts to track down al Qaeda's leader. "But the picture is so clouded by the discussion on Iraq that you can't really be sure that it is going to be successful."

U.S. commanders in Afghanistan whose troops are fighting alongside NATO coalition forces have called for reinforcements against resurgent Taliban fighters. Military officials said the number of attacks against NATO forces tripled year-over-year in 2006, to 5,000.

It has been reported that at least one Army battalion fighting in Afghanistan could be deployed within weeks to fight in Iraq as part of the president's "surge" plan.

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, said the Pentagon could send more troops into Afghanistan despite the strain the military faces in Iraq.

Although he said the U.S. focus should shift to Afghanistan, Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) plans to refrain from calling for additional troops there because he wants to ensure any effort is multinational.

"Democrats feel very strongly that the war in Afghanistan is much more directly related to the war on terror," Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said. "I am sad that they are taking another [battalion] out."

Schumer last year passed an amendment to the 2007 defense appropriations bill, allocating $700 million for narcotics eradication in Afghanistan.

Schumer was not alone in his victory. Two other Democrats, Sens. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) were successful in reactivating a CIA unit dedicated to finding bin Laden in an amendment to the same Senate bill that provided $200 million for the mission.

"We know from the 9/11 Commission Iraq was not involved in the attacks of 9/11. It was ... al Qaeda led by Osama bin Laden," Conrad said at the time. "That is where we have to focus." Conrad is now the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee.

"Everyone would agree that the effort in Iraq has diverted efforts from the operations in Afghanistan," said Rep. Gene Taylor (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Armed Services Seapower and Expeditionary Forces subcommittee. "We are engaged in two simultaneous wars and we do not have the resources that we would have had on Sept. 12, 2001."

Taylor, however, commended the U.S. military's efforts to find bin Laden under less-than-conducive circumstances.

"Seeing how big the place is, steep valleys and extremes of hot and cold — I can empathize [with] how difficult and dangerous it is for our troops," said Taylor, who has been to Afghanistan several times. "Osama bin Laden needs to be caught and brought to justice."

He added that the committees with jurisdiction over the military need to allocate resources for the fight in Afghanistan, but also take into consideration how difficult the terrain is in Afghanistan, complicating the military's mission.

Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), chairman of the armed services panel, is planning to hold hearings about the situation in Afghanistan this month. Skelton has been concerned that Afghanistan has been ignored and has called the conflict there "the forgotten war."

The key to finding bin Laden may not lie with spending more money on technology. Rather, dedicating Army Special Forces (known as white special operations forces) to missions wherein soldiers spend time in Afghan villages, establishing long-term relationships and building trust, could lead to information on the al Qaeda leader, according to André Hollis, a former Pentagon official with knowledge of special operations.

Unfortunately, Pentagon deployment policy (12 to 18 months) limits soldiers' ability to foster relationships with locals, added Hollis, who is now a vice president at Van Scoyoc Associates.

Afghanistan will be the topic of Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committee hearings, according to Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), a senior member of the armed services panel. He said, however, that the military has not asked for additional resources to find Osama bin Laden.

"They have not made any requests; they thought they had sufficient funds," he said.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the House defense appropriations subcommittee, said his panel will look at the problems in Afghanistan, including the Taliban resurgence and the growing poppy-seed production.

"Afghanistan is a little bit of a problem," he said in a short interview. Murtha plans to meet with Marine Gen. Jim Jones, the retiring NATO supreme allied commander in Europe, to talk about the problems facing Afghanistan.

Rep. Marty Meehan (D-Mass.), who will chair the House Armed Services investigations and oversight subcommittee, said he has solicited ideas from all members of his panel on how to go forward in Afghanistan. "There has been a discussion but we have to agree on a plan to do that," he said.

"It is clear that al Qaeda does not have its headquarters in Iraq; it's in Afghanistan and at the border with Pakistan," he added.

"The war in Iraq has taken [focus] away from finding Osama."

Bush Adviser To Join Staff Of Top War Critic (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0117439

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

A counterterrorism adviser to President Bush is leaving the White House to join the staff of a prominent Democratic senator gearing up to investigate the administration's war policies.

A Senate source said Todd M. Hinnen, a director for combating terrorism on the staff of the president's National Security Council (NSC), will become the chief counsel for Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. Biden has announced that he is running for president and is planning a series of committee inquiries. Some Republicans reacted to word of Mr. Hinnen's move by wondering whether he will go from Bush adviser to Bush inquisitor.

"Once again, people on the Bush White House staff turn on him while our soldiers and Marines fight to protect the rest of us," a Republican staffer said.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Biden did not return a phone message or e-mail. Mr. Hinnen did not return a phone message.

Gordon Johndroe, NSC spokesman, said Mr. Hinnen was a career prosecutor at the Justice Department who completed an 18-month detail to the White House.

"I think this is a career prosecutor who serves the government well whether in the executive or the legislative branch and who had done an excellent job here at the White House and will continue to serve the American people the rest of his career in government," Mr. Johndroe said.

Some key NSC staffers have left Mr. Bush's staff and worked for his opponents.

Most notably was Richard A. Clarke, a top adviser on counterterrorism. Mr. Clarke left after he failed to win the post of deputy secretary of homeland security. He joined the 2004 presidential campaign of Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, and wrote a book critical of Mr. Bush.

Before that, Rand Beers left the Bush NSC staff and served as Mr. Kerry's chief campaign adviser on national security.

Republicans have contrasted the way Mr. Bush handled his presidential transition compared with his predecessor. The Clinton administration fired all U.S. attorneys and tried to ferret out Republican loyalists, right down to the White House Travel Office. The Bush administration, on the other hand, kept on several senior Clinton advisers.

Mr. Bush retained George J. Tenet, President Clinton's CIA director. Mr. Tenet resigned in 2004, and has written a book that is expected to be critical of Mr. Bush. The CIA's Publication Review Board has been reviewing the manuscript since October. The CIA sent portions to the White House for its review. A CIA spokesman said the review focuses on the deletion of any classified material and does not censor criticism.

Last month, Flynt Leverett, a former CIA analyst who worked on the NSC before leaving in 2003, accused the White House and CIA of censoring for no good reason an opinion article written for the New York Times.

Purse Strings And Pragmatism (WP)

By Melvin R. Laird

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

The brewing fight in Congress over continued funding of the war in Iraq will not be the country's first. It is an ominous reminder of 1975, when Congress cut off funding for the Vietnam War three years after our combat troops had left. With the assistance we promised South Vietnam in the 1972 Paris Accords -- U.S. equipment, replacement parts and ammunition -- it had won every major battle since we left. But Congress lost the will to keep our promise and killed the appropriation. The result was a bloodbath.

I spent 16 years in Congress, much of the time on the Appropriations defense subcommittee grilling defense secretaries about the conduct of the Vietnam War. Then, as defense secretary I spent four years on the other side of the table, holding fast to an exit strategy I believed in, "Vietnamization." I never lost a vote during those four years. But it would have been devastating if Congress had cut the purse strings before our troops were withdrawn and before the South Vietnamese had learned to stand on their own.

Democrats are positioned to offer a plan for Iraq, but cutting off funding is not a plan. Holding hearings to excoriate the executive branch is not a plan. Emotional oratory about casualties is not a plan. Such is the stuff of dinner-party debates and protest rallies. It is not what the American people need from their elected representatives, and it is not what they voted for in November.

To Congress, which has the opportunity to make a difference, I offer some perspective:

? Congress must stop the partisan gamesmanship that feeds on itself and becomes an end rather than a means. It is a foolish sport that feeds the ego of the players and wearies the spectators. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid have already begun to squander the trust they were given in November. Surprisingly, at least from an old Republican such as myself, the best hope for leadership I see now in the majority party is Sen. Hillary Clinton. She is highly motivated to tread a path to success in Iraq; she knows that without it, she will never be president. Those who hope to win reelection in less than two years would do well to follow her example. In 1972, the Democratic presidential nominee, George McGovern, carried only two states because he had no plan for the war; he only criticized the Vietnamization withdrawal plan.

? The best thing Congress could do now is look at the bigger picture with civility and bipartisanship. America needs a broad national security strategy whose elements include the defense of democracy at home and abroad, the economy, the environment, health care, Social Security and commitments to our allies. In military jargon, simply fighting terrorism is not strategic; it is tactical. In crafting a larger national security strategy, Congress needs to both know and inform the will of the people. We never did this during the Vietnam War; nor has any Congress or administration in recent memory seemed willing to trust the American people to understand and make choices about what is at stake and what we are willing to pay in time, money and lives. Congress must also realize that if there is no settlement in the Middle East, the price of oil will more than double. Lawmakers must recognize the threat this poses to our economy.

? Defense spending must be substantially increased. Since 1986 the defense budget has been slighted while needs have only grown. The all-volunteer military needs better wages and better equipment. The troops today have what we lacked in Vietnam -- the will to win and unit cohesiveness and pride. What they don't need is a Congress that thinks it is doing them a favor by cutting off funding for Iraq. They need a Congress that makes national defense a budget priority. Even including the war in Iraq, defense spending is still a sliver of gross domestic product.

? Congress must take the lead in demanding accountability from the Iraqi government. Our troops are in escalating danger from Shiite militias because Iraq's elected leaders do not have the will or the ability to crack down. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been unable to keep the tribal and sectarian factions of Iraq in balance. We cannot do that for him. If he can't or won't do it, he should step down, or we cannot justify the continued presence of U.S. troops in Iraq.

? Finally, Congress must set the tone by admitting who the enemy is -- political correctness be damned. There is the moderate, Westernized Islam on which we have hung our hopes, and there is everyone else. The call to jihad is powerful, and it is apparently irresistible in the Third World where attempts to export Western culture and values have failed. If widely adopted, radical Islam will fail them even more in the end. And if allowed to play out to its goal of world domination, radical Islam will make the "domino theory" of Southeast Asia pale by comparison.

Kucinich Receives Petition Signed By Troops Opposed To Iraq War (AP)

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Several anti-war groups that include members of the military on Tuesday delivered petitions against the war in Iraq to U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, a Democrat who's long been against the conflict.

Iraq Veterans Against the War, Veterans for Peace and Military Families Speak Out sponsored the "appeal for redress" petition, which was signed by more than 1,000 active duty military members, according to Kucinich's office.

Among those who signed was 24-year-old Sgt. Jabbar Magruder of Los Angeles, a member of the Army National Guard who served about a year in Iraq beginning in late 2004.

Magruder said he was recently promoted and respects the military but does not believe in the war because he believes the United State's presence in Iraq is only making things worse.

"I cannot allow my fellow serviceman to continue to have to fight in Iraq when it's in no way winnable," Magruder said. "This might come at a great moral cost to me, but I'm willing to do that so they may be able to come home."

Active-duty military personnel are allowed to publicly object to the war, as long as they do not wear their uniforms when expressing their opinions.

Magruder said he signed the petition because he wants Congress to know there are some active-duty military members against the war. He said he is worried his unit may suffer because of his speaking out.

"But it's easier to sit back and wait for somebody to do something. I'm not going to wait," he said.

Kucinich, a long-shot candidate for president, said in a statement that "there is a compelling need for a new direction in Iraq." He suggested more use of diplomacy.

Troops Add Their Voices To Chorus Calling For Reversal Of Iraq Policy (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON - Pressure on Congress intensified Tuesday to stop President Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq, as some 1,000 active-duty soldiers and Marines urged lawmakers to support a quick withdrawal and anti-war groups planned to rally state legislatures.

Although most Democrats and some Republicans oppose Bush's 21,500-member troop increase, Congress isn't moving very fast to try to stop or alter the plan. Democratic leaders in both houses want their first step to be a resolution calling on lawmakers to go on record as being for or against Bush's Iraq plan.

Democrats say they have a solid Senate majority against the plan, including perhaps one dozen Republicans, so the resolution is effectively a symbolic vote of no confidence in Bush's war plan. Only after that vote will they look at ways to use Congress' power over funding as a hammer.

The Senate resolution will be introduced on Wednesday, but it was unlikely a vote would occur before Bush gives his State of the Union address next Tuesday night. Sen. Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., said Republicans would offer an alternative resolution.

House leaders plan to let the Senate go first, then vote on a similar resolution. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., the chairman of the House Appropriations Defense subcommittee, planned to start hearings Wednesday about how Congress might use the threat of spending cutoffs to demand changes in policy, but they'll be closed so that lawmakers can consider classified information.

White House spokesman Tony Snow suggested that Congress would undermine U.S. interests if it votes for a no-confidence resolution.

"In an age of instant and global communication, what message does it send to the people who are fighting democracy in Iraq? And also, what message does it send to the troops?" Snow said.

Separately, Bush acknowledged setbacks in Iraq.

"I am frustrated with the progress," Bush said in an interview taped for telecast Tuesday on PBS's "NewsHour."

"A year ago, I felt pretty good about the situation. I felt like we were achieving our objective, which is a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself. No question, 2006 was a lousy year for Iraq," Bush said.

Also Tuesday, the Senate Judiciary Committee examined the plight of Iraqi refugees. Some 1.7 million Iraqis have been driven from their homes, and hundreds of thousands have become refugees in Jordan, Syria and elsewhere.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, who chairs a subcommittee on immigration and refugees, called for more humanitarian aid for displaced Iraqis and refuge here for those who risked their lives to work for Americans in Iraq. Last year the United States admitted 202 Iraqi refugees, Kennedy said.

Meanwhile, more than 1,000 active-duty servicemen and women who oppose the war sent an "appeal for redress" to Congress. Although they're duty-bound to carry out the president's orders, they have a legal right to use this means to express their views.

The statement, carried on the Web site AppealforRedress.org, was signed by 1,080 troops as of Tuesday afternoon, according to the site. It urged Congress to support "the prompt withdrawal of all American military forces and bases from Iraq," adding, "Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price."

"Despite our best efforts, Iraq fell further into chaos," said Marine Corps Sgt. Liam Madden, wearing a jacket and tie for a press conference on the steps of a House office building. Madden said he believed that the war "benefits neither the United States nor Iraq, and especially not the American military.

"Our brothers are dying, and politicians are squabbling," he said. "If you are funding a war that puts them in harm's way, you are not supporting them."

"Somewhere those of us who represent the American people, and the American people themselves, must follow the lead of these men and women in uniform today and find a way to speak up and speak out about this unnecessary war," Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., said in a statement.

Meanwhile, the group Progressive States Network planned a conference call on Wednesday with state legislators to try to start a grassroots campaign opposing the president's troop buildup plan.

"States have the power and authority to speak out on issues that will impact them and their citizens," Steve Doherty and David Sirota, chairmen of the group, said in a statement.

The influential Web-based pressure group MoveOn.org is urging citizens to write their state lawmakers as well.

A Pew Research Center poll released Tuesday showed that 61 percent of Americans oppose sending more troops to Iraq. Some 60 percent of Republicans support Bush's plan and 33 percent oppose it. Among Democrats, 12 percent support it and 82 percent oppose it. Among independents, 31 percent support the plan, and 62 percent oppose.

The Senate hearings on Iraqi refugees took on a personal tone when a 27-year-old former translator for U.S. forces in Iraq, who used a pseudonym and sat hidden behind a folding screen, told senators about the dangerous work he did as a translator - including working in plain sight of Iraqis who covertly sided with terrorists.

He said he knew of many Iraqis who were tortured and publicly killed as examples of what could happen to those who helped Americans. He said he resigned after working more than a year for U.S. forces and receiving death threats. He received special immigrant status in the United States in June.

Military Members Make An Anti-war Plea On Capitol Hill (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

President Bush's plan to send additional troops to Iraq is facing public opposition from a slice of the American population that rarely speaks out: the military rank and file.

A group of service members came to Capitol Hill on Tuesday armed with signatures from more than 1,000 military personnel who oppose the war.

"We will not be silent while thousands die," said Sgt. Liam Madden, a 22-year-old active-duty Marine and Iraq war veteran who is helping lead the effort to organize resistance to the war from inside the military.

Madden and other service members leading the campaign, which they are calling Appeal for Redress, urged Congress to stop the troop escalation and find a way to begin bringing forces home from Iraq.

When the campaign began three months ago, White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed the first signatories as "65 people who are going to be able to get more press than the hundreds of thousands who have come back and said they're proud of their service."

The 1,000 signatories still represent a tiny fraction of the military personnel who have served in and around Iraq since the 2003 invasion.

But according to the group, those who have signed the appeal include about 100 officers. Approximately 70% of the signatories are active-duty military, while the rest are reservists or members of the National Guard, said Madden, who added that the group will not reveal the names of the signatories to protect them.

The Appeal for Redress reads simply: "As a patriotic American proud to serve the nation in uniform, I respectfully urge my political leaders in Congress to support the prompt withdrawal of all American military forces and bases from Iraq. Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. It is time for U.S. troops to come home."

Madden and other leaders of the campaign arrived on Capitol Hill as members of Congress moved closer to challenging Bush's plans to send 21,500 more troops to Baghdad and Al Anbar province.

A spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said senators plan to introduce a resolution opposing the plan today or Thursday, with a vote planned for next week after the president's State of the Union speech Tuesday.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said a House vote on a resolution would soon follow.

Democrats also announced Tuesday that newly elected Virginia Sen. Jim Webb, a pugnacious war critic whose son has served in Iraq, will deliver the party's response to the State of the Union.

Today, a group of anti-war members of the House, led by California Reps. Lynn Woolsey (D-Petaluma), Maxine Waters (D-Los Angeles) and Barbara Lee (D-Oakland), plan to introduce legislation outlining a detailed plan to withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq over the next six months.

The servicemen who came to Capitol Hill were greeted Tuesday by other newly energized anti-war lawmakers, including Reps. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio) and Jim McGovern (D-Mass.).

They were also joined by the anti-war group Military Families Speak Out, which says it has more than 3,200 members.

And drawing a deliberate link to another controversial war, a group of Vietnam veterans, several in green jungle camouflage jackets, also stood up with the current soldiers outside the Cannon House Office Building across the street from the Capitol.

"The movement in the military is growing just as the movement grew in the military 30 years ago," said David Cline, president of Veterans for Peace, a group based in St. Louis that was founded more than two decades ago.

Madden and other members of the Iraq war opposition have been careful to avoid the more extreme actions of some of their anti-war forebears who openly challenged their officers in Vietnam.

But they have said they were inspired by how soldiers helped build public opposition to the war in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

"If the war is to end, there needs to be a movement from within the military that is heard from," Madden said Tuesday.

Troops Uncertain About Iraq's Future (AP)

By Lauren Frayer

AP, January 17, 2007

Their alarm clocks went off at 3:30 a.m., sending members of the U.S. Army's 10th Mountain Division reaching for their M-4 assault rifles then trudging from their tents and trailers into six-inch deep mud.

Piling into Humvees, they rumbled through verdant brush along irrigation canals south of Baghdad, which provides excellent cover for bombs. Hundreds of American soldiers have died in these mostly Sunni Muslim villages since the war began.

But nearly four years into the fighting, some soldiers say it's getting more difficult to swing their legs over the edge of the cot each morning. With America's Iraq policy in flux, some troops say they're asking themselves for the first time whether the U.S. can win the war — or what winning really means here.

"It's hard to tell what's right here anymore," said Case Dewinkel, a 23-year-old Army specialist from Madison, Wis.

The soldiers said they do their jobs and leave politics to the generals. But the debate in the U.S. over the legitimacy of the Iraq conflict has trickled down to the soldiers patrolling this dangerous area.

Dewinkel and other members of the 1st Squadron, 89th Cavalry Regiment, 2nd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division gathered one recent rainy morning in a schoolhouse south of Baghdad to set up a makeshift medical clinic for villagers.

While Iraqis lined up in a dank corridor outside, a few American soldiers leaned against desks in a ramshackle classroom, chomping candy, chatting, pacing to keep warm.

They were reticent at first to express their thoughts about the war, but finally said they felt a certain apathy and ambiguity.

"There are a lot of reasons why we're here, but they're complex. This isn't a war like they used to be, like in World War II when there was good and evil and the direction was clear," Dewinkel said, scuffling his feet on the muddy schoolhouse floor. Rain poured outside.

He pulled off his camouflaged helmet and bulletproof glasses, exposing youthful cheeks turned pink from the cold.

"It's hard to tell who the good guys are," Dewinkel said.

President Bush announced last week that he would add 21,500 more American soldiers to the 132,000 already in Iraq. The plan would cost $5.6 billion, on top of $100 billion Bush is expected to ask Congress for in February for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

While soldiers back home prepare for the call to deploy, some here are asking if there was more they could have done. Others fault Iraqis for their slow progress. Some look inward, demoralized. Others dig in their heels, or urge patience.

"People have always said it's a critical juncture, but now we're really about to crest," said Maj. Web Wright, 39, an Annapolis, Md., native also assigned to the 2nd Brigade.

Wright said he worried U.S. public support for the war was waning and that U.S. troops could be withdrawn prematurely. He has worked too hard, for too long to strengthen Iraq just to walk away.

"I don't want to see what we've done go to waste," he said. "What's the solution then? If we pull the troops out, who fills that void?"

Wright said he worries that it is difficult to define what victory would mean in Iraq.

"I've spent two years here, and I want to see us win," he said. "I don't want to rush to get it over with. The problem is, what's a win here, in this a counterinsurgency fight?"

Sgt. Maj. Fred Morris found himself on a blighted Baghdad street corner at dusk, arguing with barefoot Iraqis about electricity.

Six men, surrounded by their children in tattered clothes, pleaded with Morris for help. They had no power or water or fuel, they said, and they had given up looking for work. Militiamen had infiltrated the local police station. Even their revered sheik left town.

"Look at what I'm up against," Morris told a visiting reporter. "They've got six grown men here, each owns a weapon, and they're complaining to me."

"I'm telling them, `Look, leave your families in the protection of some of the other men in town, and take up your problems with the local Iraqi authorities. Walk down to the nearest Iraqi police station or Iraqi army outpost and tell them, not me,'" he said.

Morris, 45, is on his third tour in Iraq, including Desert Storm. He said he's grown frustrated with Iraqis, who have become increasingly demoralized and more dependent than ever on U.S. troops.

"You guys have got to start figuring this out yourself," Morris said, shaking his head as he turned to walk away.

His Humvee circled through Baghdad's Dora neighborhood, filled with signs of the capital's decline. Women draped in black shuffled in flip-flops across sidewalks littered with broken glass. Downed power lines snaked through the roadside mud, where a black market fuel seller had lined up multicolored plastic gas cans. A boy stretched out his arms and pretended to fly, leaping across mounds of garbage.

Dewinkel, the Army specialist staffing a medical clinic south of Baghdad, pondered the future of the Sunni enclave where he serves, and of Iraq as a whole.

"I don't think it'll get any better. Once we leave, I think they'll go back to killing each other," he said. "They've already started."

Blasts Kill At Least 70 In Baghdad; U.N. Reports 34,000 Iraqis Died In '06 (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

BAGHDAD , Iraq — At least 70 Iraqi college students were killed and more than 170 others were wounded Tuesday afternoon when a pair of car bombs exploded nearly simultaneously on a Shiite-dominated university campus, the latest apparent salvo in the ongoing civil war between Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militants.

One of the bombs blew up a minivan filled with homeward-bound students of Mustansiriya University, which has come under the sway of a militia loyal to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr. Less than a minute later, the other bomb detonated amid hundreds of students streaming out of another campus exit.

The bombs sprayed fire, shrapnel and body parts across asphalt and sent flames and plumes of smoke into the air. Uninjured students and passersby rushed the dead and dying to an already overburdened and chaotic Kindi Hospital, less than a mile away, piling the victims onto wooden carts and the flatbeds of pickup trucks.

The attacks came on an already grueling day of sectarian and political violence in the capital that left at least 64 more Iraqis dead, underscoring the findings of a United Nations report released Tuesday that said at least 34,000 Iraqi civilians died last year in acts of violence. The figure, nearly triple the number recently released by the Iraqi Health Ministry, jibes with Times estimates that about 100 people a day have perished in political violence since the bombing of a revered Shiite shrine last February.

Also on Tuesday, the U.S. military reported the deaths of four American soldiers, killed a day earlier by an improvised explosive device near the mostly Sunni Arab northern Iraqi city of Mosul.

The university attack stood out for its grisliness and cruelty even amid Baghdad's grim standards. It appeared calculated to inflict maximum civilian casualties and heartbreak.

"I heard a powerful sound and I felt myself being thrown to the ground," said Qassim Salman, a 21-year-old law student who suffered shrapnel wounds to his head and left shoulder. "A minute later another explosion happened. I passed out and I woke up to find myself in a hospital. I feel sorry, sad and afraid."

The day's violence came as the U.S. and the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki stood under pressure to restore some semblance of order to Baghdad by implementing a new security plan and increasing the U.S. troop presence in the capital by 16,000 troops.

"It's like a disaster that cannot be described," said a police official at Kindi Hospital, who asked that his name not be published. The hospital, he said, was already flooded with patients from the day's previous violence and was short on bandages, doctors, gurneys, beds, medicine, blood and fuel for ambulances. Many of the victims were laid on the bloodied floor of the hospital lobby, moaning in agony.

"Most of those who are injured are about to die," he said.

As with many of the most gruesome attacks in Iraq, no group claimed responsibility.

The report issued by the U.N. said the anonymous nature of such violence fuels random counterattacks between Shiites and Sunni militants. "The root causes of the sectarian violence lie in revenge killings and lack of accountability for past crimes as well as in the growing sense of impunity for ongoing human rights violations," the report said.

The synchronized nature of the attack suggested the handiwork of Sunni insurgents with possible links to foreign Islamic radicals, including members of Al Qaeda in Iraq, which has made coordinated attacks its signature.

The blasts followed the botched hangings Monday of two former leading officials of the Sunni-dominated regime of Saddam Hussein, former judge Awad Hamed Bandar and Barzan Ibrahim Hasan. Hasan's head came off during the execution, which came just weeks after Hussein was hanged after being taunted by Shiite guards who chanted Sadr's name as the former Iraqi president stood on the scaffold.

Mustansiriya University, which lies in a religiously mixed area between Shiite Sadr City and Sunni Adhamiya, has been the site of sectarian tensions since Hussein was toppled from power in the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

Many of those attending the college are Shiites from impoverished Sadr City such as Arabic literature student Mohammad Jabbar, 24, who was wounded in the blast and watched his friend Ali Abdul-Hussein and his girlfriend Zainab die.

"He dreamt about graduation," Jabbar said. "He wanted to teach students."

Iraq's entire university system has become an ideological battleground since the invasion.

The Sunni-controlled Ministry of Higher Education was targeted in a mass kidnapping by suspected Shiite militiamen last year. Mustansiriya has largely come under the influence of followers of Sadr, whose campus deputies enforce dress codes and monitor students' lives.

Some students derisively call the campus Mustansiriya Seminary because students practice Shiite religious rituals on campus and alleged Shiite militiamen patrol the school.

"They are responsible for the university's security and they have done a good job regarding that," said one female Sunni Arab student, who asked that her name not be published. "We know that many of the students are members in Mahdi army."

Others say the activities of the security officers encroach on students' personal lives and heighten sectarian tensions. They sometimes demand identification cards and ask female students to cover their heads to show Islamic modesty.

The militiamen hold demonstrations on campus in which they call out Sadr's name and have shut down the school to honor fallen Shiite martyrs.

"The university's condition is miserable," one student wrote on an online message board. "The Sunni students are always targeted, and because of that, they can't attend."

Less than two hours after the university bombings, gunmen on a motorcycle and inside a minivan opened fire on a crowded market in the Shiite neighborhood of Ur, killing 13 people and injuring 19.

Several bombs targeting police officers in various downtown locations killed 25 people and injured 98.

Insurgents struck a bus in the mostly Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Sadr City, killing two people and injuring seven, and an ambulance, killing the driver and a paramedic.

Authorities discovered the bodies of at least 25 men in mostly Sunni Arab areas of west Baghdad, all shot dead execution-style in a manner associated with Shiite death squads.

Barrages of mortars struck several neighborhoods around Baghdad, killing one person and injuring 19. Gunmen shot dead a police officer in west Baghdad.

Protecting the lives of civilians is the major aim of the Baghdad security plan being implemented by the U.S. military and Maliki's government. The U.N. report said 6,376 civilians were killed and 6,875 were wounded during the last two months of 2006, a reduction of 2% from the previous two-month period.

The report painted a harrowing picture of contemporary Iraqi life. At least 470,000 Iraqis have become refugees in their own country since the Feb. 22 bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra heralded the start of Iraq's civil war.

Baghdad accounted for almost 75% of all deaths during the last two months of the year, according to the report. Most victims were killed after being detained by gunmen, bound and blind-folded, tortured with electrical appliances, shot at point-blank range and dumped into ditches. Among those targeted have been university professors, lawyers, doctors, clerics, journalists and musicians, as well as members of religious and ethnic minorities, according to the report.

Often, the misery doesn't end with death.

"Victims' families are all too often reluctant to claim the bodies … for fear of reprisals," the report said.

University Attack Kills 65 In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Twin car bombs tore through a leading Baghdad university as students left classes yesterday in the deadliest attack in Iraq in nearly two months, and the United Nations reported 34,452 civilians were slain last year, nearly three times more than the government reported.

At least 65 students died, boosting the number of Iraqis killed or found dead yesterday to 142 in what appeared to be a renewed campaign of Sunni insurgent violence against Shi'ite targets.

The sharp uptick in deadly attacks coincided with the release of U.N. figures that showed an average of 94 civilians died each day in sectarian bloodshed in 2006.

The university blasts wrecked two small buses as students at Al-Mustansiriya University were lining up for the ride home at about 3:45 p.m., according to Taqi al-Moussawi, a university dean.

The attackers stationed a man wearing a suicide belt in the expected path of fleeing students to take even more lives, but he was spotted and shot by security men before he could blow himself up, the dean said.

"The only guilt of our martyred students is that they pursued education. They belong to all religions, sects and ethnic groups," said an angry Mr. al-Moussawi, himself a Shi'ite. "The terrorists want to stop education. ... Those students had nothing to do with politics."

The university's well-shaded campus occupies several square blocks in north central Baghdad, a mostly Shi'ite area. The school ranks second among institutions of higher education in Iraq. Founded in 1963, it was named after one of the oldest Islamic schools, established in the 13th century during the Abbasid dynasty that ruled the Muslim world.

Thousands attend the university, known especially for its colleges of science, literature and education.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki blamed the attack on "terrorists and Saddamists" seeking revenge for Monday's hanging of two of Saddam Hussein's top aides, convicted with him for the slaying of more than 140 Shi'ite men and boys after a 1982 assassination attempt in the northern town of Dujail.

The violence yesterday against Shi'ites may signal a campaign by Sunni insurgents to shed as much blood as possible before the deployment of 21,500 more American troops.

Yesterday's death toll from the Al-Mustansiriya bombings made it the single most deadly attack against civilians in Iraq since Nov. 23, when a series of car bombs and mortar attacks by suspected al Qaeda in Iraq fighters in Baghdad's Sadr City Shi'ite slum killed at least 215 persons.

The U.N. civilian casualty count for last year was announced in Baghdad by Gianni Magazzeni, the chief of the U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq in Baghdad. He said 34,452 civilians died -- an average of 94 a day -- and 36,685 were wounded.

The U.N. report also said that 30,842 persons were detained in the country as of Dec. 31, including 14,534 held in U.S. military-run prisons.

As bombs detonated at Al-Mustansiriya University yesterday, there were a series of other attacks on Shi'ite neighborhoods in central Baghdad.

Of the 142 Iraqis killed or found dead yesterday, 124 died in Baghdad. Police said they had been unable to complete their tally of corpses dumped in the eastern half of the city.

Bombing At Baghdad University Kills 65 (AP)

By Kim Gamel

AP, January 17, 2007

An explosion outside a Baghdad university as students were heading home for the day killed at least 65 people on Tuesday in the deadliest of several attacks on predominantly Shiite areas. The attacks — and the announcement of four U.S. military deaths — came on a day the United Nations said more than 34,000 Iraqi civilians died last year in sectarian violence.

Attacks in Baghdad — including the university explosion, blasts at a marketplace for used motorcycles and a drive-by shooting — killed more than 100 people in a spasm of violence ahead of a promised drive by the Iraqi government and U.S. forces to secure the capital.

On Monday, the Iraqi government hanged two of Saddam Hussein's henchmen in an execution that left many of the ousted leader's fellow Sunni Muslims seething after one of the accused, the ousted leader's half brother, was decapitated on the gallows.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Tuesday's violence was the work of those seeking revenge for the executions, calling those responsible "a desperate group of terrorists and Saddamists."

The military said four U.S. soldiers with Task Force Lightning were killed Monday in the northwestern province of Ninevah, home to the city of Mosul, which has seen a recent increase in violence. The deaths raised to at least 3,026 members of the U.S. military who have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

In Baghdad, the deadliest attacks took place in primarily Shiite neighborhoods and appeared to be the work of Sunnis, who largely make up the insurgency targeting the Iraqi government and U.S. forces.

Raad Abbas, a 26-year-old wounded in the attack at the motorcycle market that killed 13, said he went to the market because the city had been quieter over the past two weeks.

"Shortly after midday, I heard an explosion. Motorcycles were flying in the air, people were falling dead and wounded," he said from his hospital bed.

As the curious gathered to look at the aftermath of the first explosion — a bomb attached to a motorcycle — a suicide car bomber drove into the crowd and blew up his vehicle. The attack appeared to target the mainly Shiite neighborhood near the market but also was near the Sheik al-Gailani shrine, one of the holiest Sunni locations in the capital.

The bombing near Al-Mustansiriya University took place as students were boarding minivans waiting outside the building to take them home, police said. Some police said the explosion was caused by a suicide car bomber and others said two of the minivans blew up as students were boarding.

Taqi al-Moussawi, dean of the university — one of Iraq's most prestigious — told state-run al-Iraqiya TV there were two explosions. He said a suicide attacker was later discovered with the apparent aim of targeting students as they fled but the attacker's explosives belt was detonated before students got close to him. He also said the students belonged to all religions, sects and ethnic groups.

"The terrorists want to stop education. ... those students had nothing to do with politics. They only came to the university to learn," he said.

About 45 minutes after the university attack, gunmen in a minivan and on two motorcycles opened fire on an outdoor market in a mainly Shiite neighborhood in nearby section of eastern Baghdad, police said. At least 11 people were killed.

Gianni Magazzeni, the chief of the U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq in Baghdad, said 34,452 civilians were killed — an average of 94 per day — and 36,685 were wounded last year in sectarian violence.

The Iraqi Health Ministry did not comment on the U.N. report, which was based on information released by the Iraqi government and hospitals. The government has disputed previous figures released by the U.N. as "inaccurate and exaggerated."

Iraqi government figures announced in early January put last year's civilian death toll at 12,357. Magazzeni said the U.N. figures were compiled from information obtained through the Iraqi Health Ministry, hospitals across the country and the Medico-Legal Institute in Baghdad.

According to the U.N. report women were particularly vulnerable to violence, but it said an accurate female mortality rate was difficult to obtain because female corpses are usually abandoned at the morgue because of fears the family's honor would be damaged. More than 140 of the bodies were unclaimed and buried in Najaf in November and December alone, according to the report.

Bodies of victims of sectarian violence often go unclaimed at the morgue due to security concerns or because the family cannot find them. Agreements are in place to allow unidentified remains to be buried in the Shiite holy city.

The U.N. report also said that 30,842 people were detained in the country as of Dec. 31, including 14,534 in detention facilities run by U.S.-led multinational forces.

It pointed to killings targeting police, who are seen by insurgents as collaborating with the U.S. effort in Iraq. The report said the Interior Ministry had reported on Dec. 24 that 12,000 police officers had been killed since the war started in 2003.

The report also painted a grim picture for other sectors of Iraqi society, saying the violence has disrupted education by forcing schools and universities to close as well as sending professionals fleeing from the country. At least 470,094 people throughout Iraq have been forced to leave their homes since the bombing in Samarra, according to the report.

In Monday's execution, a thickset Barzan Ibrahim plunged through the trap door and was beheaded by the jerk of the thick rope at the end of his fall, in the same execution chamber where Saddam was hanged a little over two weeks earlier.

Dozens of people, mostly schoolchildren, read Quranic verses at the graves near Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, as mourning continued for Ibrahim, Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court under Saddam.

Some 150 youths also staged a demonstration, chanting "down with the pro-Iranian government" and "glory to Barzan," and hundreds later assembled for a memorial service, but it was calmer than the day before when at least 3,000 angry Sunnis assembled for the burials in nearby Ouja.

3 Bombs Kill At Least 70 At University In Baghdad (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 16 — At least 70 people were killed at a largely Shiite university in northeastern Baghdad on Tuesday when a wave of explosions tore through a crowd of students and employees leaving the main gate minutes after classes ended.

Witnesses said the lethal strike of two car bombs and a suicide bomber at Mustansiriya University left the campus littered with shattered glass, body parts, ashen books and charred metal.

As one of the most deadly attacks on Shiites since the summer, it suggested that Sunni insurgents remain unfazed, even brash, in the face of the American military's newest plan to secure the capital.

The attacks came only a day after a fresh spark for Sunni outrage: on Monday, the sudden hanging of Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Saddam Hussein's half brother, and Awad Hamad al-Bandar, Mr. Hussein's former chief judge, ended with Mr. Ibrahim's head being severed from his body by the noose.

And if the bombs at Mustansiriya — capping a day of attacks in other Shiite neighborhoods of Baghdad — amounted to a show of Sunni force, they also highlighted the divisions between the Shiite-led government and the Americans.

In all, at least 108 people were killed in the capital, an Interior Ministry official said, and 25 more were found dead, many showing signs of torture.

American officials have emphasized that such violence justifies the imminent addition of 20,000 troops to make an immediate push to pacify the country.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal Al-Maliki, by contrast, issued a statement after the bombings blaming supporters of Iraq's "buried regime" for the violence, stressing again that Sunnis lay at the heart of the country's problems. He has repeatedly rejected American efforts to crack down on Shiite militias that attack Sunnis, and has demanded control of the effort to bring peace to the country.

His support for the American plan to add troops and stamp out violence from both sects has been tepid at best. On Tuesday, his office released a statement emphasizing that Iraq would continue to build up its armed forces "to prepare for the withdrawal of the multinational forces from the cities or the withdrawal of 50,000 American soldiers from Iraq."

Meanwhile, four American soldiers, from the First Cavalry Division, were killed Monday by a roadside bomb in Ninewa Province, northwest of Baghdad.

Sectarian vigilantes, insurgents and criminals seem to be directing Baghdad's daily life. For many Iraqis on Tuesday at least, the additional 20,000 American troops called for under President Bush's latest strategy were still understudies to the pounding drama of sectarian revenge.

Mr. Maliki announced that he had met with the Sunni speaker of Parliament, Mahmoud al-Mashadani, to address plans for national reconciliation, yet Iraqis seemed to barely notice. For much of the day, the reach of both the American military and the Iraqi government seemed to stop at the university's main gate.

Taqi al-Mussawi, president of Mustansiriya University, said it had not been the first strike at the university, one of the country's most prominent, which takes its name from a medieval college of Sunni Islam.

All over Iraq, academics have been a magnet for bombings, kidnappings and assassinations for more than a year, in what appears to be a concerted effort to drive out the middle class, the secular and the educated.

But Mr. Mussawi and other witnesses said Tuesday's violence seemed to be an escalation of the campaign. The force of the car bombs in particular shattered glass in the university's academic headquarters 100 yards away, and turned windows, desks and supplies into shrapnel.

Mariam Hussein, 20, a literature student, said she had barely escaped injury while standing near the front gate in the crowd. The first blast seemed to come from a minibus a few steps away, she said; the second from near a restaurant down the block.

"I saw remains of human flesh," she said. "It was horrifying. Flesh and blood were everywhere. People started to run, and there was a state of chaos. Some people fell on the ground and got trampled by others."

The death toll from the blasts seemed to have been Baghdad's largest from a single coordinated attack since this summer, when a series of explosions killed dozens in Sadr City, the capital's largest Shiite enclave.

Mr. Mussawi said it could have been worse: the suicide bomber detonated his load only after guards discovered his intent and shot him. He said the guards were able to warn people away from the bomber before he could kill anyone else, though two were wounded.

At least 169 people were wounded from the three blasts, according to an Interior Ministry official.

For some, the consequences arrived slowly. Ali Kamal, 25, survived intact, with only shards of glass strewn through the photography store nearby where he worked. He said he had run outside and watched, shocked.

"Later I heard that two of my relatives who own a small shop near the university to sell soft drinks and cigarettes were taken to the hospital," he said. "One of them died, and the other is in a coma. I still can't believe what happened."

Elsewhere in Baghdad, a car bomb killed six people in Sadr City, an Interior Ministry official said. Twelve others were killed in a Shiite area near downtown when gunmen opened fire.

Two policemen and two civilians in the Shiite area of Karada in central Baghdad also died when a roadside bomb exploded after the police had set out to defuse it.

They had already knocked out one bomb when they discovered the second.

The familiar mix of shock, disgust and sadness could be found wherever the violence appeared. On Kifah Street, in a mixed Sunni and Shiite neighborhood, two bombs exploded in quick succession near a market for motorcycle parts and car stereos, killing at least 15 people.

"I lost my uncle," one man shouted. "I lost my brother," said another.

As a group gathered at the site, a convoy of American Humvees drove past. An old man spit on them, shouting, "You are the ones who brought to us all this disaster."

Bombings Kill 60 At University In Baghdad (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 16 -- The coordinated detonation of two bombs during the after-school rush at a Baghdad university killed at least 60 people Tuesday and wounded more than 140 in what university officials described as one of the deadliest attacks on academia since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

The spate of killings, which also included a bombing outside a Sunni Muslim shrine in a predominantly Shiite neighborhood of central Baghdad, made plain the difficulties facing U.S. and Iraqi troops poised for their latest effort to tamp down rampant violence in the capital. It coincided with a report from the United Nations that said 34,452 Iraqi civilians died violently last year -- an average of 94 per day -- an estimate nearly triple the death toll provided by three Iraqi government ministries.

Gianni Magazzeni, chief of the U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq, said the killings were driven by strife between Sunni and Shiite militants. "Without significant progress in the rule of law, sectarian violence will continue indefinitely and eventually spiral out of control," he said.

News agencies reported that at least 30 other people died violently in Iraq on Tuesday, bringing the day's total to about 100.

At Mustansiriya University, sophomore Dyana Ayad had finished her Arabic elocution test, then walked through the college gardens, turned right toward a pedestrian overpass and joined the crowd of students waiting for buses. The pressure filled her ears a split second before she heard the sound of a bomb.

"I saw unbelievable things," the 20-year-old recalled Tuesday night. "There were tiny pieces of papers, burned papers everywhere. And dark smoke, white smoke. . . . I saw arms, legs, body parts flying in the air. The sky was raining burning paper and body parts."

Firefighters and police sped to the scene of the wreckage, near Palestine Street in eastern Baghdad, doused the flaming cars and buses, and ferried bloodied students to hospitals throughout the city. Students ran in panic to find their friends, witnesses said, picking through what one student called "pieces of meat."

The university's assistant president, Fadhil al-Amri, found a human head on the ground outside his office, next to a severed hand.

"No matter what I say to you, it is nothing like what happened. It is terrible," Amri said. "The terrorists are walking the streets in larger numbers than the policemen or the soldiers in the army. They can't do anything. There is no safety in this country."

About 24,000 students attend state-run Mustansiriya University's three colleges, in a middle-class Sunni Arab and Shiite Muslim neighborhood. University officials said there was no obvious sectarian motive behind the attack. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki blamed the bombings on supporters of deposed president Saddam Hussein. On Monday, two of Hussein's co-defendants were hanged for crimes against humanity; Hussein was executed Dec. 30.

"The followers of the ousted regime have been dealt a blow and their dreams buried forever," Maliki said in a statement. "So Saddamists and terrorists now target the world of knowledge and committed this act today against the innocent students of Mustansiriya University."Insurgent Threats

In early December, the insurgent group Ansar al-Sunna distributed statements at mosques in western Baghdad, and on Web sites, calling on students and professors to cancel classes in preparation for a purge of Shiite militias from campuses. A Dec. 3 statement named Mustansiriya University as one of the schools that should be closed.

Following a mass kidnapping at a government educational agency in November, Maliki issued a statement Dec. 5 calling on students and teachers to "not pay attention to those desperate attempts" and said students "who will not attend lectures will be dismissed."

According to the Iraqi Ministry of Higher Education, at least 155 education professionals have been killed since 2003 in a climate of growing Islamic extremism.

President Bush is sending an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, and the majority will deploy to a capital city ever more entrenched in sectarian enclaves, guarded by homespun militias. Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari said in a televised interview that the insurgents were expending their surplus bombs in anticipation of the security crackdown.

The U.S. military said Tuesday that four U.S. soldiers were killed Monday in Nineveh province in northern Iraq. The soldiers were members of Task Force Lightning assigned to the 4th Brigade, 1st Cavalry Division. The military did not release the soldiers' names or other information about the circumstances of their deaths.Varying Death Counts

In the last two months of 2006, 6,376 civilians were killed in Iraq, three-quarters of them in Baghdad, the U.N. report said. While the figure represents a slight decrease from the previous two-month period, the "extra-judicial executions, rampant and indiscriminate killings of civilians went virtually unchecked during the months of November and December," the report said.

Death tolls in Iraq are controversial because they vary so widely and because there is no uniform, transparent system of tabulating killings throughout the country. The 2006 civilian death toll of 34,452 provided by the United Nations -- drawn from the Health Ministry, hospital reports and the Medico-Legal Institute in Baghdad -- exceeded figures released by the Iraqi government.

Iraq's ministries of defense, health and interior said in early January that there were 12,357 violent civilian deaths last year. An Interior Ministry spokesman, Abdul Kareem al-Kinani, said Tuesday that the U.N. figures were "incorrect, unsuccessful and very exaggerated."Mayhem at Campus

Just before the 4 p.m. bombing at Mustansiriya, sophomore Zainab Rashid, 20, stood near the campus waiting for a bus and was coping with a pounding headache, she said later. She heard an explosion and saw a mushroom of smoke rise into the air. At one point in the chaos that followed, her friend started screaming and suddenly backed up.

"When I looked down I saw a man's head between her legs on the ground," Rashid said.

As police cordoned off the neighborhood, students and faculty members began loading wounded people into cars to take them to hospitals. Several male students were leading Rashid and her friends away from the bombing site when the second explosion occurred.

"They said, 'Don't stop, keep going, keep going,' and pushed us away," she said. "We were asking, 'Are our friends okay?' They said, 'Don't ask.' "

Many of the injured were taken to Kindi Hospital, the major hospital for eastern Baghdad. A piece of notebook paper taped to a wall of the emergency room listed 69 names under the heading "the university wounded." At the entrance to the ward, a hospital employee pushed a mop through blood and mud, soap and water.

In one corridor, a woman dressed in black stood alone sobbing into her cellphone. She said her son was bleeding all over his body, and when doctors gave him more blood he bled that out, too.

Three seniors from the chemistry department, whose friend died in the bombings, stood near the entrance to the emergency room. A cellphone rang. One of the students spoke into the phone: "Is it true?" He knelt down by a desk, put his head between his arms and started to cry.

When Rashid made it home, she said, she found her mother slumped on the pavement outside. At the sight of Rashid, her mother pushed herself up and ran to her. "She held me tight, kissed me, and kept kissing and kissing me in a hysterical way," Rashid said.

Her mother pushed Rashid out to arm's length, studied her face and looked her up and down as if she doubted her presence.

"You will never leave the house again," her mother said, Rashid recalled. "You will never go to the university. That's it. We will never stay in Iraq."

Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi, Naseer Nouri and Waleed Saffar contributed to this report.

Iraqi Death Toll Exceeded 34,000 In '06, U.N. Says (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 16 — The United Nations reported Tuesday that more than 34,000 Iraqis were killed in violence last year, a figure that represents the first comprehensive annual count of civilian deaths and a vivid measure of the failure of the Iraqi government and American military to provide security.

The report was the first attempt at hand-counting individual deaths for an entire year. It was compiled using reports from morgues, hospitals and municipal authorities across Iraq, and was nearly three times higher than an estimate for 2006 compiled from Iraqi ministry tallies by The Associated Press earlier this month.

Numbers of civilian deaths have become the central indicator for the trajectory of the war, and are extremely delicate for both Iraqi and American officials. Both follow the tallies, but neither will release them.

An Iraqi government spokesman called the count exaggerated, and said that it had been obtained using “incorrect sources.” Though the government closely tracks deaths through the Interior and Health Ministries, he said it did not have a system in place for compiling a comprehensive figure.

Despite the criticism from the Iraqi government, the United Nations said it used only official sources, most of which relied on counts of death certificates. A vast majority of Iraqi deaths are registered, at least to local authorities, so that Iraqis can prove inheritance and receive government compensation. Some deaths still go unreported, however, and the United Nations tally may in fact be lower than the true number of deaths nationwide.

As death tolls have risen, the lack of security has become the single most important barrier to success of the American enterprise here. The numbers of dead, at least at the Baghdad morgue, are running at double their number in 2005.

Underscoring the challenge, even as the United Nations released its figure — 34,452 deaths, a number that does not yet include the December totals from all provinces — at least 70 more Iraqis were killed on Tuesday when a series of bomb blasts struck a largely Shiite university in northeast Baghdad.

After almost four years of war, in which Americans have focused largely on fighting an elusive enemy — Sunni militants and, more recently, Shiite death squads — military commanders say keeping Iraqis alive has now moved to the center of the new strategy proposed by President Bush.

For many Iraqis, the pledge comes too late. The numbers reported by the United Nations were more than tenfold the number of American deaths for the entire war. As previous attempts to secure Baghdad have failed, tens of thousands of middle-class Iraqis have given up and fled the country. Those who remain are becoming increasingly radicalized as the violence draws them into a cycle of revenge.

The United Nations report said an average of 94 Iraqis died every day in 2006, with about half the deaths occurring in the capital. A majority died from gunshot wounds, in execution-style killings that are a common method for death squads, both Sunni and Shiite. The report registered the most lethal month as October, with deaths declining slightly in November and December.

Violence between Sunnis and Shiites, virtually unheard of in the early years of the war, has become the main driver of the tallies.

Military commanders have acknowledged that they underestimated the seriousness of the sectarian killings, which took off after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra last year drew Shiites into the war. Before that, Sunni militants did most of the killing. Now, the capital is mired in violence, as the two groups fight bitterly over territory.

In the shootings, bodies surface days later in sewers and garbage dumps. The report said that most unidentified bodies were found in six neighborhoods of Baghdad, three Sunni — Dora, Rashidiya and Adhamiya — and three Shiite — Sadr City, New Baghdad and the hardscrabble slum of Shuala.

"It's important to identify the root cause of the violence," said Gianni Magazzeni, chief of the United Nations Assistance Mission to Iraq's Human Rights Office, which compiled the report. "Lack of accountability for crimes generates the urge for justice through armed groups."

One result, described by the report, is a society in collapse. At least 470,094 Iraqis have fled their homes since February. The number of displaced Iraqis was the highest in the embattled Sunni province of Anbar, where 10,105 families fled, followed by Karbala in the south, Baghdad, and Dohuk in the north.

Iraqi government forces also suffered painful losses. The report cited an Interior Ministry figure of 12,000 Iraqi security forces killed, both the Army and the police, since 2003.

The general breakdown in order has led to a wave of crime, and many of the killings were part of that.

"This law and order vacuum has an encouraging effect on criminal groups of various affiliations, many of whom use the Internet, mobile phone messaging systems, videos and pamphlets to promote their criminal activities," the report said.

The Iraqis most tormented by the violence are those least able to protect themselves against it: the poor. Um Qasim, a Baghdad cleaning lady, has lost three brothers, a sister-in-law, a nephew, a stepson and a son, all in the past three years. Two of her other sons are in jail in the northern city of Mosul for playing minor roles in a kidnapping arranged by her brother.

Her life improved in a brief but joyous spurt immediately after the invasion. During the looting that followed, her family stole pieces of metal and bricks to build a solid roof and second story on their modest house.

But her life quickly unraveled as two of her sons, looking for money, got involved in a kidnapping and got caught. Another son, just 16 years old, was killed by Sunni extremists not far from their house near Haifa Street, a poor, mostly Sunni area that has been the scene of intense fighting in recent weeks.

Ms. Qasim works several jobs cleaning affluent homes; she takes minivans around the city to get to work. Under Saddam Hussein, her main worry was how to feed her family. Now it is how to keep them alive.

"I never thought that one day I would have to think about how to keep them alive," she said. "Now, when I go out of my house in the morning, I pray to God that when I return, I will see all of them there alive."

The violence has expanded to the point of leaving hospitals and morgues overflowing with bodies. The report described the discovery of several recent mass graves. In the southern city of Najaf, one grave was shallow, with bodies partly visible, and local people asked authorities to dig it up to protect children in the area. In Baquba, north of Baghdad, 28 bodies were found of members of the Shimari tribe, who had been kidnapped and killed.

In Baghdad, where dozens of broken bodies turn up daily, the most feared site is on the edge of Sadr City, the largest Shiite enclave in northeastern Baghdad. Bodies are dumped in pre-prepared holes in the area, called al-Sadda, the report said.

"The area is considered very dangerous and controlled by the militias," it said. "No one, including Iraqi security forces, can visit the area without authorization of the militias."

The report also provided details on the outcomes of a number of mass kidnappings that tormented Iraqis throughout the fall. The attacks seem to be a signature of Shiite militias.

Around 70 Iraqis, almost all Sunnis, are still missing after being kidnapped in November from the Ministry of Higher Education in downtown Baghdad. The attack took place on a day when teachers from the Sunni areas of Anbar, Salahuddin and Mosul were visiting.

The kidnappings have completely redrawn the composition of neighborhoods. Sinek, a wholesale market in the heart of Baghdad, once thoroughly mixed, is slowly emptying of Sunnis. Men in uniforms seized around 50 merchants on Dec. 2. About 29 were later released. All were Shiite.

Arab Group Signals Iran To Avoid Meddling In Iraq (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

KUWAIT CITY, Jan. 16 -- A group of eight Arab nations on Tuesday joined the United States in issuing a veiled warning to Iran against interfering in Iraq's affairs but offered only tepid support for President Bush's new plan for stabilizing Iraq.

The statement was written in diplomatic jargon and did not mention Iran by name or even cite concerns about Iran's nuclear program. It warned against "destabilization" of the Persian Gulf, expressed support for the "principle of noninterference" and said it did not want Iraq to become "a battleground for regional and international powers," code for Iran and the United States.

The statement welcomed Bush's speech as expressing "a commitment by the United States" to saving Iraq, but made no mention of Bush's proposed troop buildup.

"Nine foreign ministers are meeting in Kuwait precisely to prevent Iraq from slipping into civil war," said Kuwait's foreign minister, Mohammed al-Sabah, at a news conference with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The statement was also joined by five other Gulf Arab states -- Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Bahrain, Oman and the United Arab Emirates -- and Egypt and Jordan.

The meeting came as the United States deployed a second aircraft carrier in the Persian Gulf region for the first time since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. Rice is touring the Middle East to win support for Bush's plan and bolster what she calls a "mainstream" alliance of Arab states opposed to violent extremists such as Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas.

Since September, Rice has prodded the eight nations, America's closest friends in the Middle East apart from Israel, to create an informal group to discuss regional issues. Arab officials have said privately they are reluctant participants in the meetings, in part because they are wary of being perceived as an anti-Iran alliance. The meeting Tuesday, in a vast palace here, was the fourth such gathering and the first to result in a joint statement.

In contrast to the statement, Sabah offered a relatively firm endorsement of the Bush plan. "We expressed our desire to see the president's plan to reinforce the American military presence in Baghdad as a vehicle and a venue to stabilize Baghdad," he said. He also acknowledged the joint statement was aimed at Iran.

But earlier, when Rice visited Riyadh, Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal offered only lukewarm support for the Bush plan, saying it was up to the Iraqi government to demonstrate that it could end sectarian violence and unite the fractured nation. "Other countries can help," Saud said, "but the main responsibility in taking decisions rests on the Iraqis."

Saud, speaking after Rice had evening and morning meetings with King Abdullah and other Saudi officials, declined to comment on the specifics of Bush's plan, which calls for an increase of 21,500 troops, in part to help secure Baghdad.

"The details of how to implement those objectives, I don't think we can cover in one night of discussions," Saud said.

Rice told reporters traveling with her that she has received support for Bush's plan but acknowledged the skittishness in the predominately Sunni Arab states of the Gulf.

"There are concerns about whether the Maliki government is prepared to take an even-handed, nonsectarian path here. There is no doubt about that," Rice said, referring to the Shiite-led administration of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "After all the years of deep grievance in the region, within Iraq, it's not surprising that that's the case. But everyone wants to give this a chance. That's the position of people in the region."

Saud, at a news conference with Rice, described the situation in Iraq as a "morass," which he said "serves no one. It serves no neighboring country, no regional power and no international power."

He added that Iraq "is an old historic country with a civilization that goes back thousands of years. I cannot for the life of me conceive that a country like that would commit suicide."

Saudi Arabia, a majority Sunni country with a history of rivalry with Iran, has been alarmed at the dominance of the Shiites in the Iraqi government and the rising influence of Iran in the region.

The day before Rice arrived here, Ali Larijani, Iran's top national security official, visited Riyadh for talks with the king.

"We, Saudis and other neighboring countries can help the Iraqi people to take the lead to consolidate their government's capability to stabilize and maintain security in their country," Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said in an interview taped Saturday, the Associated Press reported. "I sent a message to King Abdullah in this regard and the answer, generally, was positive," Ahmadinejad said.

Saudi news reports suggested that the message requested mediation in the growing battle of nerves between the United States and Iran. Iran denied the report, and Rice and Saud both said there was "no need" for mediation.

Arab Support Vague For U.S. Iraq Plan (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 17, 2007

The carefully worded encouragement that Arab allies are offering for President Bush's new Iraq strategy belies deep suspicion among the United States' few real friends in the region that Iraq may already be a lost cause.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has made sales calls the past several days in Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, presenting the U.S. plan and prospecting for tangible help from Iraq's neighbors. What she collected instead were polite versions of a blunt message: Good luck with that.

Eight Arab foreign ministers joined Rice in a vague statement Tuesday that welcomed a U.S. commitment to defend "the territorial 110 and guarantees the stability of the country."

The host, Kuwaiti Foreign Minister Sheik Mohammed Al Sabah, was plain about the stakes. Asked if it was already too late to stop the rising cycle of Sunni-Shiite killings in Iraq, he had a succinct reply.

"Nine foreign ministers are meeting in Kuwait today to try to prevent Iraq from sliding into a civil war," al-Sabah said. "I think that speaks volumes."

The group met on the same day that the United Nations said more than 34,000 Iraqi civilians died last year in sectarian violence. An explosion outside a Baghdad university as students were heading home for the day killed at least 65 people in the deadliest of several attacks on predominantly Shiite areas.

At Rice's earlier stops, key Sunni Arab allies endorsed the goals of Bush's plan, and expressed hopes that it will work. Almost in the same breath, however, many suggested that the Shiite-led government in Baghdad cannot or will not follow through.

Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal was perhaps the most upbeat, but his doubts were obvious.

"We agree with the full objectives set by the new plan, the strategy," Saud said earlier Tuesday, following a briefing session with Rice. "This has objectives that ... if it were applied, it will solve the problems facing Iraq."

So far so good for Rice, but Saud wasn't finished. He went on to pin success squarely on the Iraq government, saying there is only so much that any outsider can do. He implied that others cannot help the Iraqis if they will not help themselves.

"We cannot be Iraqis more than Iraqis," Saud said. "Other countries can help, but the burden, the whole burden and taking a decision will be the Iraqis'."

Many in the Sunni Arab world profoundly distrust Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government, believing it is serving the interests of Shiite Iran and has no intention of giving Iraq's minority Sunnis much stake in the oil-rich nation's future.

Rice knew that going in, and acknowledged it in a session with reporters traveling with her in Kuwait on Tuesday.

"There are concerns about whether the Maliki government is prepared to take an evenhanded, nonsectarian path here," Rice said. "There's no doubt about that."

Bush's plan depends heavily on al-Maliki to use Iraqi troops to crack down on militants from both sides and meet a series of benchmarks to promote reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites.

The Bush strategy has met with strong skepticism across the Mideast, where many have predicted that even with more soldiers, America will fail to break the cycle of violence.

Rice's trip began with an emphasis on rejuvenating the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, which the Arab powerbrokers have long urged the United States to do. But the move was widely portrayed in the Arab press as simply an attempt to change the subject.

"The Americans are trying to get out of the Baghdad bottleneck and they are looking for agent players in managing their conflict with Tehran to make their new strategy in Iraq successful," the Saudi newspaper Al Jazirah said Monday.

Ahead of Rice's visit, there were deep doubts across the region that U.S. troops, or the Shiite-led government, would tackle Shiite militias that many in the Sunni-dominated Arab world see as the chief threat to Iraq.

Al-Maliki has resisted U.S. pressure in the past to move against militias, but before Bush rolled out his plan al-Maliki pledged to crack down on political ally Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

DOJ_NMG_0117454

Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and Jordan are openly concerned about the growing Shiite Muslim influence, stretching from Iran through Iraq, Syria and Lebanon. The fear is that the hardline Tehran government will dominate the Mideast and give rise to more extremism, jeopardizing a Mideast settlement and threatening those nations.

Rice has tried to use fear of Iran as a lever to draw support for the U.S. plan in Iraq, with some success.

The nine-way statement issued Tuesday contained a coded reference to Iran, which was not part of the group's discussions.

"Relations among all countries should be based on mutual respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all states and on the principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of other nations," the group's statement said.

Gulf Allies Support Goals Of New U.S. Strategy In Iraq (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

KUWAIT, Jan. 16 — America's Persian Gulf allies on Tuesday endorsed the goals of President Bush's new Iraq strategy. But even one of Washington's staunchest partners in the region, Saudi Arabia, indicated deep concerns about whether the Shiite-led government in Baghdad had the capacity and will to halt sectarian violence and protect Sunni Arabs.

The six foreign ministers of the Gulf Cooperation Council, along with those of Egypt and Jordan and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, issued a statement that "welcomed the commitment" of the United States to stabilizing Iraq, but made no commitments to help stabilize or rebuild the country.

The Bush administration's blunt warnings to Iran in recent days echoed throughout the session, and the official communiqué broadly criticized any nation that interfered in the internal affairs of Iraq — a clear reference to Iran, although the official document never mentioned it by name.

Kuwait was the final stop of a diplomatic swing by Ms. Rice across the Middle East to explain the president's new military, diplomatic and economic initiatives for Iraq, and to build support among the region's Arab states, most of which have majority Sunni populations. The meeting in Kuwait was held 16 years to the day after a United States-led coalition began an offensive to drive the Iraqi Army out of Kuwait.

But it was the threat of rising sectarian violence following a second American-led invasion that was the topic of Tuesday's meeting.

"Nine foreign ministers are meeting in Kuwait today to precisely prevent Iraq from sliding into civil war, and that speaks volumes," said Sheik Muhammad al-Sabah al-Salim al-Sabah, the foreign minister of Kuwait.

"The participants welcomed the commitment by the United States as stated in President Bush's recent speech to defend the security of the gulf, the territorial integrity of Iraq and to ensure a successful, fair and inclusive political process that engages all Iraqi communities and guarantees the stability of the country," said the communiqué, in language that the Bush administration could cite to prove broad regional support for its initiatives.

But earlier on Tuesday, Prince Saud al-Faisal, the foreign minister of Saudi Arabia, issued a more guarded and carefully worded endorsement of the new Bush strategy.

"We agree fully with the goals set by the new strategy, which in our view are the goals that — if implemented — would solve the problems that face Iraq," he said.

Prince Saud said he could not comment on specifics of the plan, which Bush administration officials acknowledge relies heavily on the actions of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, a Shiite political leader who has shown a reluctance to crack down on violent Shiite militias. Yet he also declined to be drawn into a discussion of possible Saudi action to protect Sunni Arabs in Iraq in the event of a full-blown sectarian civil war.

"Why speculate on such dire consequences?" he said, urging unity among Iraq's Shiites, Sunnis, Turkmen and Kurds. "Why not speculate on the positive side? I cannot for the life of me concede that a country like that would commit suicide given the good will and the desire of all to help in this."

Ms. Rice acknowledged the legitimacy of those worries within powerful Sunni-majority states, where the Baghdad government has remained either unwilling or unable to stop Shiite death squads from murdering Sunnis, in what appeared to be a campaign of ethnic killings.

"There are concerns about whether the Maliki government is prepared to take an evenhanded, nonsectarian path," Ms. Rice said. "After all the years of deep grievance in the region, within Iraq, it's not surprising that that's the case."

But Ms. Rice stressed that each of the Middle Eastern leaders with whom she has met "wants to give this a chance," adding, "That's the position of people in the region, and there is, in fact, a burden on the Iraqi government to perform."

The communiqué contained no specific reference to Mr. Bush's order for adding more than 20,000 troops to the Iraq mission. But Sheik Muhammad, the Kuwaiti foreign minister, said, "We expressed our desire to see the president's plan to reinforce the American military presence in Baghdad as a vehicle and a venue to stabilize Baghdad and to prevent Iraq from sliding into ugly war, the civil war."

The statement never challenged the Maliki government directly, but it used standard diplomatic code to make the point: it called for disarming militias and ending sectarian violence. "The ministers expressed the hope that the Iraqi government will actively engage all components of the Iraqi people in a real political process and act in a manner that ensures inclusiveness and paves the way for the success of national reconciliation," it said.

Asked about regional worries over Iran, Sheik Muhammad said the other ministers had agreed to a "call for all countries to refrain from interfering in Iraqi internal affairs." He added, "This is something that we are all concerned about."

Arab States Raise Doubts About Al-Maliki (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

KUWAIT CITY -- Arab governments are skeptical about the ability of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to improve the security situation in his country, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday after a series of meetings with leaders in the Middle East.

Arab officials support the goals of President Bush's new Iraq policy -- quelling the violence and stabilizing the country -- but are not prepared to fully back the proposal because of its reliance on Mr. al-Maliki's performance, she said.

"There is skepticism about whether or not the Iraqi government is going to do the things it has said it's going to do," Miss Rice told a group of reporters in Kuwait, the last stop on her tour in the region.

Miss Rice has met principally with Sunni leaders in Saudi Arabia, Egypt and the Persian Gulf, most of whom share concern about the rising power of Mr. al-Maliki and his fellow Shi'ite leaders in Iran and southern Lebanon.

"There are concerns about whether the Maliki government is prepared to take an evenhanded, nonsectarian path. There is no doubt about that," Miss Rice said.

"But not because this isn't a group of people who want very desperately to get it done [or] because they are people who don't understand the responsibilities, but [because] this is very hard."

Mr. Bush said yesterday that the chaotic execution of former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein looked like "kind of a revenge killing" and showed that the al-Maliki government "has still got some maturation to do."

"I was disappointed and felt like they fumbled -- particularly the Saddam Hussein execution," Mr. Bush said in an interview with PBS' Jim Lehrer.

At least 65 students and staff were killed and more than 100 injured in a car bombing outside Baghdad's Mustansiriyah University yesterday.

Also, the United Nations released a report estimating that 34,000 Iraqi civilians died in violence last year.

Miss Rice, who came to the region to seek support for Mr. Bush's new plan to add 21,500 U.S. troops in Iraq, met in Kuwait with eight Arab foreign ministers.

In a joint statement, the six Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) states -- Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain and Oman -- joined Egypt, Jordan and the United States in pledging to help Iraq find a way out of its crisis.

"Nine foreign ministers are meeting in Kuwait today precisely to prevent Iraq from sliding into civil war," Kuwaiti Foreign Minister Sheik Mohammed al-Sabah said at a press conference with Miss Rice.

In Riyadh earlier yesterday, Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal pointedly refused to back Mr. Bush's plan, offering support only for its objectives.

"We agree fully with the goals set by the new strategy, which in our view are the goals that if implemented would solve the problems that face Iraq," he said. "I cannot, for the life of me, conceive that a country like that would commit suicide."

In Egypt on Monday, Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit was more generous in his backing, although he expressed hope, rather than confidence, that the new strategy will succeed.

"We are supportive of that plan because we are hopeful that [it would] ensure the stability, unity and cohesion of the Iraqi government," Mr. Gheit said.

"We are hopeful that the plan would lead toward the dismantlement of whatever terror organizations, as well as the military militias, that are tormenting the Iraqi scene."

Prince al-Faisal declined to say what Saudi Arabia might do if Mr. Bush's plan does not work. But Saudi officials have suggested that they might help Iraq's Sunnis defend themselves against Shi'ite militias.

Miss Rice warned yesterday that foreign involvement in Iraq's infighting, no matter where it comes from, would be "disastrous." The GCC statement also contained a warning to Iran without naming it.

"The participants expressed their collective desire to prevent Iraq from becoming a battleground for regional and international powers," it said.

Rice Lobbies Arabs For Backing In Iraq (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 17, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's appeal for Arab allies to help support the fragile government in Iraq drew only a tepid endorsement Tuesday from the administration's strongest ally in the region.

Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal said Saudis hope President Bush's plans to turn around the situation in Iraq is successful, but was plainly skeptical that the Iraqi government is up to the task of doing its part.

"We are hoping these objectives will be implemented, but the means are not in our hands," he said. "They are in the hands of the Iraqis themselves."

Al-Faisal spoke at length about the centuries old civilization in Iraq where Sunni and Shiite Muslims have been living together for years, but are now threatened by sectarian violence that has killed thousands.

"I cannot for the life of me conceive that a country like that would commit suicide," said al-Faisal, adding that he prefers not to speculate about he called the "dire consequences" of a Sunni-Shia civil war.

Rice is nearing the end of her tour of Arab allies meant to draw support for Bush's blueprint, which relies heavily on the Iraq government's will and ability to curb sectarian violence and rally confidence among disaffected Sunni Arabs.

Rice traveled to Kuwait later Tuesday, where she was meeting with diplomats from Persian Gulf countries.

"I've briefed the president's plan on Iraq at all the different stops," Rice told reporters traveling with her. "There is, I think, very good support for the American commitment there, very good support for the objectives the president wants to achieve."

Rice acknowledged the doubts, however.

"Everyone says exactly the same thing, which we are all saying too, that it requires now that everybody fulfills the obligations of the plan, particularly that the Iraqis have to carry through on their obligations."

Bush's strategy to send thousands more troops to Iraq met with skepticism across the Mideast before Rice arrived, with diplomats and editorialists predicting that even with more soldiers, America would fail to break the cycle of violence.

There were deep doubts that U.S. troops, or the Shiite-led Iraqi government, would tackle what many in the Sunni-dominated Arab world see as the chief threat to Iraq: Shiite militias, blamed for fueling the cycle of sectarian slayings.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Al-Maliki has resisted U.S. pressure in the past to move against militias, but last week he pledged to crack down on political ally Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

Many in the Arab world profoundly distrust al-Maliki's government, believing it is serving Iran's interests at the expense of Sunnis. Bush's plan depends heavily on al-Maliki to use Iraqi troops to crack down on militants from both sides and meet a series of benchmarks to promote reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites.

In Saudi Arabia, Rice thanked her hosts for their past help in urging national reconciliation in Iraq, but did not press specific new requests for the predominantly Sunni kingdom's help.

Although a distinct minority, Sunnis had dominated the government in Iraq until the U.S.-led ouster of Saddam Hussein left Shias in control.

Rice, who has said debt relief would be a good way for Saudi Arabia to help its neighbor, sounded more optimistic than al-Faisal about the will of the Iraqi government.

"As the president has said, Iraqis have to decide what kind of country they will be," Rice said, alluding to Bush's assertion that the ultimate future of Iraq is in the hands of Iraqis.

Rice and al-Faisal commented after a morning meeting that followed a Monday evening dinner for Rice hosted by Saudi King Abdullah.

"We share risk and we share responsibility, because this is an area of the world which will very much be affected by how Iraq turns out," Rice said during a news conference Monday in Egypt.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit, a frequent critic, was ready to give Bush's plan the benefit of the doubt.

"We are supportive of that plan because we are hopeful that that plan would lead to ensure the stability, the unity and the cohesion of the Iraqi government," he said Monday.

Troop Increase Gains Support Of 8 Arab States (USAT)

USA Today, January 17, 2007

KUWAIT CITY — Eight Arab countries voiced support Tuesday for President Bush's new strategy of boosting U.S. troop strength in Iraq as part of an effort to secure Baghdad and provide an opportunity for the fragile Iraqi government to establish legitimacy.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice acknowledged, however, that Sunni Arab leaders in the region worry that the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will not deliver on its promises to treat Sunnis fairly and stop the spiraling violence in Baghdad.

"There are concerns about whether the Maliki government is prepared to take an evenhanded, non-sectarian path," Rice told reporters accompanying her on a quick tour of the Middle East.

Rice met here with foreign ministers from six Arab Gulf countries — Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Bahrain, Oman, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates — plus Jordan and Egypt. They issued a statement supporting the Bush plan.

That plan would increase the number of troops in Iraq by more than 20,000. Most of the troops would be added in Baghdad, the rest in Anbar province, a hotbed of the insurgency west of the capital.

Hours after Rice and the others issued their statement, a car bomb exploded outside a university in Baghdad, killing at least 65 people and wounding 100. It was another attack in a cycle of violence that, according to the United Nations, killed more than 34,000 Iraqi civilians last year.

"Nine foreign ministers are meeting in Kuwait today precisely to prevent Iraq from sliding into a civil war," Kuwaiti Foreign Minister Mohammad al-Sabah said.

The joint statement "welcomed the commitment by the United States … to defend the security of the Gulf, the territorial integrity of Iraq and to ensure an … inclusive political process that engages all Iraqi communities."

Earlier in Saudi Arabia, Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal gave a more qualified endorsement of the Bush strategy. Saud said that although his government hopes Bush's "objectives will be implemented, the … means are not in our hands. They're in the hands of the Iraqis."

The joint statement also warned countries against interfering in Iraq. The Bush administration has accused Syria and Iran of fostering violence in Iraq and contributing to instability. The statement expressed a "collective desire to prevent Iraq from becoming a battleground for regional and international powers."

Tensions between Iran and the United States over Iraq have intensified in recent days.

U.S. authorities are holding five Iranians seized last Thursday in Irbil, in Kurdish northern Iraq, on suspicion of aiding Iraqi militants.

Both Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates have issued warnings to Iran to stop supporting violence. The Bush administration has charged that Iran supports Shiite death squads that target Sunnis and provides sophisticated explosives for roadside bombs that have killed American troops.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday that he sent a message to Saudi King Abdullah proposing that they cooperate in helping stabilize Iraq.

Saudis Give Cautious Backing To Bush Plan (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 17, 2007

Saudi Arabia, a key US ally in the Middle East, on Tuesday gave cautious support to President George W. Bush's new plan to end the bitter sectarian conflict in Iraq, but said the initiative's success hinged on the Iraqi administration.

After meeting Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, Saud al-Feisal, the Saudi foreign minister, said the kingdom agreed "fully with the goals set by the new strategy" which, if implemented, "would solve the problems that face Iraq".

However, he added that while other countries could help, "the main responsibility in taking decisions rests on the Iraqis".

The new US plan includes an increase of 21,500 American troops in Iraq, destined mainly for Baghdad, and increased pressure on Iran, which Washington accuses of supporting Shia groups in Iraq. However, it is highly dependent on the actions of the Iraqi government and rests on the hope that it will adopt policies it has previously resisted.

Ms Rice was in Saudi Arabia – the region's most powerful Sunni country – as part of a Middle East tour to drum up support for the initiative. She dined with King Abdullah on Monday evening.

Outlining the plan last week, Mr Bush called on Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan, all pro-western Sunni states, to "step up" their support for the Shia-dominated Iraqi administration.

Although Arab officials have questioned Washington's emphasis on a military, rather than political, solution, they have also been arguing against an abrupt US withdrawal, fearing it would exacerbate Iraq's civil conflict and destabilise the region.

They have said that to bring some order to Iraq, the Baghdad government must be willing to deal with Shia militias and make political concessions, including am-ending the constitution to give the minority Sunni a greater stake in the country.

"[The Iraq government] must stop the resistance, bring everyone into the political process and realise the hopes of the people," Mr Feisal said.

Ms Rice said the US would continue to work with the Iraqi government "to make sure the networks running dangerous militias were stopped".

Sunni nations have also been alarmed both by Shia Iran's growing influence in the region and its nuclear ambitions.

The day before Ms Rice's visit to Saudi Arabia, Ali Larijani, Iran's top security official, held meetings in Riyadh. However, Mr Feisal played down suggestions that his government had been asked to ease tensions between Washington and Tehran.

"There is no need for mediation," Mr Feisal said. "Our relations with the United States are long standing...Iran is a neighbour of Saudi Arabia, so obviously we hope to avoid any conflict."

Egypt also appeared to have given its backing to the US plan, with Ahmed Aboul Gheit, the country's foreign minister, saying on Monday that his government would support the strategy in the hope that it would lead to "the stability, the unity and the cohesion of the Iraqi government".

Ms Rice was due to meet eight Gulf foreign ministers in Kuwait on Tuesday night.

US, Arab Allies Call On Iran Not To Meddle In Iraq (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, January 17, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and eight Arab counterparts called on Iran not to meddle in Iraq's affairs after discussing Washington's plan to quell sectarian violence in the country, Kuwait's foreign minister said.

"With respect to US policy towards Iran... the US and the Gulf expressed in (a) joint communique that we call to all countries to refrain from interfering in Iraqi internal affairs," Sheikh Mohammad al-Sabah told a joint news conference with Rice after the talks in Kuwait.

"That is something that we are all concerned about. We would like the neighbouring countries to work together for peace and stability in Iraq," he said.

Rice met with the foreign ministers of the "GCC+2" group of US allies that brings together Gulf Cooperation Council members Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates as well as Egypt and Jordan.

The joint communique did not mention Iran by name but said that relations among countries "should be based on mutual respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity of all states, and on the principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of other nations."

The two sides said they wanted to prevent Iraq "becoming a battleground for regional and international powers."

Rice, on a regional tour, was aiming to drum up support for US President George W. Bush's "surge" strategy to tackle violence in Iraq with the deployment of an additional 21,500 troops.

She was also seeking financial aid from the oil-rich Gulf countries for the government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, chiefly through debt forgiveness.

"The participants welcomed the commitment by the United States, as stated in President Bush's recent speech, to defend the security of the Gulf, the territorial integrity of Iraq, and to ensure a successful, fair and inclusive political process that engages all Iraqi communities," the joint statement said.

"We expressed our desire to see the president's plan to reinforce the American military presence in Baghdad as a vehicle... to stabilize Baghdad and to prevent Iraq from sliding into this ugly war," the Kuwaiti foreign minister said.

Rice earlier received cautious Saudi backing for Bush's last-ditch strategy for Iraq.

"We agree with the objectives" of the US plan to bring peace to the war-torn country, Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal said at a joint press conference with Rice in Riyadh earlier Tuesday.

But he was cautious about the means of reaching the objective.

"We cannot comment on the means that will be applied... We're hoping that these objectives will be implemented, but the means are not in our hands. They are in the hands of the Iraqis," he said.

Rice praised Saudi Arabia's role in "urging national reconciliation" in Iraq, and welcomed a greater Arab engagement in efforts to reunify the Iraqis.

"If the Arab League is prepared to go forward with a reconciliation conference, that will also be very useful to the Iraqis," she said.

The secretary of state turned her attention to Iraq and the Gulf after focusing on reviving the Israeli-Palestinian peace process in the first part of her regional tour that began at the weekend.

She admitted that Iraq's predominantly Sunni Arab neighbours were skeptical about the ability of Maliki's Shiite government to halt the sectarian violence that has pitted Sunni Arabs against Shiites.

"There are concerns about whether the Maliki government is prepared to take an even-handed, non-sectarian path... But everybody wants to give this a chance. That is the position of the people in the region and there is in fact a burden on the Iraqi government to perform," Rice told reporters after arriving in Kuwait.

The joint statement stressed the need to dismantle militias in Iraq and expressed hope that Maliki's government will "actively engage all components of the Iraqi people in a real political process and act in a manner that ensures inclusiveness."

The US plan revealed last week has come under fire in many Arab capitals, even among staunch allies in the Gulf, with critics saying it provides a recipe for more sectarian violence in Iraq that could spread elsewhere in the region.

But Rice on Monday won support from Cairo after meeting with President Hosni Mubarak in the southern Egyptian city of Luxor.

8 Mideast States Back U.S. On Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

KUWAIT CITY — A group of eight Middle Eastern countries joined the United States on Tuesday in warning against foreign interference in Iraq, marking a small step in U.S. efforts to win regional support for pacifying Iraq and resisting Iranian influence.

The group, which consists of Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and five other neighboring states, cited in their first joint communique "the principle of noninterference."

The countries, dominated by Sunni Muslims, also welcomed U.S. efforts to rebuild Shiite-led Iraq with an "inclusive political process" and to defend the Persian Gulf.

Foreign ministers of the group issued the statement during a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has been traveling the region this week to build support for President Bush's new Iraq policy.

The Bush administration convened the group for the first time in September, proposing collaboration on security and other issues. But though Sunni nations in the region are anxious about the rise of Iran, which, like Iraq, is led by Shiites, some members of the group have resisted suggestions to form a stronger alliance, fearing it could provoke Tehran.

The statement doesn't mention Iran by name, nor does it warn against nuclear proliferation by the regime, despite American concerns about Tehran's work to enrich uranium.

The statement welcomes Bush's commitment to Iraq and the region but doesn't specifically endorse his plan announced last week to increase U.S. forces in Iraq by 21,500 troops.

The American effort to build support got a lukewarm reception in Saudi Arabia, a key ally.

In an appearance with Rice on Tuesday morning, Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al Faisal said his government agreed with Bush's goals. But he stopped short of saying he favored the troop increase.

"We agree with the objectives," said Faisal, whose government is concerned about what it sees as the mistreatment of the Sunni minority in Iraq. "We are hoping these objectives will be implemented, but the means are not in our hands. They are in the hands of the Iraqis themselves."

The other states in the group are Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

Rice, who has also visited Egypt, Israel, the West Bank and Jordan this week, portrayed the regional reaction in a more positive light.

Although she did not claim backing for the specifics of the Bush plan, she told reporters that "there's very good support for the American commitment there. There's very good support for the objective the president wants to achieve."

Asked about the Saudi foreign minister's comments, she acknowledged: "I do think there's skepticism about whether or not the Iraqi government is going to do the things it says it's going to do…. Everyone is concerned as to the Iraqi willingness now to do all the things that it needs to do."

Rice: Diplomacy Not About Making Deals (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

DOJ_NMG_0117460

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, during a tour of the Middle East, met yesterday in Kuwait City with reporters traveling with her for an extended discussion. During the session, one reporter noted that Rice, a Russian specialist, frequently says she is a "student of history" and often cites examples and analogies from the Cold War. He asked if there were any moments in Arab history, as opposed to European history, that informed her thinking, such as Britain's occupation of Mesopotamia, Britain's experience in Egypt or France's experience in Algeria. The question spurred Rice to give a six-minute philosophical lecture on her view of diplomatic history. Diplomacy, she said, "is not dealmaking." Following are excerpts from her comments.

-- I've read the British experience and I know a number of things that went right and I know things that went wrong. I also know that one of the challenges is the particular way this map [of Iraq] was drawn. . . . You have to recognize that a country drawn on the religious fault lines of the Middle East is going to have a complicated way of moving forward to be able to overcome those fault lines. The way that they've been overcome in the past was either through repression if they were the majority if they were in Iraq, or in some cases even worse, expulsion or whatever.

It's not easy to have those differences overcome through a political process. . . . There have been people who have taken great chances and great risks -- you know, the names [former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak] Rabin or [former Egyptian president Anwar] Sadat or whatever -- and it reminds you that sometimes coming out of very bad crises there's an opportunity for leadership on the part of individuals in those positions to do something very major. So sure, I look at the history of this region all the time.

But I want to be clear. I'm not using history to make analogues between any historical period and now because I actually think that history doesn't repeat itself. I think that conditions change so fundamentally that you're rarely looking at the same circumstances and you're certainly not looking at the same circumstances when you look at Europe and you look at the Middle East or Asia.

But there's a tendency to look at where you are now and say, "Oh my goodness, there are all these problems, we'll never get out of them, this is so difficult, it must be failing, it must be failing."

And the reason that I cite some of these other times like Europe is that it is so clear in everybody's mind that the United States and its allies came out victorious at the end of the Cold War. . . . But if you actually go back and look at the events that ultimately led to that, you would have thought that this was failing every single day between 1945-1946 and probably 1987 or 1988.

There's a tendency to think about diplomacy as something that is done untethered to the conditions underlying it or the balance underlying it. And in fact, that's not the way that it works. You aren't going to be successful as a diplomat if you don't understand the strategic context in which you are actually negotiating. It is not dealmaking. It's not. There are a set of underlying relationships, underlying balance of power, leverage on different sides, and you have to recognize when you are in a position to then on top of that find a solution given the underlying balance. . . .

My favorite case of this is if you had tried to negotiate German unification for any period of time until 1990, you would have not been able to do it because the underlying circumstances were not there. I was part of the team that worked on German unification. You know, I feel terrific that we were able to do it, but let's not overestimate that it was somehow just that we did the diplomacy well. . . .

That's why I think reading the Middle East right now, I tend to place a lot of emphasis on the fact that people see their interests differently now than they did five years ago or 10 years ago. They see their interests less as continuing or having maximalist positions about this conflict and are more concerned about the kind of broad strategic picture. I think Lebanon was a major contributor to that shift in alignment; and with that shift in alignment, I think you now have a chance to perhaps make progress on this issue in ways that you didn't before.

The Missing Partner In Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

The one crucial assumption behind everything President Bush proposed on Iraq last week was that Washington would have the wholehearted support of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. None of Mr. Bush's ideas — his plan to send more American soldiers to fight alongside Iraqi units in Baghdad, his program for jump-starting the Iraqi economy, his hope of reconciling rival sectarian communities and heading off civil war — can possibly succeed without the full cooperation of the Iraqi government.

Yet in the days following Mr. Bush's address, as in the days before, Mr. Maliki has demonstrated how far his own goals diverge from America's best interests or any reasonable path for containing Iraq's civil war. Consider, for example, Mr. Maliki's designation of Lt. Gen. Aboud Qanbar — a Shiite officer known for his combative resistance to American tutelage — to be the overall military commander of the new Baghdad security drive.

Any hope that this campaign will prove more effective than past failed efforts depends on soldiers' being able to finally move against Shiite militias. If General Qanbar and Mr. Maliki plan to continue shielding militias like the Mahdi Army, this new drive will be doomed before it begins.

What another failure would mean was underscored in a particularly grim way yesterday when the United Nations reported that some 34,000 Iraqi civilians died violently last year, a staggering number in a country of less than 27 million people. Yesterday, more than 100 Iraqis died in Baghdad alone.

Consider also the grisly decapitation over the weekend of Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Saddam Hussein's co-defendant and half brother. Two weeks of watching how the lynch mob atmosphere of Mr. Hussein's execution instantly turned a monster into a martyr throughout the Sunni Arab world should have put Mr. Maliki on notice to get this one right. But whether deliberately or through breathtaking incompetence, the Iraqi government did not get it right, once again fanning sectarian flames.

Unless President Bush insists that Mr. Maliki accept specific and enforceable policy benchmarks and timelines — starting with the disarming of sectarian militias — the United States will remain hostage to the Iraqi prime minister and his radical Shiite agenda.

Mr. Bush needs to make clear to the Iraqi leader that continued American support will depend on his active cooperation. And that, ultimately, the Iraqis have even more to lose than the Americans from an unending civil war.

Lost In The Middle East (WP)

SECRETARY OF State Condoleezza Rice's tour through the Middle East this week has been designed to exploit the "opportunities" of what she views as a new divide in the region, "between extremism on the one hand and mainstream states on the other." On one side, she told The Post recently, "you have Iran, Hezbollah, Hamas and Syria. . . . On the other you have the so-called moderate Arab states, I'll call them mainstream states -- Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Egypt and the Gulf states."

Ms. Rice is trying to solidify an alliance of "the mainstream" against Iran and in support of U.S. policy in Iraq. To do that, she is making a high-profile effort to revive the Israeli-Palestinian peace process -- in spite of an unfavorable situation in the region -- because "the mainstream states . . . would actually really like to see a resolution of this conflict now."

The new strategy explains a series of reversals of U.S. policy that otherwise would be baffling. In addition to embracing the Middle East peacemaker role that it has shunned for six years, the administration has decided to seek $98 million in funding for Palestinian security forces -- the same forces it rightly condemned in the past as hopelessly corrupt and compromised by involvement in terrorism. Those forces haven't changed, but since they are nominally loyal to "mainstream" Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and serve as a check on the power of the "extremist" Hamas, they are on the right side of Ms. Rice's new divide.

So is Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, a thuggish autocrat who was on the wrong side of Ms. Rice's previous Mideast divide between pro-democracy forces and defenders of the illiberal status quo. In past visits to Cairo, Ms. Rice sparred with Mr. Mubarak's foreign minister over the imprisonment of democratic opposition leaders such as Ayman Nour and the failure to fulfill promises of political reform. On Monday, she opened her Cairo news conference by declaring that "the relationship with Egypt is an important strategic relationship, one that we value greatly." There was no mention of Mr. Nour or democracy.

The administration's concern about Iran is well founded. Even as it defies a U.N. Security Council order to freeze its nuclear program, Iran is attacking U.S. forces and interests in Iraq and across the Middle East. And it's true that Egypt, Saudi Arabia and other Arab states are also interested in containing Iran, as is Israel, which never liked the push for democracy anyway.

The attempt to divide the Middle East into two opposing camps is nevertheless wrongheaded and dangerous. It ignores the many differences among the "extremists" -- including internal divisions within Iran -- that could be exploited by a subtler policy. The "mainstream" coalition of U.S. allies, all Sunni-led states, must look threatening to Iraq's Shiite government, which itself considers Iran a close ally. That Sunni leaders are publicly supporting the U.S. escalation in Baghdad is at best a mixed blessing, since they have made it clear their motive is sectarian: They hope Shiite militias will be confronted.

Finally the new U.S. policy betrays President Bush's freedom agenda, giving a free pass to dictators who support the new geopolitical cause. Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice have said again and again that such trade-offs during the Cold War helped lay the groundwork for groups such as al-Qaeda -- which was founded and is led by Saudis and Egyptians. In its zeal to counter a crudely defined ideological enemy, the administration risks repeating that history.

Iran President Sends Note To Saudi King (AP)

By Maamoun Youssef

DOJ_NMG_0117462

Iran's hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday that he sent a message to Saudi King Abdullah proposing that they cooperate in helping stabilize Iraq.

Ahmadinejad's comments came as Washington is trying to rally its Arab allies and isolate Iran.

"We, Saudis and other neighboring countries can help the Iraqi people to take the lead to consolidate their government's capability to stabilize and maintain security in their country," Ahmadinejad told the Saudi-owned satellite television channel.

"I sent a message to King Abdullah in this regard and the answer, generally, was positive," the Iranian president said in the interview taped Saturday in Venezuela, one of the countries on his Latin American tour.

Iran's top national security official, Ali Larijani, had delivered a message to Abdullah, the official Saudi Press Agency reported Sunday, but did not reveal its contents.

Iran's overture to Saudi Arabia appeared to be an attempt to counter American efforts to rally its allies in the region and isolate Tehran.

Saudi Arabia has shown increasing alarm over Iran's growing influence in Iraq and across the Arab world, even as it has grown more worried over Iraq's chaos.

The U.S. has previously asked Saudi Arabia to use its close ties to Iraq's Sunni minority to encourage reconciliation with the Shiite-led government. Saudi Arabia has pressed the U.S. to ensure that Shiite militias are reined in.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, ahead of her regional tour, rejected anew proposals for opening a diplomatic dialogue with Iran and Syria as a way to help stabilize Iraq.

She said Iran would demand U.S. concessions on its nuclear program while Damascus would ask for an easing of the U.S. opposition to Syrian policies in Lebanon as a price for cooperation.

Ahmadinejad said the Americans were in "trouble and they are seeking a way to get out of it while ensuring their economic interests and increase their hegemony over the region."

Addressing Iran's nuclear program, Ahmadinejad reiterated that "we are always ready to talk, but if the dialogue is used as a means to impose something which is illegal then they should realize that it is a dead end."

Iranian officials have said that efforts to make Iran roll back its nuclear activities are not legal because it has the right to a peaceful nuclear program as a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

U.S. Bringing Second Carrier To Mideast (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, January 17, 2007

The deployment of the USS John C. Stennis to the Middle East will put two U.S. aircraft carriers in the Persian Gulf region for the first time since the 2003 Iraq invasion, in a clear response to Iran's aggressive posture in the region.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Monday that Iran and other U.S. adversaries believe the U.S. is vulnerable in Iraq, where the Pentagon is preparing to send more than 20,000 additional troops as part of a new security plan that envisions a crackdown on Iranian-backed militias.

Some analysts believe that a U.S. offensive against those militias could trigger retaliatory attacks elsewhere in the region, although the Navy described the deployment in broader strategic terms.

"This demonstrates our resolve to do what we can to bring security and stability to the region," Cmdr. Kevin Aandahl of the U.S. Navy's Fifth Fleet in Bahrain said Tuesday.

Aandahl said the Stennis carrier strike group of eight ships and nine air squadrons would arrive in Mideast waters in a matter of weeks, after crossing the Pacific and Indian oceans.

U.S. diplomats, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, have been touring the region to shore up American credibility. The United States' Arab allies are dismayed over the chaos in Iraq, while a resurgent Iran — the Arab world's centuries-old rival — is supporting militants across the region.

"Rice is promising the U.S. will stand firm against Iran. But without a show of force, without backing these words with muscle, no one will take the U.S. seriously, whether in Tehran or any Arab capital," said Mustafa Alani, a military analyst with the Dubai-based Gulf Research Center. "Now is the time. They have to stand or shut up."

The Stennis strike group, which was previously in line to deploy to the Pacific, will augment another Navy task force in Mideast waters led by the aircraft carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower, Aandahl said.

A second U.S. carrier will significantly boost U.S. air power in the region and serve to remind Iran of American firepower. Its arrival will give the Pentagon two carriers in the region for the first time since 2003, Aandahl said.

After departing Tuesday from its homeport of Bremerton, Wash., the Stennis will stop in San Diego to pick up an air wing of more than 80 planes, including F/A-18 Hornet and Superhornet fighter-bombers, the Navy said.

The Stennis could also shore up air cover for U.S. and NATO ground troops in Afghanistan, now relying on about 20 ground-based warplanes after the Eisenhower was sent to the Somali coast.

Britain sent two Royal Navy mine sweepers to the Gulf last month. The Pentagon said it is also sending an additional Patriot anti-missile battalion to a U.S. allied Gulf Arab country, as well as 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq.

In Brussels on Monday, Gates indicated that Iran's perception of U.S. vulnerability in the region was part of the reason the Pentagon needs to dispatch the Stennis and the Patriot missiles.

"The Iranians clearly believe that we are tied down in Iraq, that they have the initiative, that they are able to press us in many ways," Gates said.

Patriots defend against short-range missiles of the type that Iran could use to hit U.S. bases in the Gulf. The Pentagon has not said exactly where the Patriots will be based.

The escalating American combat power doesn't mean Washington is bent on a showdown with Tehran, Alani said. But the Pentagon may be preparing for tough U.S. action against Iranian-backed militias in Iraq, and the retaliation by Iran that could follow.

"They're not trying to pick a fight" with Iran, Alani said. "But if Iran makes any mistakes, the U.S. will deal with them."

Iran has denounced the Patriot deployment as part of U.S. plan to turn Arab countries into the front line of defense for Israel.

In December, Tehran's top national security official, Ali Larijani, asked Arab leaders to shut down U.S. military bases in the Gulf and instead join a security alliance with Iran. Gulf leaders have shown no inclination to give up their U.S. security umbrella.

The Stennis and its 3,200 sailors lead a strike group consisting of the guided-missile cruiser USS Antietam, three Navy destroyers — the USS O'Kane, Preble and Paul Hamilton — the submarine USS Key West, the guided-missile frigate USS Rentz, as well as the supply ship USNS Bridge, the Navy said.

Washington will keep two carriers in the Middle East "as long as the situation demands it," Aandahl said. A typical carrier deployment lasts six months.

The United States maintains nearly 40,000 troops in Gulf countries other than Iraq, including about 25,000 in Kuwait, 6,500 in Qatar, 3,000 in Bahrain, 1,300 in the United Arab Emirates and a few hundred in Oman and Saudi Arabia, according to figures from the Dubai-based Gulf Research Center.

AP: Iran Gets Army Gear In Pentagon Sale (AP)

By Sharon Theimer

AP, January 17, 2007

Fighter jet parts and other sensitive U.S. military gear seized from front companies for Iran and brokers for China have been traced in criminal cases to a surprising source: the Pentagon.

In one case, federal investigators said, contraband purchased in Defense Department surplus auctions was delivered to Iran, a country President Bush has branded part of an "axis of evil."

In that instance, a Pakistani arms broker convicted of exporting U.S. missile parts to Iran resumed business after his release from prison. He purchased Chinook helicopter engine parts for Iran from a U.S. company that had bought them in a Pentagon surplus sale. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents say those parts did make it to Iran.

Sensitive military surplus items are supposed to be demilitarized or "de-milled" — rendered useless for military purposes — or, if auctioned, sold only to buyers who promise to obey U.S. arms embargoes, export controls and other laws.

Yet the surplus sales can operate like a supermarket for arms dealers.

"Right Item, Right Time, Right Place, Right Price, Every Time. Best Value Solutions for America's Warfighters," the Defense Reutilization and Marketing Service says on its Web site, calling itself "the place to obtain original U.S. Government surplus property."

Federal investigators are increasingly anxious that Iran is within easy reach of a top priority on its shopping list: parts for the precious fleet of F-14 "Tomcat" fighter jets the United States let Iran buy in the 1970s when it was an ally.

In one case, convicted middlemen for Iran bought Tomcat parts from the Defense Department's surplus division. Customs agents confiscated them and returned them to the Pentagon, which sold them again — customs evidence tags still attached — to another buyer, a suspected broker for Iran.

"That would be evidence of a significant breakdown, in my view, in controls and processes," said Greg Kutz, the Government Accountability Office's head of special investigations. "It shouldn't happen the first time, let alone the second time."

A Defense Department official, Fred Baillie, said his agency followed procedures.

"The fact that those individuals chose to violate the law and the fact that the customs people caught them really indicates that the process is working," said Baillie, the Defense Logistics Agency's executive director of distribution. "Customs is supposed to check all exports to make sure that all the appropriate certifications and licenses had been granted."

The Pentagon recently retired its Tomcats and is shipping tens of thousands of spare parts to its surplus office — the Defense Reutilization and Marketing Service — where they could be sold in public auctions. Iran is the only other country flying F-14s.

"It stands to reason Iran will be even more aggressive in seeking F-14 parts," said Stephen Bogni, head of Immigration and Customs Enforcement's arms export investigations. Iran can produce only about 15 percent of the parts itself, he said.

The GAO, the investigative arm of Congress, found it alarmingly easy to acquire sensitive surplus. Last year, its agents bought $1.1 million worth — including rocket launchers, body armor and surveillance antennas — by driving onto a base and posing as defense contractors.

"They helped us load our van," Kutz said. Investigators used a fake identity to access a surplus Web site operated by a Pentagon contractor and bought still more, including a dozen microcircuits used on F-14 fighters.

The undercover buyers received phone calls from the Defense Department asking why they had no Social Security number or credit history, but they deflected the questions by presenting a phony utility bill and claiming to be an identity theft victim.

The Pentagon's public surplus sales took in $57 million in fiscal 2005. The agency also moves extra supplies around within the government and gives surplus military gear such as weapons, armored personnel carriers and aircraft to state and local law enforcement.

Investigators have found the Pentagon's inventory and sales controls rife with errors. They say sales are closely watched by friends and foes of the United States.

Among cases in which U.S. military technology made its way from surplus auctions to brokers for Iran, China and others:

_Items seized in December 2000 at a Bakersfield, Calif., warehouse that belonged to Multicore, described by U.S. prosecutors as a front company for Iran. Among the weaponry it acquired were fighter jet and missile components, including F-14 parts from Pentagon surplus sales, customs agents said. The surplus purchases were returned after two Multicore officers were sentenced to prison for weapons export violations. London-based Multicore is now out of business, but customs continues to investigate whether U.S. companies sold it military equipment illegally.

In 2005, customs agents came upon the same surplus F-14 parts with the evidence labels still attached while investigating a different company suspected of serving as an Iranian front. They seized the items again. They declined to provide details because the investigation is still under way.

_Arif Ali Durrani, a Pakistani, was convicted last year in California in the illegal export of weapons components to the United Arab Emirates, Malaysia and Belgium in 2004 and 2005 and sentenced to just over 12 years in prison. Customs investigators say the items included Chinook helicopter engine parts for Iran that he bought from a U.S. company that acquired them from a Pentagon surplus sale, and that those parts made it to Iran via Malaysia. Durrani is appealing his conviction.

An accomplice, former Naval intelligence officer George Budenz, pleaded guilty and was sentenced in July to a year in prison. Durrani's prison term is his second; he was convicted in 1987 of illegally exporting U.S. missile parts to Iran.

_State Metal Industries, a Camden, N.J., company convicted in June of violating export laws over a shipment of AIM-7 Sparrow missile guidance parts it bought from Pentagon surplus in 2003 and sold to an entity partly owned by the Chinese government. The company pleaded guilty, was fined $250,000 and placed on probation for three years. Customs and Border Protection inspectors seized the parts — nearly 200 pieces of the guidance system for the Sparrow missile system — while inspecting cargo at a New Jersey port.

"Our mistake was selling it for export," said William Robertson, State Metal's attorney. He said the company knew the material was going to China but didn't know the Chinese government partially owned the buyer.

_In October, Ronald Wiseman, a longtime Pentagon surplus employee in the Middle East, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 18 months in prison for stealing surplus military Humvees and selling them to a customer in Saudi Arabia from 1999 to 2002. An accomplice, fellow surplus employee Gayden Woodson, will be sentenced this month.

The Humvees were equipped for combat zones and some weren't recovered, Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Ingersoll said.

_A California company, All Ports, shipped hundreds of containers of U.S. military technology to China between 1994 and 1999, much of it acquired in Pentagon surplus sales, court documents show. Customs agents discovered the sales in May 1999 when All Ports tried to ship to China components for guided missiles, bombs, the B-1 bomber and underwater mines. The company and its owners were convicted in 2000; an appeals court upheld the conviction in 2002.

Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., called the cases "a huge breakdown, an absolute, huge breakdown."

"The military should not sell or give away any sensitive military equipment. If we no longer need it, it needs to be destroyed — totally destroyed," said Shays, until this month the chairman of a House panel on national security. "The Department of Defense should not be supplying sensitive military equipment to our adversaries, our enemies, terrorists."

It's no secret to defense experts that valuable technology can be found amid surplus scrap.

On a visit to a Defense Department surplus site about five years ago, defense consultant Randall Sweeney literally stumbled upon some that shouldn't have been up for sale.

"I was walking through a pile of supposedly de-milled electrical items and found a heat-seeking missile warhead intact," Sweeney said, declining to identify the surplus location for security reasons. "I carried it over and showed them. I said, 'This shouldn't be in here.'"

Sweeney, president of Defense and Aerospace International in West Palm Beach, Fla., sees human error as a big problem. Surplus items are numbered, and an error of a single digit can make sensitive technology available, he said. Knowledgeable buyers could easily spot a valuable item, he added: "I'm not the only sophisticated eye in the world."

Baillie said the Pentagon is working to tighten security. Steps include setting up property centers to better identify surplus parts and employing people skilled at spotting sensitive items. If there is uncertainty about an item, he said, it is destroyed.

Of the 76,000 parts for the F-14, 60 percent are "general hardware" such as nuts and bolts and can be sold to the public without restriction, Baillie said. About 10,000 are unique to Tomcats and will be destroyed.

An additional 23,000 parts are valuable for military and commercial use and are being studied to see whether they can be sold, Baillie said.

Asked why the Pentagon would sell any F-14 parts, given their value to Iran, Baillie said: "Our first priority truly is national security, and we take that very seriously. However, we have to balance that with our other requirement to be good stewards of the taxpayers' money."

Kutz, the government investigator, said surplus F-14 parts shouldn't be sold. He believes Iran already has Tomcat parts from Pentagon surplus sales: "The key now is, going forward, to shut that down and not let it happen again."

French Visit To Tehran, Seen As Diplomatic Faux Pas, Is Aborted (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 16 — At a time when most world powers have forged a united front against Iran because of its nuclear program, President Jacques Chirac arranged to send his foreign minister to Tehran to talk about a side issue, then abruptly canceled the visit earlier this month in embarrassing failure.

Mr. Chirac's troubles stemmed from his deep desire to help resolve the crisis in Lebanon before his term runs out in May. To that end, he decided to seek the support of Iran, which, along with Syria, backs the radical Shiite organization Hezbollah, three senior French officials said in describing the effort.

So he planned to send Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy to Tehran, only to call off the trip two days before it was to have taken place, said the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly on diplomatic issues.

Both Mr. Douste-Blazy and senior Foreign Ministry officials concluded that such a trip was doomed to fail and that it would send the wrong signal just weeks after the United Nations Security Council unanimously approved sanctions intended to curb Iran's nuclear program, they added.

That put Mr. Douste-Blazy in the uncomfortable position of having to tell Mr. Chirac that he did not want to go, one senior official said.

"This is not French diplomacy at its best," the official said of the initiative, which was disclosed in the newspaper Le Monde on Tuesday afternoon.

When Mr. Douste-Blazy visited Saudi Arabia and Egypt this month, the foreign ministers of both countries also informed him that they strongly opposed any such initiative.

Prince Saud al-Faisal, the Saudi foreign minister, was so determined to stop the visit that he spoke to Mr. Douste-Blazy in uncharacteristically blunt terms — "I am going to tell you, do not go" — according to a senior official familiar with the conversation.

The French plan contradicted the Bush administration strategy of trying to isolate and punish Iran. Rather than negotiating with Tehran, the United States is building up American forces in the Persian Gulf, persuading many international businesses to cut off dealings with Iran and trying to curtail Iranian operations in Iraq.

The Bush administration apparently was not consulted in advance about the plan, and Stephen J. Hadley, the Bush administration's national security adviser, protested to Jean-David Levitte, France's ambassador in Washington.

In subsequent communications with R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, and Craig R. Stapleton, the American ambassador to France, the Foreign Ministry gave assurances that it was trying hard to ensure that Mr. Douste-Blazy did not travel to Iran.

Iran, meanwhile, has officially expressed its displeasure that the trip was canceled.

For the moment, Jean-Claude Cousseran, a former head of France's foreign intelligence service and former ambassador to Egypt, is planning to make the trip to Tehran, leaving open the face-saving possibility that the foreign minister could follow at a later, unspecified, date, a senior French official said.

But the initiative is so ad hoc and divisive that one senior official said even Mr. Cousseran's trip might not take place.

Mr. Chirac's initiative is surprising because he has consistently taken a hard line against Iran and its nuclear program, privately expressing the view that the Islamic republic cannot be trusted. While other global players, including Russia and China, regularly send senior officials to Tehran, France had joined with Britain, Germany and the United States in pressuring Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment activities or face sanctions in the Security Council. In fact, France largely drafted the initial resolution in tough language that was watered down in the end.

French officials stressed that discussion of Iran's nuclear program was not part of the new initiative, and that Mr. Chirac was simply trying anything he could think of to help Lebanon, where about 1,700 French troops are stationed as part of a United Nations peacekeeping force.

Mr. Chirac's interest in Lebanon is described by some of his close aides as an obsession, and he seems driven to help bolster its weak government before his presidential mandate ends, even if it means courting Tehran.

Specifically, Mr. Chirac would like Iran's help to curb the activities of Hezbollah. He also wants to win Iran's support for an international tribunal to try the killers of Lebanon's former prime minister, Rafik Hariri, who was a close friend.

Mr. Chirac has repeatedly ruled out any dialogue with Syria, which he blames for Mr. Hariri's assassination.

On Jan. 25, Mr. Chirac is playing host to an international donors' conference for the reconstruction of Lebanon, and he is determined that it be a success. Neither Iran nor Hezbollah, which is part of the Lebanese government, have been invited.

But Hezbollah and its backers in Lebanon have relentlessly criticized the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, saying it has lost its legitimacy and calling on it to resign.

Mr. Douste-Blazy's visit would have been a diplomatic coup for Iran. The last time France sent a senior delegation to Tehran was in October 2003, when Dominique de Villepin, who was then foreign minister, spent less than a day there along with his British and German counterparts.

The trio announced an ambitious nuclear plan aimed at rewarding Iran with political, economic and security incentives in return for the suspension of its uranium enrichment activities. The plan foundered after Iran rejected international demands to stop making enriched uranium, which can be used to make energy or nuclear weapons.

The French initiative on Iran underscores the disarray of French foreign policy as Mr. Chirac nears the end of his second term as president.

It had been developed inside Élysée Palace by Maurice Gourdault-Montagne, Mr. Chirac's national security adviser. When Mr. Gourdault-Montagne met with Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, on the fringes of a security conference in Bahrain last month, Mr. Mottaki suggested that Mr. Douste-Blazy visit Tehran.

Mr. Douste-Blazy met with Mr. Mottaki twice last year, in Lebanon and at the United Nations. But Mr. Douste-Blazy concluded that it would be impossible to meet with him in Iran, particularly after he was told that Mr. Mottaki was the Iranian official who opened a conference on Holocaust denial in Tehran that was condemned around the world.

Senators Denounce Bush Policy Limiting Refuge For Iraqis (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — Senate lawmakers sharply criticized the Bush administration on Tuesday for failing to provide refuge in the United States for the most vulnerable of the Iraqis fleeing the violence at home.

The United Nations estimates that two million Iraqis have fled the country and that 1.7 million are currently displaced within the country. Of those, roughly 500,000 have been displaced since February, with roughly 40,000 to 50,000 more fleeing their homes each month. Among them are Iraqis who have been threatened or attacked for working with American troops and companies.

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Ellen Sauerbrey, an assistant secretary of state, acknowledged that only 466 Iraqis had been admitted as refugees since the American invasion of Iraq in 2003. She said that expanding the resettlement of vulnerable Iraqis in the United States was "a top priority."

Ms. Sauerbrey said the State Department was considering several options, including offering the Iraqis refugee or other special status, and expediting the processing of Iraqi religious minorities and of refugees who have worked for the American government.

The bipartisan panel of senators called for prompt action, warning that the United States was abandoning many Iraqis who had helped the United States — as translators, guides and contractors — at great personal risk.

Two Iraqis who were recently granted political asylum in the United States testified at the hearing about being threatened and beaten before they escaped their country.

Several senators and some outside witnesses also called on the United States to increase its assistance for Iraqi refugees and to support an international conference to address the crisis. The conference, which would be held by the United Nations, would most likely include Syria and Iran, which have received hundreds of thousands of Iraqi refugees but are also viewed by the Bush administration as sponsors of the insurgency in Iraq.

"We have a special obligation to keep faith with the Iraqis who have bravely worked for us and have often paid a terrible price for it by providing them with safe refuge in the U.S.," said Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who leads the Judiciary Committee's immigration subcommittee.

Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, asked Ms. Sauerbrey why the Bush administration was not doing more. "That's a very small percentage of those who are in need," Senator Specter said of the number of Iraqis resettled in the United States.

He raised particular concerns about the status of 20,000 available refugee slots for the current fiscal year, which have yet to be allocated to any refugee group. "Why not use them now when there is such a crushing need?" Mr. Specter asked.

Ms. Sauerbrey said it was still uncertain whether financing would be provided for those slots. She also said a rigorous and often time-consuming process of security screening to distinguish bona fide refugees from terrorists had slowed the resettlement of Iraqis and discouraged the United Nations from screening applicants and referring them to American officials.

From Feb. 1, 2003, through Sept. 30, 2006, the United Nations screened 3,964 Iraqi refugees for resettlement to various nations, with Australia accepting the largest number. Of that group, only 483 were referred to the United States because of long processing times for resettlement. The United States admitted 202 Iraqi refugees last year, officials said.

Ms. Sauerbrey said Iraqis would fill most of the 20,000 refugee slots, if the financing for those slots becomes available. "We are working very diligently," said Ms. Sauerbrey, who oversees the State Department's bureau of population, refugees and migration. "This issue is the very top priority in my bureau."

Pressure on the Bush administration has been mounting in recent weeks, with advocacy groups and some former government officials calling for the United States to accept a larger share of the refugee burden. Most Iraqi refugees have fled to neighboring countries like Syria and Jordan. But those countries are staggering under the load.

Within the Bush administration, there was, until quite recently, considerable hope that improving security in Iraq would lead many of the displaced to return home. In the Bush administration's proposed report on refugee admissions, which was submitted to Congress last fall, officials said they hoped that "significant numbers of Iraqi refugees will ultimately be able to return to Iraq."

That view has changed, officials say.

"At present more Iraqis are fleeing their homes to other areas of Iraq and to neighboring countries than are returning," Ms. Sauerbrey said.

Senate Panel Seeks Asylum For Iraqis (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

Senators yesterday urged a State Department official to expedite the flow of Iraqi refugees into the U.S., a process that has been slowed to a trickle by security measures designed to stop terrorists from entering the country.

"One of the reasons you are seeing so few Iraqis come into the United States since 2003 is because of an enhanced security review," said Ellen R. Sauerbrey, assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration policy.

During Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein's rule, about 37,000 Iraqis were granted asylum in the U.S., she told the Senate Judiciary Committee. Since Congress passed a 2003 law mandating stricter screening of immigrants, however, only 466 Iraqis have made their way to America, she said.

Meanwhile, a humanitarian crisis has been brewing in the war-torn country, Mrs. Sauerbrey said. One million to 2 million of Iraq's roughly 27 million people have been displaced by an increasingly vicious sectarian conflict between Shi'ites and Sunnis.

"We bear a heavy responsibility for their plight," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and committee member. "America must respond."

Mrs. Sauerbrey said the refugee crisis began to develop in February, when the bombing of a prominent Shi'ite mosque in the city of Samarra heightened sectarian fighting.

"I came into my position just about exactly a year ago, and at that time, we were touting the fact that repatriation was so successful because most of the resources that we were sending at that time were to return people. And a very large number of Iraqis were returning to Iraq," Mrs. Sauerbrey said.

Mr. Kennedy and Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, pressed Mrs. Sauerbrey to do more for the refugees.

"Our nation is spending $8 billion a month to wage the war in Iraq. Yet to meet the urgent humanitarian needs of the refugees who have fled the war, the State Department plans to spend only $20 million in the current fiscal year," Mr. Kennedy said.

Mrs. Sauerbrey said the U.S. government is most focused on aiding Iraqi refugees who have fled to neighboring countries but is looking at ways to allow more Iraqis into the United States.

"We are looking at special visas, we are looking at special benefit parole, we are looking at some way to do special in-country processing [in Iraq]," she said, adding that unrest makes it hard to run a stable processing operation.

Two Iraqi men who worked with American military forces, and then fled their country after being hunted by insurgents, testified before the panel.

One Iraqi man, using the name Sammy and testifying behind a large wooden panel to protect his identity, was a 27-year old Sunni who translated for U.S. troops in Mosul. He was targeted for execution by insurgents and fled to the U.S. from Iraq under a special immigrant translator visa.

"My hope is that all brave Iraqis who work and brave so much will have the same chance I have to live in freedom," Sammy said.

Mr. Specter, the ranking Republican on the panel, said more should be done to educate Iraqis about this visa, because few know about it.

Iraqi Refugee Crisis Seen Deepening (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Iraq is emerging as one of the fastest-growing refugee crises in the world, with an estimated 1.7 million Iraqis displaced from their homes and up to 100,000 fleeing the country to Jordan, Syria and other nations amid intensifying sectarian violence, U.S. officials and experts testified yesterday.

Yet the United States has allowed only 466 Iraqis to immigrate under refugee status since 2003 -- including 202 out of 70,000 slots for refugees last year -- in part because of more stringent security screenings, officials said at a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Democratic lawmakers and advocates for refugees called for increased U.S. funding and other initiatives to help the fleeing Iraqis, and in particular those who have risked their lives working with American forces.

"We should not repeat the tragic and immoral mistake from the Vietnam era and leave friends without a refuge and subject to violent reprisals," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the committee's chairman. The Bush administration has $20 million in its fiscal 2007 budget for Iraqi refugee assistance; the United States is spending $8 billion a month on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The refugee explosion predicted by the United Nations that did not materialize immediately after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq is taking place now, Ellen R. Sauerbrey, the assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration, told the committee.

The exodus of Iraqis from their neighborhoods and across international borders has burgeoned since the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra ignited widespread killings between religious sects, reversing an earlier trend in which 300,000 Iraqis returned to their homeland from 2003 through 2006, Sauerbrey said.

"Due to the upsurge in sectarian violence in 2006, this trend of repatriation has reversed itself, and at present more Iraqis are fleeing their homes to other areas of Iraq and to neighboring countries than are returning," Sauerbrey said.

As many as 2 million Iraqis have fled the country in recent years and before the war, including about 700,000 to Jordan and 600,000 to Syria, nations that have taken the bulk of the exodus, according to the Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. Many of the refugees have been "left with minimal resources and are living on the margins," Sauerbrey said, with children lacking access to school and adequate health care.

The most practical, immediate way to alleviate the crisis is to step up aid for refugees in these host countries to ensure they do not close their borders, officials and experts said, calling for a regional conference on the topic.

"We have to focus on ways to accommodate them in the countries nearby -- Egypt, Syria, Jordan, Lebanon," said Ken Bacon, president of Refugees International. "Otherwise they will be rejected, and there will be no safety valve whatsoever," said Bacon, who called for the Bush administration to double its contribution to the UNHCR budget for Iraqi displacement.

Still, Democratic lawmakers stressed that the United States can and should do more to resettle Iraqis in this country.

"We have a special obligation to keep faith with the Iraqis who have bravely worked for us -- and have often paid a terrible price for it -- by providing them with safe refuge in the U.S.," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the committee's immigration panel.

Still, two Iraqis who testified yesterday -- using pseudonyms and speaking from behind a screen to protect their identities -- illustrated how difficult it is for even the most loyal Iraqi allies to gain sanctuary in the United States.

One man, a 42-year-old truck driver who delivered water to U.S. military forces, recounted how insurgents had blocked his truck one morning, beat him and broken the arm of his son, and threatened to kill him if he kept working for the Americans. "I stayed up every night" afterward watching for attackers, he said, but continued delivering water.

Five months later, he said, insurgents stopped him again, ordered him to drive to the desert and then beat him unconscious. He then decided to flee Iraq with his wife and six children. After passing through five countries on four continents, the family arrived in the United States two years ago by taxi from Mexico on a fake Greek passport with the aid of smugglers. He was detained by U.S. authorities but finally gained asylum.

Another man, a 27-year-old interpreter for the U.S. military, was targeted for assassination, he testified. Fleeing Mosul "just hoping to stay alive," he was injured by a car bomb. He won U.S. asylum after an Army general intervened.

"Without our translators, we are deaf and dumb," testified Marine Capt. Zachary J. Iscol. Iscol's interpreter faced death threats and risked his life at Iscol's side during a battle in Fallujah but has not gained refuge in the United States.

Few Iraqis Are Able To Find Sanctuary Within The U.S. (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

Two years ago, an Iraqi man shepherded his wife and six children onto a bus that would take them to Turkey and away from the militants threatening to kill him for delivering water to the U.S. military.

Five countries, four continents and almost 18 months later, they arrived at the U.S.-Mexico border crossing at San Ysidro. The man, an Iraqi Christian who calls himself John, handed border officials a fake Greek passport and told them that "I was an Iraqi" and "needed their help."

John and his family were granted asylum two months ago, but they are among the very few Iraqis able to resettle in the United States, where laws put in place after Sept. 11, 2001, have made it difficult for refugees to gain entry. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that about 2 million Iraqis have fled their country and an additional 40,000 to 50,000 more leave every month — but only 466 have been granted entry to the United States since 2003.

On Tuesday, John and others testified before a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing intended to highlight the region's refugee crisis, which has gained momentum since sectarian violence increased dramatically last year. Though State Department officials say the problem is one of their top priorities, lawmakers questioned the administration's commitment to the issue, especially regarding Iraqis who worked for the United States.

Drawing comparisons to the refugee problem created after the Vietnam War, lawmakers framed the issue as one of moral obligation, strategic prudence and opportunity — particularly to reopen contacts with Syria, where about 500,000 Iraqis have sought refuge, according to UNHCR.

"We should not repeat the tragic and immoral mistake from the Vietnam era and leave friends without a refuge and subject to violent reprisals," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

"We have a special obligation to keep faith with the Iraqis who have bravely worked for us — and have often paid a terrible price for it — by providing them with safe refuge in the U.S.," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the immigration subcommittee.

One new U.S. program offers special immigrant visas to Afghan and Iraqi translators working with the U.S. military, but only 50 are available each year.

The president also sets an annual quota for refugee admissions, including a set number for emergencies. For the 2006 fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30, Bush allocated 70,000 refugee admissions, 5,500 of which were designated for the Middle East and 10,000 of which were for emergencies. About 50,000 refugees were allowed into the U.S. last year, only 202 of whom were from Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0117470

Ellen Sauerbrey, the State Department's assistant secretary for population, refugees and migration, said a lack of funding was one reason the administration has not gotten anywhere near the admissions ceiling for Iraqis.

Kennedy noted that the administration has budgeted $20 million for Iraqi refugees in fiscal 2007, while it is spending $8 billion a month to wage the war.

Sauerbrey also said that regulations put in place since the Sept. 11 attacks required all refugees to be individually screened by the Department of Homeland Security. "It's one reason so few have been admitted since 2003," she said. "It's made it very difficult ... for people to pass through."

In a separate news conference Tuesday, State Department spokesman Tom Casey responded to a question about the low numbers of Iraqi admissions by saying that "the important thing to understand is that Iraqi refugees are being treated no differently than refugees from any other country in the world."

On Capitol Hill, John, who used only his first name, testified in Aramaic from behind a wooden screen, because he feared for the safety of his family. A Chaldean, or Iraqi Eastern Rite Catholic, John said that persecution was rendering Christianity almost extinct in Iraq and that his family had been "blessed" by asylum in the U.S.

"I ask that you continue to be as gracious to my former countrymen and fellow Chaldeans who have been forced to leave their homes," he said.

Boxer-Rice Exchange Resonates For Women (AP)

By Jocelyn Noveck

AP, January 17, 2007

A "leap backward" for feminism, the White House spokesman calls it. Nothing of the sort, feminists reply. Mean-spirited, say some. Perfectly appropriate, say others.

However one interprets Sen. Barbara Boxer's remark last week to Condoleezza Rice that the secretary of state, single and childless, doesn't have a "personal price" to pay in Iraq, the brief exchange still has people debating.

And for some women, it highlights a larger question: Just how do you define "personal price" when talking about your country's war?

Boxer's comment came during a contentious Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing last week, as Rice was grilled on Iraq by mostly skeptical senators. "Who pays the price?" asked Boxer, a California Democrat. "I'm not going to pay a personal price. My kids are too old and my grandchild is too young. You're not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, with immediate family. So who pays the price? The American military and their families."

The reference to Rice's personal status was an instant catalyst for vigorous chatter on blogs, TV and talk radio, ranging from the conservative Rush Limbaugh (Boxer hit "below the ovaries") to the liberal Joy Behar on ABC's "The View" (Rice "deserved it.")

As for Rice, who assured Boxer she understood the sacrifice of military families, she later had a more pointed response, telling Fox News: "Gee, I thought single women had come further than that." On the same network, White House spokesman Tony Snow called Boxer's remark "a great leap backward for feminism."

Not to the country's most prominent feminist, Gloria Steinem, who said Snow's remark "takes your breath away."

"It had nothing to do with feminism," Steinem told The Associated Press. "It was perfectly reasonable, and it could have come from anyone — a grandfather as well as a grandmother. Sen. Boxer was trying to draw a parallel" between herself and the secretary.

For Christina Hoff Sommers, a scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, Boxer's comments were not so much a "leap backward" as merely "mean-spirited and thoughtless," not to mention "sexist and politically absurd."

"She seems to be saying that an unmarried, childless woman should not be involved in decisions that affect traditional families," Sommers said. "By that standard, Susan B. Anthony would be disqualified. And how about Elizabeth I?"

"But I don't expect to hear much protest (from feminists)," said Sommers, "because their left-wing politics always trump their commitment to the cause of women."

Obvious political divides aside, did the Boxer-Rice incident tap into genuine feelings among ordinary Americans? Women interviewed seemed much less ready with a quick verdict on the exchange, but said it evoked struggles they're having in their own hearts and minds.

Linda Martin, owner of a graphics design firm in Miami, hasn't closely followed news of the Boxer-Rice exchange. But she understands what may have motivated Boxer's remarks, which she characterizes as an "emotional way of putting the situation."

"If you don't have kids, it's hard to put yourself in the position of someone who does," said Martin, 53, who has a 19-year-old son. Martin has opposed the war from the beginning. But as it's gone on, she's grown increasingly fearful that one day, her family might have to confront a reinstated draft.

"It's just this nagging thing at the back of my mind," Martin said. "We still don't have an idea how long this war is going to go on. My husband and I have talked about it: What would happen if there was a draft? It's an awful situation to be in."

Barbara Van Bogart is demographically in the same category as Boxer — children that are too old, and grandchildren too young. Yet asked if the draft is ever on her mind, she said, "You bet it is."

"I feel like we've dodged a bullet with our kids," said Van Bogart, 58, of Seattle, who works in the financial field. "I'm not so sure about our grandchildren. I hope they never, ever have to face this."

Marla Lasine, a year younger than Rice at 51, wasn't offended by Boxer's comments, which she didn't interpret as unfair to the secretary. She emphasizes, however, that as a single woman with no children, she feels a strong personal stake in the war like anyone else.

"This war affects me because it affects the guy next door, who does have children," says Lasine of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla.

"I am not distant from the consequences of this war, because this is the country that I live in."

Former U.N. Oil-for-food Program Chief Charged With Bribery (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 17, 2007

NEW YORK -- The former United Nations oil-for-food chief was charged Tuesday with bribery and conspiracy to commit wire fraud for allegedly accepting $160,000 to illegally influence the $64 billion program.

Benon Sevan, 69, of Nicosia, Cyprus, countered through his lawyer that he was a political scapegoat and had accounted for every penny as he successfully ran the largest humanitarian program in U.N. history, helping to save "tens of thousands of innocent people from death by disease and starvation."

The charges were contained in a rewrite of an indictment stemming from the scandal over the program set up from 1996 to 2003 to permit the Iraqi government to sell oil primarily to buy food and medicine for suffering Iraqis.

The program was designed to help Iraqis cope with U.N. sanctions imposed after Saddam Hussein's 1990 invasion of Iraq, but a yearlong investigation concluded that it was corrupted by bureaucrats, oil tycoons and Saddam after the former Iraqi leader was allowed to choose the buyers of Iraqi oil and the sellers of humanitarian goods.

Federal and state prosecutors also announced the indictment of Ephraim Nadler, 79, of Manhattan, on the same charges. The U.N.-appointed investigation said he "alternates among New York, Geneva and Egypt" but his whereabouts were unknown.

Nadler, a brother-in-law of former U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, who is Egyptian, allegedly helped a coconspirator obtain the right to buy Iraqi oil under the program in exchange for commissions from the oil sales and then funneled approximately $160,000 of these oil commissions to Sevan, the indictment said.

Attorney Eric Lewis called Sevan, who had worked for the United Nations for 40 years, "a scapegoat and a distraction from the United States' own massive failures and mismanagement in Iraq." He said Sevan turned over more than $10 billion from the oil-for-food program to the United States when the program ended in 2003 and charged that the money "has effectively vanished and has not been accounted for since then."

Asked about the allegation, Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, said: "Benon Sevan's record speaks for itself. We will have no further comment."

Lewis said Sevan had fully reported on his U.N. disclosure form that he had accepted as family gifts some $144,000 in cash, beginning more than seven years ago.

If convicted, Sevan could face up to 50 years in prison.

Nadler, who was also charged with conspiracy to commit wire fraud by engaging in prohibited financial transactions with Iraq and violating the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, could face up to 112 years in prison.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said the United States has lodged warrants for the arrest of both men with Interpol and will seek their arrest and extradition to the United States.

Garcia said the charges against Sevan demonstrated "how pervasive the corruption was."

FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon said the indictment brings to 14 the number of individuals charged in the case and "strikes at the heart of the corruption that pervaded the oil-for-food program."

Since 2004, Sevan has been the subject of a U.N.-backed probe of fraud and waste in the oil-for-food program.

DOJ_NMG_0117472

In August 2005, the U.N. investigation led by former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker accused Sevan of a conflict of interest in his handling of oil-for-food contracts. Sevan resigned from the U.N. that same month and returned to his native Cyprus.

Volcker's investigating committee also accused him of accepting $147,184 in kickbacks for steering the contracts to a company in which Nadler was a director.

It said his finances were "precarious" before the kickbacks started.

An earlier report questioned $160,000 in cash that Sevan said he received between 1999 and 2003 from his aunt in Cyprus. The report called the money "unexplained wealth" and noted that the aunt, who has died, was a retired government photographer living on a modest pension.

His attorney said Sevan knew nothing of Nadler's arrangements and credited his client with bringing reports of surcharges being paid to Saddam's regime to the attention of the U.N. Security Council.

On Feb. 22, South Korean businessman Tongsun Park is scheduled to be sentenced for his conviction on charges he accepted at least $2 million to serve Iraq's interests in the scandal. He could face up to five years in prison.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Miller told the jury in Park's trial last July that Park was part of a decade-long conspiracy to bring about the lifting of sanctions imposed on Iraq after it invaded Kuwait and brought about the first Gulf War.

Miller said Park used his relationship with Boutros-Ghali to join an effort by Samir A. Vincent, an Iraqi-American, to earn the favor of Iraq and share as much as $45 million in windfall gains if the sanctions were lifted.

Vincent, who testified against Park, has pleaded guilty to federal charges and is cooperating with the government. He testified that Park arranged meetings during 1993 with himself, Boutros-Ghali and Vincent, including three meetings at Boutros-Ghali's Manhattan residence.

Miller told the jury that Park and Vincent arranged a 1993 meeting in Geneva, Switzerland, with Boutros-Ghali and Tariq Aziz, then Iraq's deputy foreign minister, and Barzan al-Tikriti, the half brother of Saddam who then was the Iraqi ambassador to the United Nations in Geneva.

Several others accused in the conspiracy are awaiting trial, including Texas oilman Oscar S. Wyatt Jr., who has pleaded not guilty.

A 623-page final U.N. report documenting massive corruption in the U.N. oil-for-food program cleared Boutros-Ghali, who headed the world body when the oil-for-food program was launched, of accepting bribes.

Oil-for-Food Chief Faces Bribe Charge (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

NEW YORK -- The former United Nations oil-for-food chief was charged with taking a $160,000 bribe to influence who could buy Iraqi oil under the scandal-tainted humanitarian program.

The indictment of Benon Sevan, 69 years old, of Nicosia, Cyprus, brings to 14 the number of people charged in the case, and "strikes at the heart of the corruption that pervaded the oil-for-food program," said Federal Bureau of Investigation Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon. Mr. Sevan was charged with bribery and conspiracy to commit fraud.

The $64 billion program ran from 1996 to 2003 and allowed Iraq to sell oil primarily to buy food and medicine for Iraqis suffering under U.N. sanctions. But the operation was riddled with corruption involving bureaucrats, oil tycoons and Saddam Hussein's regime.

Mr. Sevan, who had worked for the U.N. for 40 years, said through his lawyer that he was being made a political scapegoat, and that he had accounted for every penny.

Former Chief Of U.N. Effort Faces Charges Of Corruption (NYT)

By Julia Preston

New York Times, January 17, 2007

Federal prosecutors announced charges yesterday against the former head of the United Nations oil-for-food program, accusing him of receiving $160,000 in kickbacks from sales of Iraqi oil under the government of Saddam Hussein.

The seven-count indictment, unsealed in Federal District Court in Manhattan, was brought against Benon V. Sevan, 69, a Cypriot who served as executive director of the $64 billion aid program from 1997 until mid-2003. He was accused together with

Ephraim Nadler, 79, a naturalized American citizen born in Egypt, of taking illegal commissions from an Egyptian oil trader in exchange for helping him secure contracts to purchase Iraqi oil. Both were charged with conspiracy and wire fraud.

Mr. Sevan has known for some time that he was under federal investigation. The charges echo an Aug. 8, 2005, report by a commission headed by Paul A. Volcker, a former Federal Reserve chairman, which found that Mr. Sevan had profited from illicit transactions with the trader, Fakhry Abdelnour.

The indictment highlights the lingering corruption scandals at the United Nations in the first weeks of the term of a new secretary general, Ban Ki-moon, a South Korean. The Volcker commission concluded that the United Nations needed "thoroughgoing reform" of its management. So far Mr. Ban has not made clear if he intends to carry out sweeping change.

Mr. Nadler is the brother of Leia Boutros-Ghali, the wife of the former secretary general of the United Nations, Boutros Boutros-Ghali. Mr. Abdelnour is also related to Mr. Boutros-Ghali, who is from Egypt. There is no mention of Mr. Boutros-Ghali in the new charges.

Mr. Abdelnour was the president of a small company, African Middle East Petroleum Company, known as AMEP, and the Volcker commission said Mr. Nadler was its treasurer. The indictment describes an August 2001 transaction in which it says Mr. Abdelnour arranged to purchase one million barrels of oil from Iraq, paying a secret surcharge to Saddam Hussein's government. The charges assert that Mr. Nadler had helped Mr. Abdelnour obtain the contract. (Mr. Abdelnour appears in the indictment as an unidentified co-conspirator, but was identified in the Volcker report.)

Soon after, the indictment says, Mr. Abdelnour transferred $50,000 to a Geneva bank account belonging to Mr. Nadler. At a meeting in Geneva in late August 2001, Mr. Nadler made cash payments of as much as $40,000 to Mr. Sevan, the indictment says.

Mr. Sevan's lawyer, Eric L. Lewis, called the allegations "ludicrous." He said Mr. Sevan had received cash payments in that period from an elderly aunt who was giving away her assets. Mr. Sevan fully declared the gifts in his United Nations financial disclosures, Mr. Lewis said.

"Whatever arrangement Mr. Nadler had with Mr. Abdelnour, Mr. Sevan had no knowledge," Mr. Lewis said. He said the government was trying to distract attention from "financial fraud and ineptitude by the United States in Iraq on an unprecedented scale."

The United Nations program was set up to ease the impact on Iraqi citizens of international sanctions by allowing Iraq to sell oil and use the proceeds to purchase food and medicine. Mark J. Mershon, the assistant director in charge of the F.B.I.'s New York office, said Mr. Sevan's management of the program "was marked by profiteering and profligacy."

After leaving the program, Mr. Sevan remained at the United Nations on a salary of $1 a year while Mr. Volcker's investigation was underway. On Aug. 7, 2005, one day before Mr. Volcker's report was released, Mr. Sevan resigned and moved back to Cyprus.

Federal prosecutors said they would seek his extradition. If found guilty, he faces a maximum of 50 years in prison. Mr. Nadler is also out of the country, but prosecutors did not say where.

Ex-U.N. Official Indicted In Oil-food Scam (WT)

By Betsy Pisik And Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

A federal grand jury in New York yesterday indicted Benon Sevan, former administrator of the United Nations' oil-for-food program, on charges of bribery and conspiracy to commit wire fraud, the first criminal charges filed against a U.N. official in connection with the humanitarian program.

The indictment, unsealed in U.S. District Court in New York, also named a brother-in-law of former U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, New York businessman Efraim Nadler, a dual U.S.-Egyptian citizen.

Because both men are assumed to be abroad -- Mr. Sevan in his native Cyprus and Mr. Nadler in Europe -- the U.S. government has lodged arrest warrants with Interpol to extradite them to the United States for trial.

"The oil-for-food program was created to provide critical humanitarian aid to the Iraqi people," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia in New York. "But the former government of Iraq thoroughly corrupted the program by employing undisclosed Iraqi agents in the United States to try to influence the terms under which the program was adopted and by demanding secret kickbacks from participants in the program during its operation."

Mr. Sevan, 69, is accused of illegally receiving $160,000 "generated from the sale of Iraqi oil under the program -- from Nadler on behalf of the government of Iraq," according to the indictment.

Eric Lewis, an attorney for Mr. Sevan, dismissed the charges, saying the U.S. government is using his client "as a scapegoat and a distraction from the United States' own massive failures and mismanagement in Iraq." He said the money Mr. Sevan is accused of accepting as a bribe was reported to the United Nations years ago as family gifts.

Mr. Nadler, 79, was named on charges of helping an unnamed co-conspirator obtain the right to buy Iraqi oil under the oil-for-food program in exchange for commissions from the oil sales, and then diverting $160,000 of the commissions to Mr. Sevan.

The connections were first exposed in 2005 by the Independent Inquiry Committee -- led by former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul A. Volcker -- investigating the program.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "would like to convey that the United Nations has been cooperating with the authorities about follow-up to the Volcker reports and the U.N. will continue to do so," said spokesman Farhan Haq. "He reiterates his commitment to have the United Nations uphold the highest ethical standards."

Former Secretary-General Kofi Annan waived Mr. Sevan's immunity upon the request of prosecutors more than a year ago. If convicted, Mr. Sevan faces 50 years in prison and Mr. Nadler faces 112 years, prosecutors said.

Mr. Haq said U.N. officials could be allowed to testify in a case, depending on the circumstances.

The oil-for-food program was a seven-year $64 billion U.N. effort to sell Iraq's oil and buy food and essential goods to alleviate civilian suffering caused by international economic sanctions imposed on Saddam Hussein's government after his 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

The sanctions remained in place, with modifications, until the government was overthrown by U.S.-led coalition forces in 2003.

The program was administered by Mr. Sevan, but its rules were set by Security Council members and its contracts were awarded by Saddam's regime.

Over time, companies were required to give kickbacks to Iraq to win contracts to sell merchandise or buy oil, creating a slush fund for the regime at a time of acute hardship for civilians.

FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon, who heads the bureau's New York office, said the indictment "strikes at the heart of the corruption" that pervaded the oil-for-food program.

"As executive director of the program and undersecretary-general of the U.N., Benon Sevan was responsible for maintaining the program's probity and propriety," Mr. Mershon said. "Instead, his administration of the program was marked by profiteering and profligacy."

The Sevan and Nadler indictments bring to 14 the number of persons charged or convicted in the oil-for-food investigation.

Former U.N. Oil-for-Food Chief Indicted (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

The former executive director of the United Nations oil-for-food program in Iraq was indicted yesterday by a Manhattan federal prosecutor for taking about $160,000 in bribes.

Benon V. Sevan of Cyprus is the third U.N. official to be charged with or convicted of crimes in a federal probe of corruption at the world body. Sevan had overseen a $64 billion program created in December 1996 to permit Iraq to sell oil to buy food and medicine and repay billions in war reparations over its 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Michael J. Garcia, the U.S. attorney from the Southern District of New York, issued a warrant through Interpol for the arrest of Sevan at his home in Cyprus, as well as a warrant for Efraim "Fred" Nadler, a New York businessman who was indicted on charges of channeling the illegal payments to Sevan. Nadler's whereabouts are unknown.

If convicted, Sevan, 69, could face up to 50 years in prison and Nadler, 79, could be sentenced to a maximum of 112 years. Garcia said he would seek their extradition to face charges. Sevan's indictment marks the culmination of a 2 1/2 -year criminal investigation by two New York prosecutors into corruption at the United Nations that has led to the indictment or conviction of 14 people.

"The oil-for-food program was established to provide humanitarian relief to the Iraqi people, not to line the pockets of corrupt officials," said Robert M. Morgenthau, the Manhattan district attorney who participated in the investigation. Garcia said in a statement that the indictment "demonstrates how pervasive the corruption was, and how that corruption undermined the operation of the program."

Sevan's lawyer, Eric L. Lewis, dismissed the charges as "baseless" and said his client is a "scapegoat and a distraction from the United States' own massive failures and mismanagement in Iraq." Lewis said that Sevan -- who served in some of the world's most dangerous capitals during his 40 years at the United Nations -- had previously disclosed the money as a "family gift."

The U.N. oil-for-food program was marked by scandal. Former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein siphoned at least $2 billion in illegal kickbacks from companies trading in the program, before it was placed under the control of the U.S.-led military coalition that invaded Iraq in March 2003.

Kofi Annan, then the U.N. secretary general, appointed former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul A. Volcker to lead an inquiry into allegations that Iraq granted U.N. officials, including Sevan, lucrative rights to buy discounted Iraqi oil in exchange for favorable treatment.

Volcker accused Sevan of engaging in "a grave conflict of interest" by using his contacts with the Iraqi leadership to steer millions of dollars in contracts to an Egyptian businessman. He accused Nadler -- the brother-in-law of ex-U.N. secretary general Boutros Boutros Ghali -- of channeling nearly $160,000 in proceeds from Iraqi oil sales to Sevan.

The indictment unsealed yesterday affirms some of Volcker's findings, noting that Nadler is alleged to have helped an unnamed co-conspirator "obtain the right to buy Iraqi oil under the oil-for-food program in exchange for commissions from the oil sales, and then allegedly funnelled approximately $160,000 of these oil commissions to Sevan."

Sevan is charged with bribery, wire fraud and conspiracy to commit wire fraud and theft or bribery. Nadler is charged with seven counts of bribery, wire fraud, conspiracy to commit wire fraud and the violation of a 1990 U.N. arms embargo and a 1979 law banning trade with terrorist states. It remains unclear whether Cyprus, which does not have an extradition treaty governing financial crimes with the United States, will surrender Sevan.

Federal authorities announced the indictment as the new U.N. secretary general, Ban Ki Moon, traveled to Washington yesterday to shore up U.N. relations with the United States. Ban told a gathering of Washington Post executives, editors and reporters that he has "a strong and firm commitment" to raise the United Nations to the "highest level of ethical standards." He said he intends to "lead by example," citing a recent pledge to publicly disclose his financial statement each year.

Also yesterday, Ban held his first meeting as secretary general with President Bush, discussing a range of political crises, including Darfur, the Middle East and North Korea. He also pressed Bush to ensure continued U.S. funding for the world body, to support international efforts to halt global warming and to back U.N. efforts to increase assistance to the world's poorest.

Bush welcomed Ban with a slap on the back and urged him to "pick up the phone" and call whenever he wanted to discuss political affairs, according to U.N. sources. He also pressed Ban to have the United Nations play a larger, unspecified political role in Iraq. The U.N. chief responded that while the United Nations is doing everything it can to support Iraq's transition, it is constrained by the lack of security on the ground, the sources said.

"I appreciate so very much how you opened up the discussion with a strong commitment to democracy and freedom," Bush said after the hour-long meeting. "And the United States . . . wants to work with the United Nations to achieve a peace through the spread of freedom."

Ex-Iraqi Minister Back Home After Jail Escape (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 17, 2007

Engineer returns to work after month of hopping through Mideast countries

After spending four months in an Iraqi prison and pulling off an audacious jail break, Aiham Alsammarae flew quietly back into Chicago and was behind the desk of his Downers Grove engineering firm Tuesday.

In an hourlong interview, the former Iraqi electricity minister who is still wanted on corruption charges in his native Iraq gave new details of his escape. The dramatic jailbreak included a high-speed run to Baghdad International Airport, a private jet that flew him out of the country and back-channel talks with Iraqi politicians.

The Iraqi judge overseeing the case expressed surprise that Alsammarae had turned up in Chicago and vowed to take "all legal measures" to return him to Iraq. "We have undertaken legal procedures to get him back to Iraq because he escaped in an illegal way," said Judge Radhi Hamza al-Ridha, who heads the Public Integrity Commission responsible for prosecuting corruption cases in Iraq.

Alsammarae also said he has reached out to officials in the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago and Washington who have assured him, he says, that they are not interested in sending him back to Iraq. A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago declined to comment.

Alsammarae, a dual U.S.-Iraqi citizen from Oak Brook who is accused of misappropriating millions of dollars in Iraqi funds, flew into O'Hare International Airport late Monday.

He had been convicted in October on one charge of misspending public funds that centered on the $200,000 purchase of a generator in southern Iraq months after the U.S.-led invasion. The conviction was overturned in December, but Iraqi authorities said they continued to hold him until they could resolve as many as 12 other corruption cases in which they said he was implicated.

Alsammarae said he had been cleared of all charges and that a judge ordered his release. He said he decided to escape after his jailers told him that he would be transferred to another police station for fingerprinting before being released.

"Technically, I did escape, but they were supposed to let me go in a matter of a few hours," said Alsammarae, who added that he had a private jet waiting for him at the airport for a week before his escape. "If I would have let them take me to the other police station, I feared that I would be killed."

The U.S. and Iraq have an extradition treaty, but it was uncertain whether Alsammarae risks being returned to Iraq to face the unresolved charges. A State Department spokesman said the agency was unaware of any requests for extradition. He declined to provide further information about Alsammarae's case citing privacy rules.

Alsammarae, a secular Sunni who ran the Electricity Ministry in the first post-invasion Iraqi government, said throughout his detention that he was vulnerable to kidnapping at the police station where he was being held. He said he would be killed if Iraqi authorities moved him to a jail run by the Shiite-dominated security forces.

Al-Ridha, the Iraqi judge, said the government still had not managed to pin down responsibility for the jailbreak. The Iraqi police guarding Alsammarae have told investigators only that he was whisked away by "foreigners" speaking a language they didn't understand.

Alsammarae escaped Dec. 17 from the police station jail inside the heavily fortified walls of the Green Zone in central Baghdad. He said he enlisted the help of several Iraqis and Westerners.

During the interview Tuesday, Alsammarae said U.S. government officials did not assist him in his escape. He said he did not want to disclose many details of his jailbreak, but confirmed that it took about 2? hours from the time he broke out of the prison to his arrival in Amman, Jordan. The airport is only a few miles away from the Green Zone, but he twice switched cars to avoid being followed. He also changed his clothes before arriving at the airport.

He said he spent about a month between Amman, and Dubai and Abu Dhabi, both in the United Arab Emirates, consulting with Iraqi leaders and U.S. officials before flying back to the U.S.

Alsammarae, who has long been friends with indicted political fundraiser Antoin "Tony" Rezko, also sought to distance himself from allegations that he oversaw Rezko's bid to build a power plant in northern Iraq.

Alsammarae said he learned through news reports that federal authorities are interested in speaking to him about his relationship with Rezko, but he said authorities have made no attempts to contact him. The two have been "good friends" since they met while studying for advanced degrees at the Illinois Institute of Technology in the late 1970s, Alsammarae said.

The power plant was never built and Rezko's $150 million contract is no longer in effect. Alsammarae declined to give further details about the project, but said he would be willing to speak with federal authorities about it. He added that the project was under the Kurdish Regional Government authority and outside his purview.

U.S. Says Attacks Are Surging In Afghanistan (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 16 — Attacks by militants crossing into Afghanistan from Pakistan have tripled since September along portions of the border, a senior American intelligence official said Tuesday, prompting calls for a greater effort by Pakistan to curb the influx and a larger deployment of American and other NATO soldiers here.

Of particular concern, officials said, has been a rise in attacks by Taliban and other militants from remote and largely ungoverned tribal areas in Pakistan in eastern Afghanistan, where most of the American combat forces in the country are based.

On his first visit to Afghanistan since taking office six weeks ago, Mr. Gates flew by helicopter to a small joint American-Afghan base in Khost Province, less than a mile from the border.

A senior American military intelligence officer, speaking on condition of anonymity, said cross-border attacks had tripled in that part of the border region.

Staff Sgt. Ronald Locklear, one of the 120 American soldiers at the base, said fighters based in Pakistan "cross the border on a regular basis." He said the base was being hit by rocket and mortar fire at least once a week. Officials said they had evidence that Pakistani border guards ignored infiltration of Taliban fighters.

The senior American commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, told reporters after meeting with Mr. Gates that he was hopeful that the Bush administration would seek a much larger aid package from Congress for the training of Afghanistan security forces and for reconstruction projects.

Other officials said that the total budget request was likely to be at least twice last year's level of nearly $3 billion, but that the exact number had not been determined.

The resurgence in attacks by Taliban fighters and other militants began last summer and has continued in eastern Afghanistan even this winter, when fighting would normally subside, officials said.

While praising Pakistan as a "strong ally," Mr. Gates said the border problem "clearly has to be pursued with the Pakistani government."

General Eikenberry said that the "enemy is using both sides of the border" and that even after five years of pressing the Pakistani government to shut down Taliban infiltration, "there is no easy solution to the problem."

American commanders say the surge in cross-border attacks has coincided with an agreement reached last September in which the Pakistani government pulled back its soldiers in the North Waziristan region in return for a pledge from tribal elders not to shelter militants or allow them to engage in illegal behavior.

In the two months before the agreement, the senior American intelligence official said, there were 40 cross-border attacks in Khost and Paktika Provinces. But in the two months after the agreement there were 140 attacks.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, has sent 80,000 troops into the Waziristan tribal areas. On Tuesday, shortly before Mr. Gates arrived on the Afghan side of the border, General Musharraf's military announced that it had destroyed three compounds in South Waziristan used by militants as hide-outs.

In a strike shortly before 7 a.m., helicopters hovering above a complex of five compounds fired a volley of missiles, Pakistani officials said. Three compounds were destroyed, but officials gave different figures for the number of dead.

A security official in Peshawar said at least 20 militants had been killed. Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, the chief military spokesman, said 25 to 30 had been killed. But later he told state-run television that the airstrike had killed "eight militants, along with their local supporters."

He said that no ground troops had been involved and that "no high-value targets were believed to be there," a reference to top Qaeda leaders like Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri.

Eight bodies were retrieved from the rubble, five of them Afghans and three from the local Kikari Mehsud tribe. Ten wounded people were taken to private hospitals in North Waziristan, officials said.

Addressing a military conference in Rawalpindi, General Musharraf reiterated his resolve to fight terrorism and militancy in his country. "Any hide-out or sanctuary being used by terrorists or miscreants shall be knocked out, wherever it is found," the state-run news agency quoted him as saying.

In Afghanistan, General Eikenberry, who is leaving his post this month as the senior American commander in the country, said American and NATO troops as well as Afghan Army units had inflicted heavy casualties on the Taliban, which he said remained too weak to undertake anything other than hit-and-run attacks or suicide bombings.

The American military intelligence officer disclosed for the first time statistics on the rise in insurgent attacks last year. There were 139 suicide attacks, up from 27 in 2005, and use of roadside bombs more than doubled, to 1,677 last year from from 783 in 2005. The number of what the military calls "direct attacks," meaning attacks by insurgents using small arms, grenades and other weapons, increased to 4,542 last year from 1,558 in 2005.

But even with 21,000 American troops and an additional 20,000 soldiers from other NATO countries, military officials are pushing for more forces before spring, when the Taliban is widely expected to intensify its attacks.

General Eikenberry is seeking to extend the deployment of a 1,200-soldier American battalion, which is halfway through a four-month deployment. The unit, part of the 10th Mountain Division, based in Fort Drum, N.Y., is scheduled to go to Iraq in eight months, but General Eikenberry has argued that he needs the unit to remain in Afghanistan.

Asked about increasing American troop levels in Afghanistan, Mr. Gates said that if military commanders sought more, "I would be strongly inclined to recommend that to the president."

He also urged other NATO counties to fulfill their pledges to send more troops and equipment to Afghanistan. NATO governments still have not sent the additional 1,200 troops that Gen. David Richards, the British commander of NATO forces here, has requested to serve as a reserve force he can send wherever violence flares around Afghanistan, according Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman.

Gates Visits Kabul, Cites Rise In Cross-Border Attacks (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

KABUL, Jan. 16 -- Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, on his first visit to Afghanistan, said Tuesday that there had been a "significant increase" in cross-border attacks from Pakistan, adding his voice to a chorus of U.S. and international officials who have begun taking Pakistan to task for harboring Islamic insurgents.

Gates praised Pakistan as a "strong American ally in the war on terror," but he also said there was a "problem" in Pakistan's border areas and that "al-Qaeda networks are operating on the Pakistan side." He said that the United States needed to "work with Pakistan" to reduce the violence and attacks emanating from within its borders.

Speaking at a news conference here with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Gates was the latest of several U.S. and U.N. officials to publicly raise the border issue after several years of international silence because of Pakistan's cooperation in the hunt for al-Qaeda fugitives.

U.S. military officials cited year-end statistics showing a sharp increase in insurgent attacks here, especially by the revived Taliban militia, and predicted a strong new surge of violence in the spring.

Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the senior U.S. commander in Afghanistan, told journalists traveling with Gates that the number of suicide attacks had increased from 27 in 2005 to 139 in 2006, remotely detonated bombings more than doubled from 783 to 1,677, and armed attacks nearly tripled from 1,558 to 4,542.

The violence led to more than 4,000 deaths in Afghanistan last year. It was by far the bloodiest year in the country since 2001, when a U.S.-led invasion drove the Taliban from power.

Gates, who was sworn in last month as defense secretary, said he would be "strongly inclined" to recommend a troop increase if commanders believe it is needed, the Associated Press reported. Eikenberry said he wanted to extend the combat tours of 1,200 soldiers in Afghanistan to help stem the rising violence, the news service reported. There are currently 24,000 American troops here, 11,000 of them operating under command of the NATO alliance and the rest under U.S. command.

The senior U.S. military spokesman in Kabul, Col. Thomas Collins, said that enemy forces were taking advantage of a peace pact reached in September between Pakistan's government and tribal leaders near the Afghan border. The government had promised the agreement would curb extremist activity and cross-border movements into Pakistan.

Other U.S. military officials said Pakistani forces had been turning a blind eye to insurgent border crossings despite official policies against such activities. In the past, U.S. officials have been reluctant to criticize Pakistan, whose military leaders are under pressure from domestic Islamic and tribal groups that sympathize with the Taliban.

In the past few days, several incidents have appeared to bolster the new international concern about Pakistan's role in violence.

Last Wednesday, officials said, two groups of insurgents were tracked crossing from Pakistan into Afghanistan, where they were attacked by U.S. and Afghan forces. At least 30 insurgents were killed. Taliban officials reportedly called on villagers in the Pakistani tribal areas to hold special funerals for them as Islamic martyrs.

On Tuesday, Afghan police said they caught a suicide bomber attempting to blow up a foreign military compound in Kabul. They said he was from North Waziristan, the Pakistani border region where officials made the truce with local officials in September.

Pakistani officials deny they are abetting Islamic terrorists or cross-border attacks. On Tuesday, the Pakistani army spokesman reported that military forces had attacked an al-Qaeda training camp in North Waziristan, killing 20 to 30 suspected insurgent fighters.

Gates's visit was the third by a senior U.S. official in a week, a flurry of attention that has perplexed many Afghans. Richard A. Boucher, the assistant secretary of state for the region, visited Kabul en route to Islamabad, Pakistan, earlier this week. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), a likely presidential candidate in 2008, also visited both capitals.

Strikes On U.S., Afghan Forces Up Fourfold (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Cross-border attacks against U.S. and Afghan forces have increased fourfold since Pakistan signed a pact in September giving tribal groups greater control of some border areas, U.S. military officials said yesterday.

Pakistani officials hailed the agreement that was drawn up as a way to entice local tribe and clan leaders to monitor the porous border in North Waziristan, where the central government has historically had little sway. A similar deal was reached earlier for South Waziristan.

But U.S. and Afghan officials say the results to date have been very disappointing, predicting 2007 and 2008 would be the most violent years in battling the insurgency since the U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban in early 2002.

"We do have a problem," said Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, commander of U.S. forces in Afghanistan.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, in Kabul for two days of briefings on the security situation in Afghanistan, said after a meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai that there was "no question there has been a significant increase in cross-border attacks and it is a problem."

But he added that Pakistan had proven itself a strong ally in the global war on terrorism.

The U.S. commander in Afghanistan said yesterday he wants to extend the combat tours of 1,200 soldiers amid rising violence, and Mr. Gates said he was "strongly inclined" to recommend a troop increase to President Bush if commanders think it is needed.

The defense secretary also said Pakistan must act to stem an increasing flow of Taliban fighters into Afghanistan.

Pakistan's ambassador in Washington, Mahmud Ali Durrani, told The Washington Times on Monday that Islamabad was planning a number of steps to improve border security, including the addition of new border posts and the closing of four Afghan refugee camps located near the border.

Nevertheless, U.S. military officials here were scathing about the results of the Waziristan accords, struck at a time when Taliban forces already were increasing the number and sophistication of their attacks on U.S., NATO and Afghan forces.

Just last week, 150 Islamist fighters in six trucks drove to the Pakistan border and slipped unimpeded into Afghanistan's Khost province for a planned attack on a U.S.-manned forward operating base. The incursion was detected by coalition forces and most of the fighters were killed, but the ease with which they crossed the border upset U.S. officials.

The Taliban's open use of Pakistan as a sanctuary and recruiting base "is critically challenging the ability of the government of Afghanistan to stand itself up," a U.S. military briefer, speaking on background, said yesterday, summarizing the latest intelligence on the insurgent threat. Officials said at least three Taliban- and al Qaeda-affiliated groups were involved in attacks.

Statistics show a startling increase in the number of confrontations with Islamist anti-government forces, which U.S. and NATO officials attribute in part to their own stepped-up operations to find and hit terrorist sanctuaries.

Suicide bombings in Afghanistan jumped from 27 in 2005 to 139 last year, while direct and indirect fire incidents nearly tripled to 6,053. Anti-government forces planted 1,677 improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, last year, compared to just 783 in 2005.

More worrisome, the attacks have not tapered off in the winter months of 2006 as they had in the past.

"The Taliban kind of got their legs under them last year," another U.S. general, also briefing on background, said yesterday.

Both Gen. Eikenberry and Mr. Karzai said Afghan and coalition forces are prepared for another bloody year.

With nearly 23,000 U.S. troops in the country, the American military presence is at an all-time high and Gen. Eikenberry said he is lobbying to keep 1,200 U.S. troops now in the country from being transferred to Iraq.

The general said he thought it was unlikely that the number of U.S. troops in Afghanistan could be brought down before 2009 at the earliest.

Commanders at the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) painted a more optimistic picture, saying a NATO offensive in the summer of 2006 had dealt Taliban forces a major tactical defeat around the southern city of Kandahar. ISAF officials said they had received excellent cooperation from the Pakistan government in the fight.

Pakistani officials in Islamabad said Pakistan's army destroyed suspected al Qaeda hide-outs in an air strike near the Afghan border in South Waziristan yesterday, killing 10 persons, the Associated Press reported.

Mr. Gates yesterday traveled to Afghanistan's eastern mountains to visit Forward Operating Base Tillman, which is named for former Arizona Cardinals football star Pat Tillman, killed by "friendly fire" in a U.S. Special Forces operation in Afghanistan in 2004.

With the Pakistan border clearly visible from the camp, Cpl. Travis Phillips, a mortar gunner from Brazoria, Texas, told Mr. Gates that insurgents had fired "rockets galore" at the base recently, from both Pakistani and Afghan territory.

While U.S. troops can return fire at Pakistani targets in extraordinary situations with top-level clearance, Cpl. Phillips said he had never done so during his time at the base. "You don't want to start an international incident," he said.

In Afghanistan, Commanders Ask For Money In Lieu Of Troops (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

DOJ_NMG_0117480

KABUL, Afghanistan -- As the Bush administration presses for a surge of U.S. troops in Iraq, military officials in Afghanistan are proposing a surge of their own. Instead of troops, U.S. commanders here, hoping to counter a sharp rise in attacks by Taliban forces, are seeking as much as $6 billion to build roads and speed development of the Afghan army and police forces.

The request comes as the U.S. has quietly increased the size of its force here to about 24,000 soldiers, the highest level yet. Dim prospects for getting substantially more troops are forcing commanders here to take an approach dramatically different from that in Iraq, where the U.S. plans to surge to a force of about 150,000 soldiers focused largely on Baghdad.

"We are talking about a major infusion of money to get things going where they need to go," a military official said in Kabul. The request is for twice the amount set aside for Afghan aid in 2005. It must be approved by the Bush administration, which could pare it down under pressure to reduce spending, following President Bush's decision to send about 21,500 new soldiers into Baghdad, which is estimated to cost about $5.6 billion.

As a rule, Democrats in Congress have been more sympathetic to requests for aid to Afghanistan than to Iraq, which has access to oil funds. Afghanistan's role in the drug trade could hurt its cause in the Capitol, however, and such a large increase could be harder to sell because of the other demands posed by the Bush administration for the military and foreign aid.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates made his first visit to Afghanistan yesterday to talk with U.S. military and officials of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization about their plan to reverse a steady increase in violence. The number of roadside bombs more than doubled to 1,677 in 2006 from 783 a year earlier, according to a military intelligence official. Suicide bombings have grown in sophistication and increased fivefold during the same period to about 139, the official said.

U.S. military officials say violence along Afghanistan's border with Pakistan has increased threefold to about 75 attacks a month since a September agreement in which Pakistani troops pulled out of the Waziristan region in exchange for a pledge from tribal leaders not to harbor Taliban fighters. "We are seeing evidence that the enemy is taking advantage of the agreement to launch attacks into Afghanistan," said Col. Tom Collins, a U.S. spokesman in Kabul.

Amid the surging violence, the U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, said the level of U.S. troops isn't likely to decline. "In fact, these numbers could go up with our growing commitment to the Afghan National Army and police," he said. But U.S. forces are stretched thin by the Iraq surge. NATO troops, which currently number about 20,000 in Afghanistan, are also in short supply.

At the center of Gen. Eikenberry's plan to reduce the violence is the massive road-building campaign, which could cost as much as $2.4 billion. Backers say the work would provide jobs to young men who might otherwise be recruited by the Taliban, and it would connect isolated towns to the central government, making it harder for them to fall under the enemy's sway. When Taliban fighters try to attack road crews, they can be picked off relatively easily by U.S. and Afghan forces, said one commander, who added that road building has become the centerpiece of his operations. It has become a mantra for Gen. Eikenberry that "where the roads end in Afghanistan, the Taliban begin."

To deal with the growing incursions, a battalion of about 800 soldiers from the 10th Mountain Division arrived in Afghanistan late last year for a four-month tour. Recently, Gen. Eikenberry asked that the battalion, which had been scheduled to deploy to Iraq this year, stay in Afghanistan. It is unclear whether his request will be granted. Military officials say they are also short about 2,000 NATO troops, which were pledged by alliance members but not delivered.

Pakistan In Strike Against Taliban (FT)

By Farhan Bokhari And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, January 17, 2007

Pakistan said on Tuesday it had attacked Taliban and al-Qaeda positions in an airstrike that coincided with a visit to Afghanistan by Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary.

The attack, in the south Waziristan region, near the Afghan border, comes amid mounting western concerns that Nato's struggle against the Taliban cannot be won without greater co-operation from Islamabad.

Last week John Negroponte, the US's director of national intelligence and nominee for deputy secretary of state, said Pakistan remained al-Qaeda's centre for global operations.

Nato officials add that the Taliban retains a command centre in the Quetta area and that Pakistan has become a safe haven for the insurgents, so crippling the alliance's long-term strategy.

Nato is seeking to address such problems in advance of the resumption of Afghanistan's fighting season when the winter snows melt in a few weeks' time.

This month Shaukat Aziz, Pakistan's prime minister, is due to visit Nato's headquarters, where he is likely to face pressure from Nato nations for increased co-operation. Afghanistan will also be at the centre of meetings of Nato foreign ministers and defence ministers over the next few weeks.

Nato expects a Taliban spring offensive and is seeking to counter it but has experienced severe problems in increasing its 31,000 troops in the country. The US has a further 13,000 troops there focused on counter-terrorism rather than providing security for Afghanistan.

Some diplomats argue that Pakistan is the biggest problem in the Afghanistan conflict, particularly because of the limited remit of Pervez Musharraf, Pakistan's president, in the tribal areas in his country's border region.

Pakistan rejects such claims but has stepped up its activities along the border.

Last week the Pakistani army participated with Nato in a large-scale operation against the Taliban, striking what it said were support units for the insurgents.

In Tuesday's pre-dawn raid, Pakistani military helicopters fired missiles and ammunition at three compounds Pakistan says were being used by Islamist militants.

"The attack was carried out based on information that 25 to 30 miscreants, including foreign elements, were present there," said Major General Shaukat Sultan, head of the military's information wing.

He added that up to eight bodies had been retrieved and 10 others had been wounded. But local tribesmen said the men who had been killed were Afghan woodcutters.

The attack came the morning after Mr Gates arrived in Afghanistan, prompting speculation that it was intended to signal Pakistan's commitment in the battle against the Taliban and al-Qaeda. But on Tuesday US officials said Taliban fighters had exploited a peace deal with the Pakistan government last year in north Waziristan to increase attacks in Afghanistan.

Lieutenant General Karl Eikenberry, Washington's top commander in Afghanistan, said the number of cross-border attacks in north Waziristan last month was triple the level of the same period a year ago.

More than 4,000 people died in the violence in Afghanistan last year, the highest level since the fall of the Taliban in 2001.

"Pakistan is seen as part of a problem but the difficulty for the Americans is that it is also seen as part of the solution" said retired General Talat Masood, a Pakistani commentator on defence and security affairs, referring to Pakistan's role in killing or arresting a large number of militant suspects.

Pakistan Airstrike Targets Tribes (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, January 17, 2007

For the second time in a week, the Pakistan Army has rained missiles on suspected militant targets, seeming to confirm in deeds what it has denied in words: That a controversial peace deal with Islamic militants has turned Pakistan's tribal belt into a sanctuary for attacks against Afghanistan.

Tuesday's attack, coming after an attack last week on militant supply trucks, underscores a troubling division of rhetoric and clouded policies on both the Pakistani and American sides that are hampering the war on terror, analysts here said. A peace deal signed with Taliban-linked militants in September of last year, the government said, was supposed to bring peace. Now Pakistani officials appear to be contradicting themselves by targeting the very same militants they were supposed to have appeased.

Similar mixed messages came out of Washington last week. In a blunt written statement to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence last Thursday, US Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte characterized Pakistan as a base of operations for Al Qaeda and Taliban attacks against Afghanistan. One day later, Richard Boucher, the US assistant secretary of state for south and central Asian affairs, applauded Pakistan's efforts in the war on terror during a visit to Islamabad on Friday. Analysts here say such mixed messages only frustrate the collective efforts of the US and Afghan governments to target Islamist militants.

"Washington needs to get its act together," says Samina Ahmed, the South Asia Project Director for the International Crisis Group. "The government in Pakistan's actions will confuse the message they're trying to send."

Pakistani military intelligence officials said Tuesday morning's airstrike killed up to 20 militants in the village of Zamzola in the restive province of South Waziristan. The attack came hours after US Defense Secretary Robert Gates landed in Afghanistan for talks with President Hamid Karzai.

The timing prompted some observers to speculate whether the attacks were meant as a demonstration of Pakistan's continued cooperation in the face of a growing chorus of criticism from US and NATO officials. Pakistani government offiicials, for their part, rejected suggestions that the airstrikes were anything other than conventional military strategy.

"This is not related to anything. There is absolutely no way that we would go and kill our own people to please anyone," says Tasneem Aslam, spokeswoman for the Pakistani Foreign Ministry. "There must have been terrorists present," she says.

In another blow to the Taliban Tuesday, Afghan security forces arrested a man who is believed to be Mohammed Hanif, the spokesman for Taliban leader Mullah Mohammad Omar, as he crossed the border from Afghanistan into Pakistan.

The heightened international criticism underscores the Catch-22 in which Pakistan finds itself. "On the one hand, the government is saying that peace is working," says Rahimullah Yusufzai, a prominent journalist in Peshawar. "But it is also admitting that there are militants in the area in hideouts."

The contradictions in officials' statements damage the credibility of Pakistan's military. Analysts say that the differing comments undermine military morale and, even worse, scuttle the already little public support among ordinary Pakistanis for the largely US-led war on terror.

Instead of killing militants, analysts say, the US, Pakistani, and Afghan governments need to set a strong example of justice.

"What you need are arrests made, trials, and transparency. The kinds of thing that send signals to the extremists," says Ms. Ahmed.

Defense Reloads (WSJ)

Rising Pentagon Spending Quells Talk of Profit Plateau

Defense contractors have enjoyed surging profits in recent years as the government spent heavily to fight wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and combat terrorism in other parts of the world. Recently, some investors have worried that ballooning federal deficits could bring the flush times to an end.

But with the makers of warplanes, tanks and battlefield technology expected to report strong fourth-quarter results beginning next week, the latest Pentagon plans suggest that the long-expected spending plateau is still another year away.

The January financial-reporting season for defense companies traditionally is tricky: It comes just days before the Pentagon unveils its budget for the next fiscal year, a document that frames investor expectations.

Major defense companies are expected to meet or exceed their quarterly targets, given that federal funds spent to buy and develop weapons in the October-to-December quarter rose 19% from the year-earlier period. That surge was in part a result of spending approved for the Iraq war in the previous fiscal year, analysts said.

Record Iraq war funding is likely to boost previously issued conservative profit outlooks for 2007 as well. Despite opposition to the Bush administration's Iraq policy and saber rattling about closer budget scrutiny, Congress's new Democratic leadership doesn't pose an immediate risk for the industry, analysts agree. Democrats are expected to broadly support Pentagon spending, though legislators may make modest trims and modifications to specific weapons programs.

To be sure, even as overall Pentagon spending rises, some of the biggest weapons programs face budget pressure because of cost growth. Potential trims to Boeing Co.'s Future Combat Systems modernization program for the Army or Lockheed Martin Corp.'s Joint Strike Fighter jet are unlikely to have immediate material impact on profits but could influence investors' longer-term outlook.

Even before President Bush announced he is sending extra troops to Iraq, the Pentagon in recent weeks telegraphed an imminent tsunami of spending requests. The fiscal 2008 budget will be followed by two separate emergency war-fund requests, for the current and coming fiscal years. These latest so-called supplemental budgets have wide scope to include weapons development and procurement.

"The outlook for the defense industry in 2007, and probably 2008, is quite good," says Steven Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, an independent think tank in Washington. Between the annual Pentagon budget and supplemental war requests, weapons purchases will be "about $135 billion in 2007, the highest level since the late '80s," he says, even when adjusted for inflation.

That leaves breathing room for an industry that approached 2007 cautiously. Lockheed, the biggest contractor by sales, had a stellar 2006, and raised its full-year revenue and profit outlook when it reported third-quarter earnings in October. Yet at the time, the Bethesda, Md., aerospace giant outlined modest performance expectations for this year: up to 7.7% sales growth; up to 8.8% in operating-profit growth and a per-share earnings range from flat to 6.4% growth.

That was before the supplemental budget, which includes funds for two of Lockheed's Joint Strike Fighter and for 17 C-130 cargo planes, part of an Air Force request that will extend the production line of the venerable propeller-driven transport. Analysts expect Lockheed to beat consensus estimates for the fourth quarter and, along with other defense companies, set more ambitious 2007 financial targets.

Counting weapons research and development, the Pentagon's total investment account is expected to rise 22% to $213 billion, compared with $175 billion in fiscal 2006, according to George Shapiro, a defense analyst at Citigroup Inc.'s Citigroup Global Markets Inc. He foresees a solid 8% boost in weapons spending in the fiscal 2008 annual Pentagon budget, compared with the current year, not including supplemental war funding.

Howard Rubel, a Jeffries & Co. analyst, estimates that average operating margins at the 20 aerospace and defense companies he covers rose to 9.5% in 2006, compared with 8.7% in 2005, and he believes there is room to grow. Per-share earnings grew 16% last year, he predicts, compared with estimates of about 12% for the full Standard & Poor's 500-stock index.

"The aerospace and defense group outperformed the market last year and is likely to deliver double-digit EPS growth again and beat the market again," Mr. Rubel says. Besides the favorable budget environment, he cites: operating improvements, astute cash management through buybacks and debt reduction, and the rebound in commercial aviation. He favors companies with exposure to the Army, where weapons and equipment spending will grow fastest.

Among the five biggest defense contractors, General Dynamics Corp. is benefiting from the surge in both Army and corporate-jet business. The Falls Church, Va., company makes Abrams tanks and Stryker troop carriers, two mainstays of the ground forces in Iraq, and it is positioning itself to be a player in new, smaller Army vehicles. Its Gulfstream unit has fat order backlogs as the demand for high-end business jets spreads globally.

Boeing's airliner business is booming, but its biggest Army program is likely to be trimmed in the coming budget. Future Combat Systems, or FCS, aims to modernize U.S. ground forces with a family of new manned and unmanned vehicles, high-tech sensors and an ambitious wireless data network linking all the pieces. The Boeing-led program, whose cost has grown to an estimated $165 billion, is being reshaped again, though not dramatically: The Army is pulling back on plans for some unmanned aircraft, reviewing ground robotic vehicles and slowing the initial production rate.

People briefed on the Army's budget say FCS is slated to lose about $3 billion between fiscal 2008 and 2012, the planning period covered in the next Pentagon budget. Lockheed's Joint Strike Fighter is getting support for fiscal 2008, Pentagon officials say, but the Air Force and Navy plan to decrease spending on the stealth fighter over the five ensuing years to free up money for other needs.

Psychologist: Navy Faces Crisis (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, January 16, 2007

An experienced Navy psychologist warns that the U.S. military does not have enough mental health professionals to meet the growing number of emotionally damaged war veterans.

Moreover, Navy Cmdr. Mark Russell says, many of the mental health professionals on staff lack formal training in core therapies for post-traumatic stress syndrome. Russell predicts a "perfect storm" of dire health care consequences.

From his distant vantage point treating Marines at a base in Iwakuni, Japan, Russell, 46, has been speaking out for three years that the U.S. military faces a mental health crisis in the treatment of its combat veterans.

He has fired off memos to higher command and has gone public with his views, an unusual step for many in the military. Russell discussed his concerns in phone and Internet interviews.

"We cannot provide the standard of care to treat PTSD via psychotherapy when we can barely keep up with new referrals and have to manage crises while filling in for the staffing gaps and vacancies due to deployment, attrition or no billeting," Russell says. "This is why I have been so outspoken."

Addressing the issue

Military mental health officials downplay Russell's grim assessment, noting that training is increasing, aggressive mental health programs are being created, and civilian mental health professionals are being hired to provide additional resources.

"Mark really has a tremendous amount of compassion and a real desire to make sure that everyone gets what they need," says Navy Capt. Warren Klam, a psychiatrist and senior medical officer for mental health at the Naval Medical Center in San Diego and a member of the Mental Health Task Force. "I just think if you look at the bigger picture, it's not nearly as much of a concern as it might sound. I think DOD (Department of Defense) is very sensitive to this issue and is trying to work very hard."

The Navy serves all the medical and mental health needs of the Marine Corps.

Russell says his immediate commanders at the Marine Corps base have been supportive and encouraged him to speak out. Most recently, they arranged for him to testify at a San Diego hearing held by the Pentagon's Task Force on Mental Health.

DOJ_NMG_0117484

Congress authorized the task force to examine mental health care in the military. The title of Russell's presentation was "Perfect Storm."

During that testimony, Russell presented data showing:

•Mental health trauma is on the rise. Army studies show that more than a third of combat-deployed troops seek mental health care when they return home.

•Training for mental health professionals is inadequate. A survey by Russell of 133 military mental health providers done from 2003-05 shows that 90% of the psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers reported no formal training or supervision in four PTSD therapies recommended by the Pentagon and Department of Veterans Affairs.

•Staffing is down. Russell says vacancies remain for mental health providers in the Navy. In addition, psychiatrists and psychologists deployed overseas deplete resources at home, and burnout makes it hard to keep skilled therapists on staff, he says. His concerns were supported by a 2005 Army study showing one of three mental health providers deployed in the war zone report high burnout or low motivation or morale.

Klam says the Army and Navy have emphasized providing mental health counseling in war zones at an unprecedented level.

As a result, he says, the military has a record of returning more than 98% of troops with emotional issues back to their units.

In addition, he says, the Pentagon has aggressively worked to screen troops as they leave the battlefield and after they arrive home to learn about lingering physical or mental problems. Klam says training in the core therapy areas has been increasing.

He concedes, however, that staffing continues to be an issue. His complement of a dozen psychology positions at the medical center is down by half. He has brought in four civilian psychologists to fill in.

Staff shortages

Navy Cmdr. Richard Bergthold, a psychologist, says he has no way to verify Russell's assertions about the broad lack of formal training in key therapies.

Bergthold agreed that recruitment and retention of psychologists and psychiatrists in the Navy is a continuing problem. He says the Navy has 72% of the psychologists and 62% of the psychiatrists it needs, although trainees will raise staffing levels to 85% for psychologists and 91% for psychiatrists.

After Russell raised his concerns, Bergthold says he canvassed several senior mental health officials within the Navy.

"They do not believe we are currently in a crisis," Bergthold says. "However, if the Navy were to stand still and do nothing — which it's not — we would find ourselves quickly overwhelmed. … If we see this conflict go on with an increased number of folks returning with stress disorders, it's a question of mathematics."

Army staffing levels for uniformed psychiatrists and psychologist are at 80%-85%, but the Army has contracted with large numbers of civilian mental health officials to help in assisting soldiers.

DOJ:

Federal Prosecutors' Resignations Raise Red Flag (LAT)

By Richard Marosi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

SAN DIEGO -- The top federal prosecutors in San Diego and San Francisco announced their resignations Tuesday as critics charged the Bush administration with forcing out a growing number of U.S. attorneys without cause.

The U.S. attorneys in San Diego and San Francisco, Carol Lam and Kevin V. Ryan, respectively, did not comment on whether they had been forced to resign. Lam said she would step down Feb. 15; Ryan did not name a date.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., in a Senate speech Tuesday, said at least five other U.S. attorneys have been forced to resign without explanation. She accused the Bush administration of trying to circumvent Senate confirmation of their replacements.

Such appointments were subject to Senate review until last year when the Patriot Act was reauthorized with a provision that allowed the U.S. attorney general to appoint longer-term, interim replacements without Senate approval.

The departures, Feinstein said, come at a sensitive time when federal prosecutors are pursuing political corruption cases.

"The U.S. attorney's job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions, or, worse, any appearance of undue influence," Feinstein said.

A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, said senators would be consulted before the nomination of replacements, as has been the routine since the law was changed.

"It is inconceivable for a member of Congress to believe that use of an appointment authority to fill a vacancy is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process," Roehrkasse said.

Feinstein said she planned to bring up the issue at a Senate Judiciary committee hearing Thursday at which U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was scheduled to appear.

Lam, a former judge, oversaw the corruption prosecutions of former U.S. Rep.Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican, and two San Diego City Council members. She was criticized by some U.S. Border Patrol agents who accused her office of not focusing enough attention on immigration and alien-smuggling cases.

Ryan's notable prosecutions included the BALCO steroids case. His office also launched investigations of Silicon Valley giants Hewlett-Packard Co. and Apple Inc.

Gonzales Discusses Attorney Vacancies (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, January 17, 2007

Senate Democrats want to take away Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' power to replace U.S. attorneys who fall out of favor and return that authority to federal district judges.

Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California and Mark Pryor of Arkansas complained Tuesday that the White House is using an obscure provision in the newly reauthorized USA Patriot Act to reward Republican political allies with jobs as federal prosecutors.

"The Bush administration is pushing out U.S. attorneys from across the country under the cloak of secrecy and then appointing indefinite replacements," Feinstein said.

"It appears that the administration has chosen to use this provision, which was intended to help protect our nation, to circumvent the transparent constitutional Senate confirmation process to reward political allies," Pryor said in the joint Democratic statement.

Not true, Gonzales told The Associated Press.

"We are fully committed to ensuring that with respect to every position we have a Senate-confirmed, presidentially appointed U.S. attorney," Gonzales told editors and reporters during an interview Tuesday.

"We in no way politicize these decisions," he added.

U.S. District Court judges, Gonzales said, tend to appoint friends and others not properly qualified to be prosecutors.

Better that judges do the hiring than the White House, say Democrats, who have introduced legislation to return the appointment process to the courts.

The subject is headed for a public airing Thursday when Gonzales appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee for its first oversight hearing of his department since the Democrats took control of Congress.

At issue is whether the administration is using an obscure provision in the terrorism-fighting USA Patriot Act to oust federal prosecutors and replace them for the duration of the Bush administration with White House allies.

The intent of the law was to ensure continuity of law enforcement when federal prosecutors are lost in terrorist attacks or other crises. Under it, the attorney general would be permitted to appoint replacements, indefinitely, without Senate confirmation.

In the year since the reauthorization took effect, 11 federal prosecutors have resigned or announced their resignations - some at the urging of the Bush administration, Gonzales said. He described a range of reasons for ousting sitting U.S. attorneys, from their job performance to their standing in their communities, and noted that federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president.

Gonzales repeatedly cited the Patriot Act when discussing the replacements, but twice refused to say when asked whether any of the personnel changes at issue pertained to national security.

But he stressed that anyone named to replace the departing prosecutors have their jobs only temporarily, pending Senate confirmation. His comments encouraged some Democrats.

"That's good news, if that's the case," Pryor said in a telephone interview later Tuesday. But he stood by his assertion that in his state, the Justice Department improperly ousted U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins (nyse: CMI - news - people) and replaced him with Tim Griffin, a protege of Bush adviser Karl Rove.

Feinstein, meanwhile, complained on the Senate floor Tuesday that U.S. Attorneys Carol Lam of San Diego and Kevin Ryan of San Francisco were ousted from their positions for political reasons. Lam prosecuted and obtained the conviction of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif.

Justice Dept. Names New Prosecutors, Forcing Some Out (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — The Justice Department is removing several United States attorneys from their jobs, among them Carol C. Lam, the top federal prosecutor in San Diego, who led the corruption prosecution of former Representative Randy Cunningham.

Justice Department officials said Tuesday that Ms. Lam's dismissal had nothing to do with the prosecution of Mr. Cunningham, Republican of California, but was based on her overall record in prosecuting firearms violations and crimes along the California border with Mexico.

But Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said that Ms. Lam and Kevin V. Ryan, the United States attorney from San Francisco, among others, were being pushed out "without cause." Mr. Ryan's office has been investigating the backdating of stock options granted to corporate executives.

Ms. Feinstein said on the Senate floor on Tuesday that Ms. Lam, appointed in 2002, was "a straight shooter and a good prosecutor."

"To my knowledge," Ms. Feinstein said, "there are no allegations of misconduct having to do with Carol Lam. She is a distinguished former judge. Rather, the only explanation I have seen are concerns that were expressed about prioritizing corruption cases over smuggling and gun cases."

Representative Darrell Issa, a Republican from San Diego County who has criticized Ms. Lam's record on illegal immigration, called the Cunningham prosecution "a credit to her leadership and her office" in a statement on Tuesday, but repeated his call for border enforcement and said her replacement "will bring new ideas and new strategies that will benefit our area."

It is not clear how many United States attorneys are being forced out. Ms. Feinstein said the number was 5 to 10; Justice Department officials said the number was lower but would not provide a specific number.

"We in no way politicize these decisions," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales told The Associated Press on Tuesday. Other Justice Department officials said some prosecutors were being dismissed and others were leaving voluntarily.

The Justice Department sent a letter defending its actions on Tuesday to Ms. Feinstein and Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, chairman of the Judiciary Committee. "That on occasion in an organization as large as the Justice Department some United States attorneys are removed or are asked or encouraged to resign, should come as no surprise," the letter said. It added that no action had been taken against United States attorneys "to retaliate against them or interfere with or inappropriately influence a particular investigation, criminal prosecution or civil case."

Ms. Feinstein said in her statement that she knew of seven United States attorneys who had been dismissed without cause.

Those the Justice Department officials said had been asked to leave were Ms. Lam, Mr. Ryan, Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada, David C. Iglesias of New Mexico and H. E. Cummins III of Arkansas. Others who are said to be stepping down are Paul K. Charlton of Arizona and John McKay of Washington State. All were appointed by President Bush.

Ms. Feinstein noted that the two Arkansas senators, Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln, both Democrats, had raised concerns about Mr. Cummins's replacement, J. Timothy Griffin, who was research director for the Republican National Committee. Justice Department officials said Mr. Griffin had a strong background as a military and civilian prosecutor.

The officials said that most of those being removed were being replaced based on a review of their performance in carrying out Mr. Gonzales's violent crime priorities.

These officials sought to minimize the significance of the action. They said there were frequently changes in the ranks of United States attorneys after an election and that there were often 10 to 15 vacancies among the 93 posts around the country. But as presidential appointees, United States attorneys are rarely removed without a specific reason.

Ms. Feinstein said the departmentmight be removing the prosecutors to take advantage of a little-noticed provision in the 2006 reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act that expanded its authority to make indefinite interim appointments.

Previously, a federal judge would appoint an interim United States attorney to serve until the Senate confirmed the president's nominee. Now the attorney general can nominate someone to serve without confirmation for the remainder of Mr.

Bush's term. Ms. Feinstein, Mr. Pryor and Mr. Leahy have introduced legislation to restore the role of naming interim prosecutors to the judiciary.

Justice Department officials said that there was no intention to use the law to skirt the confirmation process now that the Senate is in Democratic hands, and that the administration would submit nominees for Senate confirmation.

Lam's Ouster Concerns Lawmakers (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 16, 2007

Senators to seek answers about U.S. attorneys' exits

A national political storm is brewing over the departures of several top prosecutors, including San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam.

Lam has not commented since reports surfaced last week that she was asked to resign as the chief federal law enforcement officer in San Diego.

Sources told The San Diego Union-Tribune that superiors in the Justice Department are unhappy with decreased prosecutions for gun and immigration violations.

Lam, a political independent, was appointed by President Bush in 2002.

In recent months, at least four other U.S. attorneys have announced their departures, two of them confirming that they've been asked to resign.

With reports yesterday that the Department of Justice has demanded the resignation of another top prosecutor, in Las Vegas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled this week to answer questions from skeptical senators.

Democratic lawmakers have criticized the recent departures from the ranks of top federal prosecutors as worrisome.

"We have no idea why this is happening," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, said in a statement last week. "The attorney general could have a legitimate reason for asking for specific resignations, or this could be motivated by political concerns or worse, derailing ongoing investigations."

A Feinstein spokesman yesterday declined to comment on the situation in San Diego.

Typically, the nation's 93 U.S. attorneys are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate, but a provision in last year's Patriot Act allows the attorney general to make interim appointments with indefinite terms.

Feinstein and other senators introduced legislation that would return the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys to federal judges.

Gonzales is scheduled to testify Thursday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which Feinstein is a member.

Both U.S. senators from Nevada said this weekend that U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden had been asked to step down, according to a report published yesterday in the Las Vegas Review-Journal.

Bogden's spokeswoman wasn't available yesterday, a federal holiday. When asked about her boss' future last week, she told the Union-Tribune "I can't comment on that right now."

Meanwhile, H.E. "Bud" Cummins, the former U.S. Attorney in Little Rock, Ark., said this weekend that he was, asked to leave his job so the Bush administration could fill it with a political appointee.

Cummins said he had planned to leave the post anyway, so was not troubled by the request.

Arkansas' senators, both Democrats, criticized the appointment of Tim Griffin, a former White House lawyer who also worked for the Republican National Committee, as Cummins' successor.

Outgoing New Mexico U.S. Attorney David Iglesias also said he was asked to resign, but without explanation.

Other U.S. Attorneys who recently announced they are leaving include John McKay in Seattle and Paul Charlton in Phoenix. Neither has said he was pushed out; McKay said he would "be returning to the private sector" while Charlton said he was leaving to join a law firm.

Lam's replacement will say a lot about why she was asked to leave, said former San Diego U.S. Attorney Peter Nuñez.

"If they drag in somebody nobody's ever heard of from D.C. or somebody's cousin or some rich guy's nephew, that will tell you more about what happened than anything else," he said.

Feinstein: Administration Forcing Resignation Of Seven U.S. Attorneys (HILL)

By Kelly Mccormack

The Hill, January 17, 2007

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) lambasted the Bush administration yesterday, saying it is forcing several U.S. attorneys to step down from their posts in order to cherry-pick new political appointments without Senate confirmation.

On the Senate floor yesterday afternoon, Feinstein scrutinized the activities of the administration, which she says has asked seven U.S. attorneys to resign, without evidence of misconduct.

"The attorney general can nominate someone who [then] goes in without any confirmation hearing by this body and serves as U.S. attorney for the remainder of the president's term in office," Feinstein said. "This is a way, simply stated, of avoiding Senate confirmation of a United States attorney."

In last year's reauthorization of the Patriot Act, a provision was changed to allow interim appointees to serve indefinitely, instead of limiting an appointed U.S. attorney's tenure to 120 days. Previously, the Department of Justice (DoJ) could appoint an interim U.S. attorney and, after a period of 120 days, a district judge could influence who was chosen for the position.

Two of the U.S. attorneys forced to resign were from California; the others were from New Mexico, Nevada, Arkansas, Texas, Washington and Arizona, Feinstein said.

She noted that Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney for Southern California involved in the probe of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), recently resigned.

Rumor has it that Lam has other cases in which members of Congress have been subpoenaed, Feinstein said.

But she admitted to knowing little of the circumstances surrounding Lam's departure. "The only explanation I've seen are concerns that were expressed about prioritizing public corruption cases over smuggling and gun cases," the senator said.

U.S. Attorney H.E. Bud Cummins, of Little Rock, Ark., recently was replaced by Timothy Griffin, a former White House lawyer who has worked for the Republican National Committee.

"The United States attorney's job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions or, worse, any appearance of undue influence," Feinstein said. "At a time when we're talking about toughening the consequences for public corruption, I believe we should change the law to ensure that our top prosecutors who are taking these cases are free from interference or the appearance of impropriety."

Last week, Feinstein, Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) introduced legislation that would restore "the statute to what it once was" and give the "authority to appoint interim U.S. attorneys back to the district court where the vacancy arises," Feinstein said on the Senate floor.

"I've been told that this really interrupts the flow of the prosecution of these cases, to have the present U.S. attorney be forced to resign," she added.

Feinstein today plans to question U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the issue at a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

However, the DoJ upheld its process, saying that Senate confirmation was a top priority.

"We are fully committed and it is in our best interest to have a U.S. attorney that is confirmed by the Senate," DoJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. "It is inconceivable for a member of Congress to believe that use of an appointment authority to fill a vacancy is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process."

U.S. Attorney Ryan Leaving Post Amid Reports Of His Being Forced Out (MERCN)

By Howard Mintz

The San Jose Mercury News, January 17, 2007

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan has notified his staff that he is leaving amid reports that he and six other federal prosecutors are being forced out by the Bush Administration.

Ryan has been the administration's point person for the Justice Department in Northern California since 2002.

Ryan sent an e-mail to his staff today notifying them that he is leaving, saying ``for some months now I have been considering the possibility of pursuing other challenges for a variety of personal and professional reasons." The e-mail did not specify the date that Ryan is leaving, just stating that ``it is a good time for me to move on."

Former prosecutors under Ryan say they've been told he has been asked to leave his post under the cloud of an internal Justice Department probe of his leadership of the 90-plus lawyer office. But most lawyers say Ryan's departure will have little impact on the big ticket cases he has been pursuing, including the Apple stock options probe and Balco.

``I don't think there's much of a hiccup in terms of already filed cases from one U.S. attorney to another," said a former federal prosecutor who asked not to be identified.

Ryan's tenure has been marked by internal chaos and controversy within his office balanced against his lead role in some of the nation's most high-profile federal prosecutions, including the Balco steroid scandal, the stock options backdating probe and, more recently, his decision to pursue the Hewlett-Packard spying scandal.

Rumors that Ryan might be planning to resign have circulated within his office for months, particularly since the Justice Department sent a team of auditors to the Bay Area last fall to interview current and former prosecutors about his management.

Whether Ryan resigned or was asked to resign, his status has been on shaky ground as a result of a constant stream of criticism from current and former prosecutors who've questioned his insular leadership style.

Current and former prosecutors have complained of low morale, a reason cited for a lag in the numbers of criminal cases filed by Ryan's office. A Mercury News review in 2004 found felony cases at one of the lowest levels in recent history. There also have been a steady stream of defections by top prosecutors in recent years.

Ryan, a former state prosecutor and San Francisco Superior Court judge, came to the position in 2002 as an outsider to the region's federal court system, getting the job as U.S. attorney only after an unsuccessful bid to be a federal judge. He pushed prosecutions of high-tech crime in Silicon Valley and stock market fraud, gaining national prominence when his office took on the Balco case.

But after about two years in the job, Ryan's stock started to plummet among his own staff of prosecutors. One top San Francisco prosecutor, John Hemann, who was part of the Enron task force, issued a blistering critique of Ryan's leadership in an e-mail to his colleagues when Hemann resigned. Another veteran prosecutor last year asked the Justice Department to interview departed prosecutors about problems in the office.

Ryan inherited the job from former U.S. Attorney Robert Mueller III, who left to become FBI director and helped improve the office after years of many of the same problems that appear to be behind Ryan's downfall. In fact, Mueller succeeded former U.S. Attorney Michael Yamaguchi, who was forced to resign in 1998 under pressure from the Justice Department and the local federal judges.

Most local lawyers say they expect an interim U.S. attorney to be named, particularly because local Republicans have had trouble quickly finding qualified candidates in the past. There are about two years left in Ryan's term, and if the White House names a full-time replacement he or she must be confirmed by the Senate.

``It's kind of a short amount of time to name another U.S. attorney," said Barry Portman, the Bay Area's federal public defender for more than 20 years.

U.S. Attorney Lam Announces Resignation (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 17, 2007

SAN DIEGO – U.S. Attorney Carol Lam announced Tuesday that she is resigning effective Feb. 15.

"It has been both a great honor and a great privilege to have served the nation and the Southern District of California as United States attorney for the past 4½ years," she said in a statement.

"The dedication shown by the men and women of the U.S. Attorney's Office can be seen every day in the important cases they prosecute, including cases relating to terrorism, immigration, narcotics, public corruption, and fraud."

The San Diego Union-Tribune reported on Friday that Lam was asked to resign because of decreasing prosecutions in gun and immigration matters.

In her statement issued midafternoon Tuesday, Lam did not address whether she was asked to resign.

Her spokeswoman said in an e-mail that "there will be no further comment today."

Kevin V. Ryan, the U.S. Attorney in San Francisco, also announced his resignation Tuesday.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, criticized the "forced resignations" of U.S. attorneys, including Lam and Ryan. U.S. attorneys in California, New Mexico, Nevada, Arkansas, Texas, Washington and Arizona have been asked to step down, Feinstein said, according to Bloomberg News.

Advertisement But U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales bristled at the suggestion by Democratic senators that the Justice Department's request for the resignations was politically motivated or intended to circumvent the Senate confirmation process.

"Nothing could be further from the truth," Gonzales told The Associated Press.

Instead of handling hundreds of routine border cases, Lam said she preferred to focus the limited resources of the U.S. Attorney's Office on more significant prosecutions.

"During the past four years, we have obtained higher sentences for illegal aliens with serious criminal histories, and the violent crime rate has declined in San Diego," she said in her statement.

"We have prosecuted serious cases involving public corruption, dismantled the leadership of large narcotics cartels and prison gangs, and protected the public (treasury) in civil litigation."

Lam prosecuted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy and tax evasion charges.

DOJ_NMG_0117490

A federal prosecutor for many years, Lam, 47, was a Superior Court judge when President Bush appointed her as the top federal prosecutor for San Diego and Imperial counties.

"I thank the President for giving me the opportunity to serve as United States attorney," Lam said.

U.S. Attorney Lam Resigns (NCT)

By William Finn Bennett, Staff Writer

North County (CA) Times, January 17, 2007

SAN DIEGO -- Ending days of speculation, San Diego-area U.S. Attorney Carol Lam announced Tuesday afternoon in a news release that she will step down from the job on Feb. 15.

News stories first surfaced last week that she had been asked to resign, but no government source was willing to go on the record with the information.

The release did not provide a reason for Lam's resignation nor did it say if she had been asked to resign. Reached by phone late Tuesday, a spokeswoman for the 47-year-old Lam said that there would be no other comment.

In a Tuesday phone interview from his Washington office, U.S. Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Vista, said Lam was asked to step down.

Issa declined to name the source of the information, but said "it was a high-ranking administration official involved in the decision process."

U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president.

Department of Justice officials in Washington, D.C., did not respond to requests for interviews Tuesday.

For years, Issa has been critical of Lam for what he said was her failure to more aggressively prosecute illegal-immigrant smugglers.

"And I have had one-on-one conversations with Ms. Lam, urging her to be more aware of the policy priority that the president has given," he said, referring to Bush's promises to secure the nation's borders.

In an October 2005 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, for example, Issa blasted Lam's office for failing to prosecute two cases of smugglers who were repeat offenders. In the letter, Issa called her failure to do so the result of "lax prosecutorial standard."

On Tuesday, Issa said that Lam, who was appointed to the post by President Bush in 2002, had done a good job in prosecuting white-collar crime and commended her for her successful investigation of the now-imprisoned former 50th District Congressman and conservative Republican Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Issa said it would be too strong to say that he was instrumental in Lam's resignation.

In her news release, Lam appeared to respond to her critics, saying that "during the past four years, we have obtained higher sentences for illegal aliens with serious criminal histories, and the violent crime rate has declined in San Diego."

The release also included laudatory statements from a number of local federal officials, including Adele Fasano, San Diego director of field operations for U.S. Customs and Border Protection. Fasano said that his department has had a "strong, collaborative" relationship with Lam's office to combat smuggling activity through the San Diego area.

"This focused effort has been particularly effective in the area of alien smuggling and has resulted in the aggressive prosecution of serious violators," Fasano said.

Issa disagreed with the praise of Lam's handling of human smuggling cases.

"It's very clear she had a weakness, that she liked big cases but shunned what she saw as more mundane cases of human smugglers, which have grown," he said.

Former San Diego-area U.S. Attorney Alan Bersin said he found the call to ask Lam to resign "highly unusual."

Bersin, who now serves as the chairman of the San Diego County Regional Airport Authority, said he found it "peculiar" that no one stood up and took responsibility for asking Lam to step down or state what the reasons were for asking her to leave.

"The failure to provide a reason leads to all sorts of speculation," said Bersin, who served as U.S. attorney from 1993 to 1998.

After leaving that job in 1998, he became superintendent of San Diego Schools and later left that job to become the state secretary of education.

"The community is entitled to a statement of responsibility and somebody should step forward to account for the reasons," for the decision, he said.

Lam, a graduate of Yale University, Stanford Law School and a former San Diego Superior Court judge, is one of several U.S. attorneys being asked to resign, according to news reports.

DOJ_NMG_0117491

In a speech on the Senate floor Tuesday, U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said that it was recently brought to her attention that several U.S. attorneys have been asked to resign, some by the end of the month and prior to the end of their terms.

She said the resignation requests were not based on any allegation of misconduct.

"In other words, they are forced resignations," Feinstein said.

She expressed concern that Gonzales plans to appoint interim replacements and "potentially avoid Senate confirmation."

A little-known provision in the Patriot Act reauthorization last year changed existing law so that if a vacancy occurs, the attorney general can appoint a replacement for an indefinite period of time.

In an interview several days ago, a spokesman for the Department of Justice said that Gonzales was not trying to avoid the Senate confirmation process and that it is always the goal of the Bush administration to have U.S. attorneys that are confirmed by the Senate.

Bersin said that Lam did not have to leave voluntarily.

The president "can fire, but the U.S. attorney can take the position that 'There is not sufficient cause and I am not going to resign -- go ahead and fire me and provide a statement of the reasons why,' " Bersin said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former CA Chief Counsel Gets 2-year Jail Term (NSDY)

By Dan Wagner And James Bernstein, Newsday Staff Writers

Long Island Newsday, January 17, 2007

Choking back tears, former Computer Associates chief counsel Steve Woghin apologized in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn Tuesday for his role in a $2.2 billion accounting scandal at the company before he was sentenced to a two-year jail term.

Woghin, who pleaded guilty in September 2004 to securities fraud conspiracy and obstruction of justice charges, faced U.S. District Court Judge I. Leo Glasser and said in an emotional voice that he was sorry for the role he had played in the scandal that toppled most of the company's top management, including chief executive officer Sanjay Kumar, who also plead guilty and is to begin serving a 12 year jail sentence next month.

The Islandia-based company, one of the country's largest manufacturers of software for large banks, insurance companies and airlines, is now known as CA Inc.

Woghin said his part in the affair was "not a legacy I would like to leave... It was not for personal gain or hubris," he added, choking back tears as about 15 of his friends and relatives looked on in the courtroom.

"I'm deeply sorry for what I have done," Woghin said.

Glasser told Woghin "I'm sorry you're here. I would be happier of I had never seen you before."

In addition to the two-year prison sentence, Woghin was also sentenced to three years supervised release and a fine to be determined at a later date.

Woghin worked at the U.S. Justice Department for 10 years before joining CA in 1992. He was charged with overseeing a team of CA lawyers who "routinely" drafted software licensing contracts with clients after a quarter had closed and with drafting at least one of the contracts himself. He stepped down from CA in May 2004.

Additionally, prosecutors said, Woghin and another top CA executive traveled to Hawaii to buy the silence of Enterprise Management Systems's president, who was not identified in court papers. Prosecutors said the CA officials orchestrated a "revenue swap" with EMS in which CA improperly booked $5 million in revenue in March 2000 and $18.5 million in June 2000.

CA's Ex-Counsel Receives Sentence Of 2 Years In Prison (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Steven Woghin, CA Inc.'s former general counsel, was sentenced to two years in prison in connection with a scheme to artificially boost the software maker's quarterly revenue through backdated sales contracts, prosecutors said.

At a hearing in federal court in Brooklyn, U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser also sentenced Mr. Woghin to three years of supervised release, said Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn.

A lawyer for Mr. Woghin didn't return a phone call seeking comment.

Mr. Woghin pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit securities fraud and obstruction of justice in 2004. Several former executives at the company formerly known as Computer Associates, including onetime Chief Executive Sanjay Kumar, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges in the matter.

Former Refco President Is Added To Fraud Case (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Refco Inc.'s former president was indicted on securities fraud and other charges in connection with an alleged scheme to hide hundreds of millions of dollars in trading losses by Refco and its customers from the investing public, prosecutors said.

The U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan said Tone Grant, 62 years old, has been charged with conspiracy, securities fraud, bank fraud, wire fraud and money laundering. Mr. Grant, of Chicago, is the latest former Refco executive to be charged in the matter. He was the company's president from 1997 to June 1998 and at times held a significant ownership interest in the firm.

Phillip Bennett, Refco's former chief executive, and Robert Trosten, the commodities broker's former chief financial officer, are already facing criminal charges in the matter.

The superseding indictment adds additional charges of bank fraud and money laundering against Messrs. Bennett and Trosten and wire fraud against Mr. Bennett.

Mr. Bennett, of Gladstone, N.J., previously has been charged with conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud, making false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission and making material misstatements to auditors. Mr. Trosten, of Sarasota, Fla., previously had been charged with conspiracy, securities fraud and wire fraud.

Prosecutors have alleged that Mr. Bennett, with the help of Messrs. Grant, Trosten and others, sought to hide from Refco's auditors and investors hundreds of millions of dollars in trading losses sustained by the commodities broker and by customers trading through its accounts.

Refco sought bankruptcy protection in 2005, shortly after the company announced it had discovered $430 million in debt owed to a private entity controlled by Mr. Bennett and his subsequent arrest on federal fraud charges.

Mr. Grant's lawyer, Norm Eisen of Zuckerman Spaeder LLP in Washington, said Mr. Grant "is innocent and will vigorously fight these charges and clear his name."

Mr. Trosten's lawyer, Robert G. Morvillo of Morvillo, Abramowitz, Grand, Iason, Anello & Bohrer PC, declined to comment. Mr. Bennett's lawyer, Gary Naftalis of Kramer Levin Naftalis & Frankel LLP, said, "Mr. Bennett has consistently affirmed that he is not guilty of any of the government's charges and he looks forward to his day in court."

Westar Pay Battle Turns (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

The effective unraveling of government efforts to prosecute former Westar Energy Inc. Chief Executive David C. Wittig has given new life to his hope of getting the company to pay him millions of dollars he claims to be owed under an employment agreement.

Earlier this month, a federal appeals court in Topeka, Kan., vacated Mr. Wittig's convictions in a 2003 indictment springing largely from personal use of corporate aircraft.

Late last week, attorneys for the former Westar chief, who has been in prison in Minnesota for a year, asked a federal court in Topeka to order their client released, arguing there is "no lawful basis for ... continued imprisonment."

What happens next in the civil and criminal cases will have direct bearing on Mr. Wittig's and the Kansas utility's finances. The company has reserved more than $73 million to cover any adverse decisions. Westar's total potential exposure for legal costs and employment issues related to Mr. Wittig and a onetime subordinate, former Westar Vice President Douglas Lake, is about $94 million.

The company had argued in an arbitration proceeding that it doesn't owe Mr. Wittig severance payments called for under his employment contract because he was let go "for cause."

In a separate civil dispute in Topeka federal court, Westar has argued it must pay only "reasonable" attorney fees and has disagreed with the men about what's reasonable.

To date, the utility has paid $8.4 million of legal expenses for Mr. Witting and co-defendant Mr. Lake, who also was convicted. Westar has declined to pay $12 million more in legal costs. A Westar spokesman declined comment.

Mr. Wittig's attorneys say he also is owed $52 million under his employment contract. Mr. Lake has said he is owed about $21 million in a similar contract dispute.

In addition to the Westar fraud case, Mr. Wittig was convicted of bank fraud in an unrelated case in Topeka federal court. Westar isn't on the hook for those defense costs since the matter doesn't concern Mr. Wittig in his role as utility chief.

Until recently, Mr. Wittig faced prison time of 18 years in the Westar "looting" case and five years in the separate bank case. But two major appeals court setbacks for the government since November have altered Mr. Wittig's prospects, legal experts say.

To prevail in the contract arbitration, the company likely would have to prove misconduct including intentional wrongdoing, said former federal prosecutor Roma Theus II, who now chairs the white-collar crime unit of the Defense Research Institute, an association of defense lawyers. That is harder to do with the most important convictions now overturned.

The arbitration case is on hold pending resolution of the criminal cases.

On Jan. 5, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals in Topeka overturned the Westar convictions reached in 2005, vacating counts of wire fraud, money laundering, conspiracy and circumvention of internal controls. The court said the most serious counts can't be retried. Prosecutors have declined to comment.

In early 2004, Mr. Wittig was convicted in the separate bank-fraud case. The sentences in that case were overturned twice. In November, the appeals court said the proper sentence was zero to six months, not five years. A hearing is set for Feb. 5.

Forbes Could Get Nearly 16 Years In Cendant Case (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, January 17, 2007

The final chapter in one of the longest-running sagas of corporate crime is scheduled to conclude today in a Connecticut courtroom.

Walter Forbes, the blue-blooded former chairman of Cendant, is due to be sentenced in Bridgeport, Conn., for his role in a $252 million accounting fraud that was exposed nearly a decade ago.

At the time, the Cendant fraud was the largest on record, and its exposure in April 1998 wiped out $14 billion of the company's market capitalization, nearly half its total, in a single day.

Since then, Cendant's scandal has been eclipsed in magnitude by accounting meltdowns at Enron and WorldCom. The CEOs who presided over those companies were convicted of spawning those frauds and given stiff jail sentences, 24 years for Jeff Skilling of Enron and 25 years for Bernie Ebbers of WorldCom.

Forbes' sentence probably will be lighter, but when he stands in front of U.S. District Judge Alan Nevas, he still faces a stretch of more than 10 years. That was the jail term given his top lieutenant, Kirk Shelton, who was convicted two years ago of participating in the same fraud.

The reason Forbes might get only half of what Skilling and Ebbers got is that his timing was better. The accounting fraud that occurred at Forbes' company (which was known as CUC International before a merger transformed it into Cendant), took place from 1995 to 1997. That was several years before a harsh new set of mandatory sentencing guidelines was adopted by Congress.

Skilling and Ebbers committed their misdeeds after the new guidelines went into effect.

Still, for Forbes, who was born into an affluent family in Rockford, Ill., attended Harvard Business School and became one of the leading proponents of shopping by computer in the 1990s, any sentence north of 10 years will secure him a place in what has become an infamous group of former CEOs convicted of felonies.

Realizing that their client will have to get at least as much time as Shelton, Forbes' lawyers are trying to minimize the damage. In a motion filed earlier this month, they recommended that Forbes be given no more than 10 years, although sentencing guidelines call for him to receive between 121/2 and just under 16 years.

Brendan Sullivan, lead attorney for Forbes, argued that because of his client's age, 64, he should be given only a 10-year sentence. Further, according to his lawyers, Forbes has led an "admirable life," and therefore merits a lower prison term. According to Sullivan, Forbes has "demonstrated extraordinary philanthropy," giving away some $2.5 million in cash, stock and gifts to worthy causes since 1990.

The prosecutors who won a conviction against Forbes in October after two mistrials have a different view.

In a pre-sentencing memorandum filed Monday, they argued that Forbes already has benefited from the fact that the U.S. Probation Office applied the 1997 guidelines, even though recent court decisions would allow for sentencing him under the harsher guidelines that could have meant a 25-year term.

Moreover, they noted, Forbes perjured himself in all three of his trials, testifying that he knew nothing about the fraud at Cendant.

The prosecutors also scoffed at his $2.5 million in charitable contributions. They pointed out that according to his own testimony, Forbes had a net worth of $200 million in 1997 and that he reported $85 million in income from 1995 to 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0117494

Noting that Forbes received an $11 million windfall in March 1998 by selling stock in Cendant, they argued that "the defendant stole more from Cendant's shareholders in a single day … than he ever donated to charity." Prosecutors are also seeking $3.2 billion in restitution.

Whatever Forbes' sentence, one former prosecutor thinks the 12-to-15-year range is appropriate.

"The 1997 guidelines got it right," says Andrew Weissmann, former head of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force and now an attorney at Jenner & Block. "If the guidelines are too draconian, judges are going to ignore them."

Regulators Examining Commerce Bank (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

Commerce Bancorp, which calls itself "America's most convenient bank," rattled investors yesterday after it disclosed that federal regulators were investigating the bank's real estate deals with executives.

Shares of Commerce fell 8.3 percent, or $2.89, to $31.83, after the bank said the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve were conducting an inquiry.

Commerce has become one of the fastest-growing banks in the nation, thanks in part to its extended branch hours, and has made an aggressive and successful push into New York's crowded banking market.

Commerce, based in Cherry Hill, N.J., said, "The scope of the investigation will include but not be limited to transactions with its officers, directors and related parties, including transactions involving bank premises."

Investors were unnerved by the announcement, in large part, because "it was so vague," said Meredith Whitney, an analyst with CIBC World Markets. "It could be the lightest offense or it could be the most severe offense."

Bank executives declined to answer questions about the investigation on a conference call with analysts and reporters yesterday. Commerce said it had appointed a committee of independent board members to oversee the investigation.

Critics have long complained about the bank's business ties with firms that are either owned or controlled by Commerce's chairman and president, Vernon W. Hill II, and his wife, Shirley Hill.

Mr. Hill and his family trusts own or are partners in real estate firms that lease property to Commerce for bank branches; the firms earned about $1.9 million in annual rent in 2005. Also, Mrs. Hill runs a firm that designs Commerce branches; she earned $7.5 million from the bank in 2005. That year, Commerce spent $482,000 at Galloway National Golf Club, an 18-hole course near Atlantic City that is owned by Mr. Hill.

Analysts said the re-emergence of issues that were widely believed to have been resolved is unsettling, because it suggests that regulators have uncovered new problems.

"Many were of the mind-set that the regulatory clouds were behind them, and then all of a sudden, wham, you see this today," said Adam Barkstrom, an analyst with Stifel Nicolaus & Company. "It's befuddling."

Mr. Barkstrom, who was once a bank examiner, said it was common for regulators to scrutinize how banks treat loans and other relationships with executives, directors and other insiders.

Officials at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve declined to comment, citing polices of not discussing individual banks.

Mr. Hill, 61, founded Commerce in Marlton, N.J., near Philadelphia at the age of 27 soon after he started a commercial real estate business and graduated with an economics degree from the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania. He has cultivated the image of a maverick in the staid banking industry by bucking the trend toward automation and by publicly belittling the policies and approaches of competitors.

The company reported yesterday that its assets grew 18 percent in 2006, to $45.27 billion, as deposits rose 18 percent and loans climbed 23 percent. Profits increased 11 percent, to $315.1 million. Commerce added 55 branches last year and said that it expected to add another 65 in 2007, nearly half of them in metropolitan New York.

The bank's growth comes as rivals are struggling to increase deposits and profits because short-term interest rates, which determine the cost of money for banks, are higher than long-term rates, which often determine how much money banks can make from loans and investments.

Mr. Hill, who declined to comment yesterday, has said the company has been forthright in disclosing its business relationships with his family and the transactions were always conducted at an arm's length.

The company, however, has suggested in previous filings that it would alter how it does business with firms connected to the Hills in response to criticism of the deals. But it is unclear if it has made any significant changes.

In 2002, for instance, a Commerce spokesman, David Flaherty, told The Record of Bergen County, N.J., referring to Mrs. Hill: "Our association with her will change. We don't know what that change is going to be yet."

Mrs. Hill's firm, InterArch, earned $8.1 million in revenue from Commerce in 2002.

In 2005, the last year for which the company has provided information, it did $7.5 million in business with Mrs. Hill.

Commerce has also faced scrutiny for the close ties some of its executives have had with local and state officials in the Northeast. In November, the company said the office of the United States attorney in Philadelphia had informed it that it would not bring charges against the company in a corruption investigation in which two former bank officials and a former treasurer for the city of Philadelphia were convicted of trying to steer municipal business to the bank in exchange for favors.

Senators To Target Executive Benefit (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

The Senate Finance Committee is considering a proposal to sharply limit the earnings corporate executives and other highly paid employees can place tax-free into deferred compensation plans, one of the most popular executive benefits in corporate America.

Under the proposal, expected to be discussed today by committee members, an individual taxpayer could defer no more than $1 million annually in compensation, beginning this year. The shift in tax policy would be likely to affect top executives at hundreds of corporations and would raise taxes on some of the nation's wealthiest workers by an estimated $806 million over 10 years.

The proposal tracks rhetoric that some Democrats employed during the midterm elections, when they portrayed the Republicans who controlled Congress as being too close to special interests and the wealthy. It also offers a response to controversies that have erupted over executive pay in recent months, including scandals over backdated stock options and multimillion-dollar compensation packages paid to current and former corporate chieftains.

The proposal is among more than a dozen provisions aimed at shrinking corporate tax shelters and closing tax loopholes that Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) is expected to propose when the committee meets today, Finance Committee aides said. Together, they would boost federal tax revenue by more than $8 billion over a decade, according to preliminary committee estimates -- nearly enough to pay for a series of tax breaks Baucus and others want to push through Congress for businesses likely to be hit hard by a proposed increase in the minimum wage.

Last week, the House voted to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from $5.15, the first such increase in a nearly a decade, making good on one of the Democrats' campaign promises.

The minimum-wage increase faces difficulty in the Senate, however, unless it is accompanied by tax breaks for small businesses, according to a leadership aide. On Friday, Baucus and the senior Republican on the Finance Committee, Sen. Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, unveiled a package of "small-business tax incentives" that would extend credits for employers who hire former welfare recipients and change the tax code to simplify bookkeeping for certain companies, among other provisions.

It is estimated by the committee that that package will cost $8.3 billion over 10 years. Because Democrats have promised not to increase the deficit, that sum must be offset by spending cuts or tax increases.

In addition to limiting deferred compensation for executives, the committee is expected to target several controversial corporate tax shelters, as well as Americans who renounce their citizenship for tax reasons. But the deferred compensation provision appears likely to generate alarm among business leaders.

Limiting deferred compensation would be "earthshaking" to American executives, said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services in Rockville.

"A lot of executives are deferring the lion's share of their compensation these days. And the typical executive at a Fortune 100 company makes well over $1 million. So there is a huge amount of compensation that would go into deferral accounts that could not be deferred if the tax code were changed," McGurn said.

Business lobbyists reacted to the proposal with deep skepticism.

"There are lots of technical problems with this. For instance, we're not sure what the definition of deferred compensation is," said Lynn D. Dudley, a vice president of the American Benefits Council, an advocate of employer-sponsored benefit plans. "It makes sense to me to have this discussion; Congress is sensitive to this issue, and we want to work with them. But more needs to be done to vet the practical implications of this."

Other lobbyists were surprised at the measure, saying they had not even known it was under discussion.

"I didn't know it was coming," said Dan Danner, executive vice president of the National Federation of Independent Business, a small-business lobby. "It's not something that we proposed or had anything to do with."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Justice Department Outlines Plans To Combat Uptick In Violent Crime (MCT)

By Greg Gordon And Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON - Bush administration officials are scrambling to demonstrate that they're addressing sharp jumps in violent crime in some cities, in an attempt to reclaim a traditionally Republican issue amid criticism from some Democrats, mayors and police chiefs.

Senior Justice Department officials sought Tuesday to highlight the administration's multipronged programs for combating growing gang violence and outbreaks of juvenile crime. The renewed emphasis comes as some experts, as well as politicians, cite federal cuts in city and state law enforcement funding as a possible contributor to spikes in murders, robberies and assaults in medium-sized cities.

While criminal justice experts stress that the jumps in crime over the last 18 months in cities such as Charlotte, N.C.; Cleveland, Ohio; Memphis, Tenn.; Minneapolis and Sacramento, Calif., may not represent a long-term upswing, they're watching to see if President Bush proposes more anti-crime funding in his State of the Union Address next week.

"There's no locomotive coming down the track saying we have to have a high homicide rate," Lawrence Sherman, director of the University of Pennsylvania's Jerry Lee Center of Criminology, said Tuesday. "What it's more like is a bubbling cauldron that could either boil over or go back down to simmer."

Chuck Wexler, who heads a think tank for police departments across the country that has monitored crime trends in cities, said the data over the last 18 months suggest that the crime surge "isn't a statistical aberration."

After 14 years of declines in crime, police in some communities began to report double-digit increases. That left the administration vulnerable to criticism because the crime jumps came after the White House instigated $1 billion in cuts in anti-crime funding since 2001 as it shifted its focus to the war on terrorism.

Among the casualties was a Clinton administration program to hire 100,000 police officers.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that federal anti-crime funding has never made up more than 4 percent of total state and local law enforcement spending nationwide.

Sherman said that while federal funding would help police patrol hot spots during high-crime periods, local police departments could address the issue by renegotiating police union contracts that limit officers' shifts.

Other researchers agree that the reasons for the rise in crime are more complicated than money, and they vary from city to city. They point to factors such as increasing gun-, gang- and drug-related violence; growing juvenile crime; a deep hopelessness among poor, young black men; and an upsurge in prison releases after years of record numbers of incarcerations.

The rise in gang activity, in particular, has drawn the attention of the Justice Department and the FBI. At a briefing Tuesday, Alice Fisher, chief of the department's Criminal Division, Assistant FBI Director Chip Burrus and two other officials described efforts to crack down on gangs, especially national and international gangs, such as the Salvadoran la Mara Salvatrucha, also known as MS-13.

Unlike the centralized, crack-dealing gangs of the 1990s, Burrus said today's gangs are more neighborhood-based. "They're local, they're violent, and we really have to do something about it," Burrus said.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales set up a National Anti-Gang Task Force last year, and a coordinating center now links half a dozen federal law enforcement agencies with local police departments.

Shortly before November's elections, Gonzales announced a Justice Department study of 18 cities to assess what local anti-crime tactics were working best.

The government also has learned from the intelligence failures before the Sept. 11 terror attacks and has set up a National Gang Intelligence Center to ensure that local and national law enforcement agencies share the latest data, Burrus said. In addition, the Justice Department has distributed $2.5 million to cities with acute gang problems: Los Angeles, Tampa, Fla.; Cleveland, Dallas-Ft. Worth, Milwaukee and a string of cities in eastern Pennsylvania.

Alfred Blumstein, a Carnegie-Mellon University professor who studies crime trends, said that in many cases, the gun violence isn't generated by a formal gang but by loose groups of young men who "have a low threshold of insult" and will do whatever is needed to take revenge.

Democrats have seized on the issue in recent weeks. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., recently wrote the FBI urging a response to the "alarming" crime data and noting the "drastic cuts" in federal anti-crime funding. The Milwaukee Police Department, for example, has blamed $1 million in federal funding cuts for the loss of 55 police officers.

Wexler, who heads the Police Executive Research Forum, met recently with top Justice Department officials and said that there is "no question" they're refocusing attention on crime.

"I think the Justice Department is getting it," he said.

U.S. Justice Department Helps One South GA Community Deal With Violence (WALB)

WALB-TV, NBC 10, Albany, GA, January 17, 2007

Moultrie- Representatives from the U.S. Department of Justice came to Moultrie Tuesday to listen to complaints from citizens upset over a fatal police shooting.

The Justice Department held a community forum after Hispanic crimes escalated last year in Colquitt County. In the wake of the recent Willie Banks shooting, the justice department was called in again.

They met with community groups Tuesday afternoon to discuss how the community as a whole can better respond when shootings and violence like those acts occur.

Officer Bruce Hamm shot Banks as officers tried to serve a warrant against him in November.

After Marches And The Speeches - What Does New Orleans Do Now? (AP)

By Mary Foster, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

They came by the thousands last week, carrying signs and pictures of the dead and demanding action.

A bloody murder spree that opened the year by littering the city with nine bodies in 10 days galvanized residents from across the city's neighborhoods and class lines.

The dramatic march against crime in New Orleans echoed the outcry that grew in the mid-1990s from the slayings in the French Quarter that became known as the Pizza Kitchen killings. People took to the streets then and public officials developed concrete plans to attack a murder problem that left more than 400 people a year dead.

But in the post-Katrina environment, the decision-makers have many issues to cope with, and a major difference is the lack of a solid plan by either Mayor Ray Nagin or the police department to stem the violence, said criminologist and University of New Orleans professor Peter Scharf.

"The difference between the march now and the one after Pizza Kitchen murders is that back then the police said, give us the money and we'll reduce the homicides by half," Scharf said. "The second is that they came up with a plan. They sought help from focus groups in the community and developed a very carefully thought out strategic plan."

Mayor Ray Nagin and police superintendent Warren Riley outlined a plan to stop the violence earlier in the week. It included shuffling police officers from administrative jobs and using deputies from the jail to beef up patrols, speeding up delivery of murder cases to the district attorney, stopping cars on the streets between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m., when most of the murders take place.

"I think the plan is thin to say the least," Scharf said. "The proposals are tactics, not strategies. They need long-term strategies."

The slaying of three employees at the French Quarter restaurant on Dec. 1, 1996, sparked a public outcry that led then-Mayor Marc Morial and the city council to reverse their positions on providing more money for police.

"I had been to the city council many times asking for more officers, more money to pay them so I could recruit good people, and nothing happened," Richard Pennington, now police chief in Atlanta, said on Thursday. "Then the killings happened in the French Quarter and people came out carrying signs saying `Give Chief Pennington What He Needs.' Right after that we got dramatic pay increases, more officers and money for equipment."

After the Pizza Kitchen killings, the city was able to get a number of grants from the Justice Department to institute community police programs that put cops in closer contact with citizens. That money is no longer available, Scharf said, drained to pay for the Iraq War.

"I think getting officers in with the people was the most important thing we did," Pennington said. "In 1994 there were 427 murders in New Orleans and 180 of those were in the housing projects, so that's where we put our officers."

Pennington set up mini police stations in the projects and the cops not only patrolled, they started youth programs and got to know residents.

"When I started in New Orleans it was the most violent city in America," said Pennington, who could boast not a single 2007 murder 11 days into the new year. "When I left it was down to 30th."

Pennington applauded the effort to start foot and bike patrols, saying that will help win the confidence of the public.

"And it's good that they know what's causing the majority of the murders - drugs, guns and gangs," Pennington said. "That means they need good intelligence on them now, whose selling the drugs and where."

Last Thursday's march may also indicate that the public is much more willing to get involved now than they were in the mid-90s, said Rafael Goyeneche, executive director of the watchdog group, Metropolitan Crime Commission of Greater New Orleans.

"I think this was a defining moment in the history of this city," Goyeneche said. "Citizens stepped up from all over the city. As long as it doesn't stop when the crowd dissipated it will mean something. And I don't think it will stop. I got a sense of momentum and that people will not to accept the statis quo."

The personal stories of the marchers were frequently frightening and horrifying. One marcher survived a gunshot wound to his chest but moved to San Francisco after his attacker was released without charges. A man beaten by three attackers said he was still afraid to walk alone after dark. A woman who had five family members gunned down - including her pregnant sister-in-law - spoke of the pain the losses caused.

Rev. Emanuel Smith Jr., pastor of the Israelite Baptist Church stood at the rally holding a picture of three young black men in coffins in his church. They were three of the teenagers shot to death as they sat in a SUV in June. Smith conducted the funeral, one of more than 32 he said he's conducted for victims of violence since Katrina.

"We have to get mad, not scared," Smith said. "We have to help the police. We will identify the drug dealers on our blocks. We will tell the police who the pushers are. We will get back to our communities and get to work."

Jury Selection Begins In Trial Of Cheney's Former Top Aide (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — The perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. began Tuesday with his lawyers trying to eliminate as jurors anyone who might have strongly negative feelings about the Bush administration in general and Vice President Dick Cheney in particular.

Mr. Libby, who was the vice president's chief of staff, is facing five felony counts charging that he lied to F.B.I. agents and to a grand jury investigating who leaked the name of a Central Intelligence Agency operative and why. Judge Reggie M. Walton, who is presiding over the case in Federal District Court, has said he hopes to have the jury in place for opening statements on Monday.

The first day of jury selection on Tuesday went slowly, with only nine potential jurors interviewed. Two of them were excused by Judge Walton after they made it clear they were critics of the administration and Mr. Cheney.

One woman lasted barely 40 seconds on the witness stand before she was dismissed. She said "nothing that could be said here" would make her believe anything good about the administration. Another man, after about 15 minutes, acknowledged that his low regard for Mr. Cheney might figure into how he evaluated his testimony if it was in conflict with other witnesses.

Mr. Cheney is expected to be one of the star witnesses for the defense.

Mr. Libby's lawyers, Theodore V. Wells and William H. Jeffress Jr., also explored whether potential jurors were open to one of their main lines of argument: that if Mr. Libby gave incorrect answers to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the grand jury, it could have been a simple case of faulty memory.

They asked the potential jurors if they ever had the experience of believing something had happened only to learn later that they had remembered it incorrectly. They also asked if two people gave "different accounts of a conversation they had," did that necessarily mean one of the participants was lying.

After the name of the C.I.A. officer, Valerie Wilson — who was known by her maiden name, Valerie Plame — appeared in a column by Robert D. Novak in July 2003, Patrick J. Fitzgerald was named as a special prosecutor to investigate the leak.

Mr. Fitzgerald looked into who leaked Ms. Wilson's name, whether it violated the law against disclosing the identities of C.I.A. officers and whether the disclosure was devised to punish her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV. Days before the column appeared, Mr. Wilson, a former ambassador, asserted in a commentary in The New York Times that the administration had knowingly distorted intelligence about Saddam Hussein's efforts to obtain nuclear material to help the case for going to war in Iraq.

The indictment of Mr. Libby charges that he lied when he said he did not discuss Ms. Wilson's identity in conversations with two reporters. The two reporters, Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, and Matthew Cooper of Time magazine, testified that Mr. Libby had, in fact, discussed Ms. Wilson and her employment at the C.I.A.

Mr. Libby's defense is that those two reporters' memories of their conversations may not be accurate. And, even if they were, Mr. Libby, also Mr. Cheney's national security adviser, was preoccupied with far weightier issues than Ms. Wilson's identity.

Potential jurors were also asked if they believed that the administration distorted intelligence to bolster the case for war with Iraq.

Jurors Questioned About War, Memory As Libby Trial Opens (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

The trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff opened yesterday with defense lawyers carefully scrutinizing potential jurors for strong opinions about the Bush administration, the war in Iraq and the fallibility of human memory.

The questioning signaled the key issues in the case against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who is accused of lying to investigators and a grand jury during the investigation of the leak of a CIA officer's identity to the media in 2003. The prosecution alleges that Libby deliberately misled FBI agents and a grand jury about several conversations he had with journalists then. Defense lawyers contend their client was too busy to recall the details of those conversations.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton, who is presiding over the trial, yesterday dismissed three of the nine potential jurors interviewed. Two were released after expressing strong feelings about the Bush administration.

"I am completely without objectivity," said a woman in her 30s, who was dressed in tailored brown trousers and a sweater. "There is nothing they could say or do that would make me think anything positive." Walton excused her immediately. Libby turned to watch her walk out of court.

Libby, the most senior Bush administration official to face a criminal trial, is charged with five felony counts. CIA operative Valerie Plame's name and undercover role were revealed in a syndicated column days after her husband, former U.S. ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, publicly accused President Bush of twisting information Wilson had gathered on a CIA-sponsored mission to investigate Iraq's efforts to develop a nuclear weapons program. Libby, 56, is not accused of the leak itself.

The trial is likely to feature members of the government and the media elite as witnesses, including Cheney, NBC's Tim Russert and Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward. It will center, in part, on administration efforts in the spring of 2003 to defend the decision to go to war in Iraq.

The difficulty of finding 12 jurors and four alternates became apparent as jury selection began. Walton started by asking prospective jurors 38 pre-screening questions, telling them the inquiry would help determine whether they had "certain sympathies or prejudices" that could interfere with their responsibility to be impartial.

Presaging a key element of the defense, jurors were asked several questions about the reliability of memory. In one question that mirrors a dispute in the case, the judge asked jurors if they thought it was impossible for a person to honestly believe he or she was told some information by one person just weeks or months after learning that same information from a completely different person. Libby told FBI agents that he learned about Plame's identity from Russert in July, and forgot that Cheney had told him about her a month earlier.

But in a city where Democrats outnumber Republicans nearly 10 to 1, one of the most sensitive questions for the defense was No. 2: "Do any of you have feelings or opinions about the Bush administration or any of its policies or actions, whether positive or negative, that might affect your ability to give a former member of the Bush administration a fair trial?"

The judge dismissed a young man in his 20s after he told lawyers and the judge: "I don't have the highest opinion" of the vice president.

A female jury candidate said she believed she could fairly weigh Libby's guilt or innocence but described having a cousin in Iraq and not supporting the president's policy of keeping troops there for extended tours of duty.

"I thought to myself, 'Why would he be so cold, not let the troops come home? . . . They're tired,' " she said. "I also think Bush knows this. He just wants the war." Defense attorneys Theodore V. Wells Jr. and William Jeffress Jr. sought to dismiss the woman, but the judge kept her in the prospective pool.

A woman who said she was a soprano opera singer and mother of three said she believed the American public had not gotten the real justification for going to war in Iraq but did not think Bush had intentionally misled the nation. "Somewhere in there, there seems to be a credibility gap," she said. "Who [did it]? I don't know."

Possible Libby Jurors Quizzed (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jury selection in the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby turned into an assessment of the credibility of the Bush administration Tuesday, with lawyers for the former White House aide asking potential jurors how they feel about the war in Iraq and whether they think present and former administration officials who may be called to testify can be believed.

Libby is charged with lying to investigators about conversations he had with journalists about a CIA operative who is married to a critic of the administration's war policies. Libby's lawyers signaled Tuesday that even though the case was about perjury and obstruction, they were concerned that strong feelings among the jurors about the war — and whether President Bush misled the public about it — could influence their verdict.

Two potential jurors were dismissed after expressing strongly negative feelings about administration officials.

The questioning about the Bush administration and the Iraq war drew repeated objections from prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who said that the defense lawyers were engaged in "an open-ended Rorschach test," alluding to the famous ink-blot test in which people are believed to project their feelings onto ambiguous stimuli.

But U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said the defense had a right to fully explore whether any of the jurors were biased.

In court papers filed Tuesday, Libby's lawyers argued that the questioning was needed because of an unusual amount of pretrial publicity in the case, which they said had in some cases been "inaccurate and inflammatory" and "unduly prejudicial." They cited a press conference that Fitzgerald had given after Libby was indicted, among other examples.

The judge dismissed a financial analyst who said he would have problems believing Vice President Dick Cheney, Libby's former boss, who is expected to testify on behalf of his former aide. A young woman was dismissed after she acknowledged she was "completely without objectivity" about the Bush administration, and could not find "anything positive" to say about it.

As part of the pretrial scrutiny, Walton read the names of 80 prominent figures who he said would probably be mentioned at the trial or called as witnesses, to see whether any were familiar to the jurors. Besides Cheney, the list included Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, former CIA Director George J. Tenet, and a raft of journalists including Washington Post editor and reporter Bob Woodward.

Rice was Bush's national security advisor when Libby worked for Cheney. If she were to emerge as a witness for the government, it could provide an additional glimpse into the inner workings of the administration.

A State Department spokeswoman said she had no information about whether Rice would testify, and referred calls to the Justice Department. A spokesman for Fitzgerald declined to elaborate.

Libby was indicted after a three-year investigation by Fitzgerald that began when the name of CIA operative Valerie Plame was mentioned in a July 14, 2003, column by syndicated columnist Robert Novak. Plame is married to former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, who in a New York Times op-ed article eight days earlier had accused the Bush administration of twisting prewar intelligence.

Though it is a felony to publicize the name of a covert agent, Fitzgerald did not charge anyone with that crime. Libby, the only person charged in the investigation, was accused of misleading investigators by suggesting he had heard about Plame from reporters, when according to Fitzgerald, Libby was giving reporters that information.

Jury selection is expected to last several days. The trial is expected to last six weeks; opening statements are set for early next week.

38 Questions Used To Screen Potential Jurors In Libby Case (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

In the opening moments yesterday of the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby on charges that he lied during a federal investigation into a CIA leak, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton read aloud 38 questions that lawyers for both sides had agreed on to help screen potential jurors. They included mundane questions about whether potential members of the jury panel knew the people involved in the case, had ever been a victim or perpetrator of a crime, had read news about Libby's alleged crime.

And then there were four intriguing questions exploring potential jurors' beliefs about human memory.

The memory questions go to the core of Libby's defense. The prosecution plans to try to prove that Libby, the former chief of staff of Vice President Cheney, deliberately lied to FBI investigators and a grand jury about how he learned that Valerie Plame worked for the CIA and what he said to several reporters about her. The defense wants to establish that Libby told the investigators what he believed to be true -- but that his memory simply failed because his job was so demanding. Here is what the jurors were asked:

? Is there anyone who believes that everyone's memory is like a tape recorder and therefore all individuals are able to remember exactly what they said and were told in the past?

? Is there anyone who feels that a person could not honestly say something about a matter he or she truly believed to be . . . true when that person several months earlier actually said something totally different about that same matter?

? Is there anyone who believes that it is impossible for a person to mistakenly believe that he or she was told something by one person when in fact the person was actually told the information by someone totally different several months earlier?

? Is there anyone who believes that it is absolutely impossible for a person to believe very strongly that he or she has certain memories about something, even though it is determined that those memories are inaccurate?

As Trial Begins, Cheney's Ex-Aide Is Still A Puzzle (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — Paradox seems to define I. Lewis Libby Jr., who remains a bit mysterious even to close colleagues. He is the White House policy enforcer who also wrote a literary novel; a buttoned-down Washington lawyer who likes knocking back tequila shots in cowboy bars and hurtling down mountains on skis and bikes; and a 56-year-old intellectual known to all by his childhood nickname, Scooter.

But now comes the most baffling paradox of all, as Mr. Libby, former chief of staff and alter ego to Vice President Dick Cheney, began his trial in federal court here on Tuesday on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. By all accounts a first-rate legal mind and a hypercautious aide whose discretion frustrated reporters, he is charged with repeatedly lying to a grand jury and to the F.B.I. about his leaks to the news media in the battle over Iraq war intelligence.

"I don't often use the word 'incomprehensible,' but this is incomprehensible to me," said Dennis Ross, the veteran Middle East troubleshooter who is now at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "He's a lawyer who's as professional and competent as anyone I know. He's a friend, and when he says he's innocent, I believe him. I just can't account for this case."

Among Mr. Libby's friends and former colleagues, the case brought by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special prosecutor, is considered not only unjust, but also a terrible irony.

"He's going to be the poster boy for the criminalization of politics, and he's not even political," said Mary Matalin, Mr. Cheney's former political adviser.

Critics of the Bush administration say nothing was more political than the administration's use of defective intelligence to take the country to war, in which Mr. Libby was deeply involved. At a time of deep public distress over events in Iraq, the trial will inevitably carry symbolic weight beyond the legal question of whether Mr. Libby lied.

He was "Cheney's Cheney," in Ms. Matalin's words, "an absolutely salient translator" of the ideas of the man considered perhaps the most powerful vice president in history. Mr. Libby had a role in virtually every national security initiative of the administration's first five years.

It was Mr. Libby who helped assemble a dossier on Saddam Hussein and unconventional weapons and ties to Al Qaeda for Secretary of State Colin L. Powell's speech to the United Nations on Feb. 5, 2003, fighting to keep in the speech evidence that Mr. Powell found questionable. It was Mr. Libby, at Mr. Cheney's direction, who repeatedly spoke to reporters to rebut Joseph C. Wilson IV after Mr. Wilson, a former ambassador, publicly accused the White House of distorting intelligence.

"Libby didn't plan the war," said John Prados, a historian of national security who wrote a book in 2004 on the flawed Iraq intelligence. "But he did enable the administration to set out on that course. He was the facilitator."

Both fans and critics of Mr. Libby might be surprised by some anecdotes from Yale, where Mr. Libby graduated in 1972. Fellow students recall his helping silkscreen T-shirts proclaiming "solidarity" between Yalies and the Black Panthers and going with shoulder-length blond hair and in a leather jacket to help at an anti-Vietnam War demonstration.

A couple of years after graduation, a classmate, Donald Hindle, met Mr. Libby, then a student at the Columbia Law School, and noted a decidedly nonpolitical talent.

"He could remember not only all 79 'Star Trek' episodes, as I could, but he knew all the titles, too," Mr. Hindle said. "I think he always liked fantasy."

Mr. Libby and his brother Hank, a retired tax lawyer, were the first in the family to graduate from college. Their father, Irve Lewis Libby Sr., had dropped out to support his family in the Depression. The senior Mr. Libby, who called his son Scooter after seeing him scurry about his crib, became a successful businessman. The family lived in the Washington region, Miami and Connecticut before Scooter graduated from the Phillips Andover Academy in Massachusetts.

At college, Mr. Libby began writing a novel, a mystery set at a country inn in 1903 in Japan, where he had spent the summer of 1969. He rewrote the book off and on for 25 years before it was published as "The Apprentice" in 1996, to glowing reviews ("a small triumph of meticulous craftsmanship," The Washington Post said), though after his indictment The New Yorker mocked its sex scenes.

Also at Yale, Mr. Libby took courses from a young political science instructor, Paul D. Wolfowitz, who became the chief intellectual theorist of the Iraq war. Seven years older, Mr. Wolfowitz was the critical mentor in recruiting Mr. Libby to the neoconservative camp, hiring him first in 1981 as a speechwriter and an Asia analyst at the State Department under President Ronald Reagan and in 1989 as a strategist in the Defense Department, headed by Mr. Cheney in the administration of the first President George Bush.

"He was fascinated by Paul's thinking," recalled a friend, Francis Fukuyama, who worked with him at the State Department. Some experts find the seeds of the current president's assertive foreign policy in a 1992 military policy paper that Mr. Libby helped draft.

Between government stints, Mr. Libby practiced law with the firm of Leonard Garment, counsel to President Richard M. Nixon. Mr. Garment remembers him as "reliable, immensely hard working and guarded."

Presented with the seemingly intractable tax problems of a fugitive commodities trader, Marc Rich, Mr. Libby "went off for a year and worked on it, closeted with his own intellect," Mr. Garment said.

He emerged with a creative analysis, Mr. Garment added, that would ultimately help persuade President Bill Clinton to pardon Mr. Rich, an act that Republicans criticized because Mr. Rich's former wife, Denise, was a Democratic donor.

It was in Mr. Garment's firm that Mr. Libby met his future wife, Harriet Grant, a lawyer and onetime Democratic staff member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, where she handled Anita F. Hill's challenge to the Supreme Court nomination of Clarence Thomas.

"She probably cancels his vote every four years," said Jackson Hogen, a friend of Mr. Libby since his Andover days, a ski partner and a liberal Democrat. "It's a credit to Scooter that he can maintain a friend like me and a wife like her all these years."

Friends praise Mr. Libby's courtly manners and dry humor, but they also note his reserve. As a lawyer and an aide, he has generally advocated for others, whether Mr. Rich or Mr. Cheney. Many in Washington saw his views as indistinguishable from the vice president's, but some friends say they are uncertain about his personal opinions.

"He never struck me, even knowing him as I do, as an ideologue," said Mr. Fukuyama, who has skied with Mr. Libby and both of whose children were on the same Little League team. "I wouldn't say I have a particularly good handle on his worldview."

In 2001, when Mr. Cheney lured Mr. Libby from his $535-an-hour law practice to the White House, one attraction for the vice president was his discretion, said Juleanna Glover Weiss, Mr. Cheney's former press secretary.

"Like Cheney, Scooter's a tomb," Ms. Glover Weiss said. "Information can go in, but most of the time it doesn't come out."

Yet it is clear that long before Sept. 11, 2001, Mr. Libby, who studied the possibility of biological attacks in the Persian Gulf war in 1991, focused on the terrorist threat.

"What animates him is security," Ms. Matalin said. "On 9/12, there were but a handful of people who had the strategic grasp of terrorism that he did."

Some colleagues later wondered whether his focus on the threat had became too single-minded. Mr. Libby and his boss repeatedly pushed for widespread immunization against smallpox, disturbing others in the administration who worried about fatal reactions that some people might have.

C. Dean McGrath Jr., Mr. Libby's deputy until the end of 2005, said that particularly after the shock of Sept. 11 "Scooter considered it to be part of his job to think about dire possibilities."

By all accounts, Mr. Libby brought his worst-case approach to the debate over Mr. Hussein's threat. When that debate led to the leak of a C.I.A. officer's identity, the resulting criminal investigation produced one indictment, that of Mr. Libby for perjury and obstruction of justice. It landed just after the death of Mr. Libby's mother and a fall that broke his foot and left him hobbling into the federal courthouse on crutches.

"He puts up a tough front," said Mr. Hogen, his school and ski buddy. "But there's a kind human being in there who's really gotten beat up in this affair."

Mr. Libby's friends, including Mr. Cheney, have rallied behind him. The Hudson Institute, a research institution, has provided Mr. Libby with a place to work. His legal defense fund has a board that would be the envy of any conservative institution, including five former cabinet members, five former members of Congress and seven former ambassadors.

Friends say Mr. Libby, 56, has spent a lot of time at his home in McLean, Va., with his wife and children, a son in middle school and a daughter in elementary school. He has focused his legal acumen on a new client — himself.

Kenneth Adelman, a friend from the Reagan administration, invited the family for a week's vacation in Colorado last summer and took Mr. Libby to lunch with a liberal, pacifist local columnist, Paul Andersen.

The two men had a long talk about wilderness and recited poetry from memory. Mr. Andersen learned later that he had been talking with a man whom he had considered a symbol for all that was wrong with an administration that he holds in contempt.

If Mr. Libby broke the law, Mr. Andersen said, he should be held accountable. But he said his views were more complicated after the lunch encounter.

"I got a feeling for him as a family man, a guy who likes the mountains," Mr. Andersen said. "Later, it seemed like he was nursing some serious pain. It seemed a dreadful shame that circumstances can sometimes ruin lives."

Courts Checking Jurors' Histories More Frequently (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 17, 2007

The case involved the largest single drug bust in D.C. history, and after eight weeks of trial, the last thing a defense attorney wanted to hear was concerns about the jury.

But just after closing statements in a drug-conspiracy trial last month at the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Judge Ellen Huvelle thought there could be a problem.

Only then had she run the jurors' names through criminal-background checks. The system flagged four jurors -- something none of them had disclosed during jury selection.

Had they lied? Or were the data -- run by the FBI and notoriously unreliable -- incorrect?

The question was hardly incidental. Last year, Chicago-based U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer dismissed two jurors during deliberations in the corruption trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, after the Chicago Tribune found that they had concealed their arrest records during jury selection. Ryan is free on bail while an appeals court looks at whether the jury problems merit a reversal.

The Ryan case drew attention across the legal world. Convicted felons are barred from serving on federal juries. But most courts rely on individual jurors to tell the court about any convictions, rather than run criminal-background checks on the jury pool. Indeed, the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, which oversees the federal judicial system, keeps no data on which courts run background checks.

But that may be changing. At the upcoming trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr., Judge Reggie Walton will check the criminal backgrounds of potential jurors before lawyers make their final selections. The move comes at the request of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, who specifically noted the Ryan incident during a recent court hearing.

Following the former governor's trial, judges on the district court in Chicago said they would start running checks for some high-profile trials. In Washington's federal court, criminal-background checks occur only in big cases, and the ultimate decision is left to the individual judge. Judge Royce Lamberth, for instance, ran background checks during the trial of the notorious drug gang Murder Inc. in 2002. Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy Jeffress, who was a prosecutor in the case, says that although some of the jurors weren't immediately forthcoming about prior arrests, nobody was dismissed because of criminal history.

"In a longer trial where you don't want to have any problems, it's worth doing, but it's not necessarily worth doing in an average trial," she says of background checks.

But running such checks is not the practice in D.C. Superior Court, says spokeswoman Leah Gurowitz.

Although some judges and attorneys are concerned that the background checks could be an invasion of privacy, U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman is not opposed to the practice because, he says, "if they are supposed to answer a questionnaire under oath and tell the truth, why not have a fail-safe mechanism of preventing" convicted felons from becoming jurors?

But during the drug case before Huvelle, the background checks were put off until the trial was nearly complete. Two defense attorneys in the case say Huvelle forgot to run the checks until then. "That was the reason it was kind of a surprising issue," says Rudy Acree, who represented one of the four defendants.

Huvelle could not be reached for comment.

The trial featured four defendants charged in a cocaine-trafficking conspiracy that centered on the seizure of nearly 100 kilos of cocaine and almost $1 million in cash -- all of which the prosecutors displayed in the courtroom during trial. Two defendants were acquitted, and the jury has yet to decide the fate of the last two.

When the system flagged four jurors, Huvelle called three of them -- one of whom was an alternate -- in for further questioning, the defense attorneys say. (Huvelle did not call the fourth because he was far down the list of alternates.)

Two said the names were wrong, claiming either that their Social Security numbers did not match or they had never been in the jurisdiction where the incident occurred.

The jurors' responses were not entirely unexpected. FBI data do not always show whether an arrest or charge resulted in a conviction. Sometimes names come up that are similar but not exactly the same, which is why the data cannot be the sole basis for dismissing a juror.

But the third juror had two possible criminal charges flagged. Attorneys say that at first, she denied having anything to do with the charges. But after they peppered her with more questions, the attorneys say, she admitted that one of the charges, a 22-year-old arrest, could have been her, but that her arrest had never led to a formal conviction.

Neither side decided to throw the woman off the jury, but the incident could become part of an appeal, Acree says. "It's one of those things where you can't really rule anything out," he says. The jury began deliberations in the case on Dec. 12 and broke for the holidays on Dec. 21.

Either way, says Jon Norris, a defense attorney whose client in the case was acquitted, "you expect to have some reliance that the jurors you pick are going to be the ones that deliberate."

Editorial: Rein In All The Rogue Prosecutors (IBD)

Investor's Business Daily, January 17, 2007

Justice: Like the Duke lacrosse players, Scooter Libby faces jail for alleged involvement in a crime that was never committed, pursued by a vindictive prosecutor. And also like the Duke case, it's a national disgrace.

The trial of Libby, the only person charged with anything in the three-year probe of who "leaked" the name of CIA desk jockey Valerie Plame, officially got under way Tuesday. Actually, it might be called the second trial. The first, in the media, already found Libby guilty.

It is perhaps a sign of how much a media pariah Libby has become that "Fox News Sunday" host Chris Wallace felt compelled to ask why, "given his legal troubles," Libby was invited to the Christmas party of his old boss, Vice President Dick Cheney. Please.

When Cheney responded that Libby was "one of the finest individuals I've ever known," a "friend" and "a good man," Wallace queried: "Is he honest?" The only dishonesty being perpetrated these days is by reporters who forget about the presumption of innocence and by prosecutors who pursue the demonstrably innocent with a mindless vengeance unseen since Ahab pursued his white whale.

At least Wallace got it right when he asked Cheney, "Given the fact that it now turns out that Libby wasn't the one who first leaked the name of Valerie Plame, what do you think of the fact that he's the only one who's being prosecuted in this case?" And for what? we might add.

If lying to law enforcement, officers of the court or Congress warrants jail time, then both Bill Clinton and Sandy Berger might still be writing their memoirs in Leavenworth. For that's what Libby is charged with -- lying to investigators. Not stuffing secret documents in his pants, not even outing a secret agent, but simply having a recollection that is different from reporters of what he said when and to whom.

Berger, the second Clinton administration official to have trouble with his trousers, roams free after a slap on the wrist for destroying classified information. So does Richard Armitage, former deputy secretary of state, who was the one who "outed" the wife of Joe Wilson, former ambassador and serial liar, in what the Washington Post called "an offhand manner, virtually as gossip."

Armitage told the FBI in October 2003 that he was the source. The Justice Department knew it, and so must have special persecutor, er, prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald two months later when he was appointed to investigate Plamegate.

We know, and Fitzgerald knew, Libby didn't "out" Valerie Plame. Columnist Robert Novak, who noted Plame's employment in a July 14, 2003, column, has written: "I learned about Valerie Plame's name from Joe Wilson's entry on Who's Who In America."

That column was written eight days after Plame's hubby wrote a low-profile op-ed in the New York Times about his CIA-sponsored trip to Africa, saying it proved President Bush lied about Iraq seeking yellowcake uranium there.

So Libby didn't out Plame, whose identity was publicly known or could be found out by anyone at the nearest public library. Nor was revealing her identity even a crime, a crime for which no one has been charged. She was a desk analyst at CIA headquarters in Langley, Va., not an overseas undercover operative as the law requires.

Like District Attorney Michael Nifong in the Duke case, Fitzgerald knew early that he had no real crime and no real criminal. But he had to come up with something. So he charged with lying someone who in his job got hundreds of phone calls every day and talked to dozens of reporters because his memory of earlier conversations differed with those reporters' notes.

Duke lacrosse players still twist in the wind, as does Libby, who stands accused of lying about a crime that never occurred in an investigation that never should have happened. Justice should be blind, not those administering it. That's the real crime in both cases.

How Legal Codes Can Hinder Hacker Cases (WSJ)

Prosecutions of Virus Writers Find Complex Issues, Soft Penalties -- but Laws May Stiffen

As police around the world become more skilled at tracking down criminals who spread computer viruses, they are realizing there are some bugs in their own system: hurdles to trying their cases in court.

The problems lie in both building cases and securing stiff sentences, say legal and security experts. Prosecutors can have a hard time explaining the complex crimes to the courts. It often is difficult for law enforcers to quantify the damage caused by a virus that infects computer networks. And judges often hand down light sentences to the culprits, who typically are young, first-time offenders, among other factors.

"The main obstacle in any complex computer-crime case is convincing a judge or a jury about the seriousness of the case," says Arif Alikhan, a former federal prosecutor in Los Angeles. "It's a lot harder than a bank robbery or other crimes."

As a result, some countries -- including the U.S., United Kingdom and Germany -- are reviewing their laws. The British Parliament in November passed the Police and Justice Act which, among other things, updates the country's cybercrime laws by raising the maximum prison penalty for unauthorized access to a computer to two years from six months. It also seeks to plug a loophole by criminalizing so-called denial-of-service attacks, by which one party attempts to knock another party's computer system offline by bombarding it with data via the Internet. Perpetrators now face as many as 10 years in prison; previously, such cases typically were prosecuted for unauthorized modification of a computer, which carries a maximum five-year sentence.

In the U.S., legislation proposed last year advocated raising the maximum sentence for most computer crimes to 30 years in prison. Current penalties for computer crimes vary and generally reach up to 20 years in prison. The bill also tackles certain virus-related activities by outlawing the creation of networks of infected computers, known as botnets. Such networks are frequently used by criminals to launch Internet attacks, fire out the unsolicited email known as spam and swipe personal data stored in other computers. The Cyber-Security Enhancement and Consumer Data Protection bill had broad support in the House, but it wasn't voted on by either chamber during the last session of Congress. It is unclear whether it will be reintroduced.

The push for tougher laws comes as prosecutors have won some high-profile cases that nonetheless resulted in light punishments. An example is the case of the writer of the Agobot virus, a widespread and powerful piece of malicious code that was one of the first major viruses to allow the person spreading it to remotely control armies of infected machines. Since starting to spread in about 2003, the code and the hundreds of offshoot viruses it spawned have affected millions of computers that use Microsoft Corp.'s operating-system software. While the virus wouldn't necessarily shut computers down, it could create a back door through which identity thieves and other criminals could gain access.

But its author, Axel Gembe, a 24-year-old German, received just two years' probation following his conviction on charges of computer sabotage and modifying data at his trial in Germany in November. Prosecutors in the case weren't able to demonstrate the total damage caused by the virus around the world or show Mr. Gembe was directly responsible for infecting all of the machines.

Mr. Gembe admitted in court to writing the virus and supplying it to another hacker but said he didn't widely disseminate it. In Germany, as in the U.S. and many Western countries, writing a computer virus isn't in itself illegal. Distributing a virus with intent to cause harm is a crime in most of those countries, but showing that intent often is difficult for prosecutors to prove. Virus writers often claim to have written a piece of code merely to win bragging rights for the accomplishment among their peers.

The judge also took into account that Mr. Gembe had a difficult home life as a child, including being abandoned by his mother, and that he has recently taken steps to improve his situation. Mr. Gembe currently lives in the city of Freiburg with friends and has an apprenticeship at a security firm that produces alarm systems.

While some legal experts say Mr. Gembe's sentence may be appropriate considering his personal circumstances, they consider it light considering the disruption his virus caused. "Agobot was an industry-changing code" in terms of the rate at which it spread and the ability it gave a remote user to manipulate infected machines, says James Aquilina, a former assistant U.S. attorney in Los Angeles who prosecuted Internet crimes and now is a lawyer at Stroz Friedberg LLP. "Given the way the hacker community regale, revere and admire [Mr. Gembe], I'm sure they think, 'He gets a slap on the wrist, and I'm in the clear.' "

Some prosecutors say the problem in general isn't so much that available penalties aren't sufficient. "The bigger challenge in the penalty sense is making sure that we can actually quantify the harm that is caused" to persuade a judge to issue a punishment that fits the crime, says Christopher Painter, deputy chief of the U.S. Justice Department's Computer Crime Section. Damages can play a key part in sentencing, but collecting comprehensive data is practically impossible as a virus can affect millions of machines, which often are scattered across many countries.

There have been some lengthy sentences. In the U.S., a federal judge in Los Angeles last May sentenced 21-year-old Jeanson James Ancheta to 57 months in prison for computer-virus related crimes. Mr. Ancheta pleaded guilty to several charges, including conspiracy to commit computer fraud and unauthorized access to computers.

Prosecutors said he secretly hijacked tens of thousands of computers, including those at two military sites. Mr. Ancheta then rented the armies of infected computers -- the botnets -- to others for the purpose of launching Internet attacks and sending spam, complete with advice on how many machines would be needed for a specific task. In addition, he received about $60,000 of advertising revenue by directing hundreds of thousands of infected computers in his networks to other computer servers he controlled where so-called adware would surreptitiously download onto the zombie machines, the court filings show.

Feds Offer Cybercrime Tips To Local Cops (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, January 17, 2007

Because many police agencies may lack computer skills, the Justice Department created an investigator's manual.

Police trying to learn how to use the Internet to investigate everything from cyberstalking to spam and illegal hacking have some new advice, thanks to the U.S. Department of Justice.

The department's Office of Justice Programs on Tuesday published what amounts to a manual for tech-challenged gumshoes, covering everything from how to track suspects through an Internet Relay Chat network to targeting copyright thieves on peer-to-peer networks.

Local and state law enforcement have bungled some high-tech investigations recently. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court rejected prosecutors' attempts to seize newspaper reporters' hard drives, and the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that police illegally seized a computer in a methamphetamine investigation. A federal judge permitted an Internet service provider to sue police after it was raided because of Usenet posts its employees knew nothing about.

The new 137-page manual (click for PDF) appears to represent the Justice Department's attempt to offer at least some basic technical and legal tips to law enforcement agencies that may not have computer experts on the payroll.

"Criminals can trade and share information, mask their identity, identify and gather information on victims, and communicate with co-conspirators," the manual says. "Web sites, electronic mail, chat rooms, and file sharing networks can all yield evidence in an investigation of computer-related crime."

The manual warns of the perils of assuming that the owner of a computer--especially Windows PCs, which can be vulnerable to security breaches--is responsible for what's actually on it.

"Because investigations involving the Internet and computer networks mean that the sus¬pect's computer communicated with other computers, investigators should be aware that the suspect may assert that the incriminating evidence was placed on the media by a Trojan program," it says. "A proper seizure and forensic examination of a suspect's hard drive may determine whether evidence exists of the presence and use of Trojan programs."

Neteller Execs Charged In Gambling Case (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 17, 2007

NEW YORK -- Two founders of a company that processes Internet gambling transactions were arrested and charged with funneling billions of dollars in gambling proceeds to overseas betting operations, federal prosecutors announced Tuesday.

The charges mark the latest in a series of crackdowns by the federal government against the online gambling industry.

The charges against the former Neteller PLC directors, John David Lefebvre, 55, and Stephen Eric Lawrence, 46, both Canadian citizens, were contained in two criminal complaints unsealed in U.S. District Court in Manhattan on Monday, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement.

The prosecutor said the men knew when they took their company public that its activities were illegal. FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon said the multibillion-dollar online gambling industry is "a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business."

Neteller is an Internet payment services company that has grown in popularity as an increasing number of credit card companies have begun refusing to accept payments to online gambling sites.

Neteller essentially acts as a middleman between gamblers and offshore betting operations. For example, a gambler who wants to place bets at offshore sports books can fund an account with Neteller, which in turn will transfer the money to the betting sites. Prosecutors say Neteller facilitated the transfer of billions of dollars of illegal gambling proceeds.

Lefebvre was arrested Monday in Malibu, Calif., and was scheduled to appear in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles on Tuesday. Lawrence, who lives in the Bahamas, was arrested Monday in the U.S. Virgin Islands and will appear in federal court on Wednesday.

Peter Neiman, a lawyer for Lawrence, said he had no comment. A lawyer for Lefebvre did not immediately return a telephone message seeking comment.

In 1999, the men founded Neteller, which is based in the Isle of Man and is publicly traded in the United Kingdom.

The company began processing Internet gambling transactions in 2000.

Lawrence left the company's board of directors in October, while Lefebvre left in December 2005, prosecutors said. Together, the men owned as much as 35 percent of the company's outstanding shares.

Prosecutors cited Neteller's 2005 annual report in saying that Lawrence and Lefebvre enabled the company to provide payment services to more than 80 percent of worldwide gaming merchants.

Garcia noted that the company acknowledged when it went public that U.S. law prohibited people from promoting certain forms of gambling, including Internet gambling and transmitting funds that are known to have been derived from criminal activity.

Lefebvre and Lawrence also conceded in the company's offering documents that they were risking prosecution by the U.S. government, he said.

Prosecutors said Neteller in 2005 alone processed more than $7.3 billion in financial transactions, 95 percent of which was derived from money transfers involving Internet gambling.

Lawrence and Lefebvre were charged with conspiring to transfer funds with the intent to promote illegal gambling, and could face up to 20 years in prison if convicted.

Online Purge Sees NETeller Chiefs Arrested In US (DAILYIND)

By Karen Attwood

Daily Independent, January 17, 2007

Shares in NETeller, an online payment processing business, were suspended yesterday after its two founders were arrested and charged with laundering billions of dollars in gaming proceeds in the US.

Stephen Lawrence, the company's former chairman, and John Lefebvre, the former group president, were arrested on Monday. Mr Lawrence, 46, was detained in New York while Mr Lefebvre, 55, was held in Los Angeles.

The FBI's assistant director Mark Mershon said that the multibillion-dollar online gambling industry was "a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business."

The AIM-listed company, which provides e-wallets for online gamblers, has continued to do business in the US, despite the country's crackdown on internet gaming. Most companies pulled out of the US last year but as NETeller is not directly involved in gambling it was thought to be safe. Some 90 per cent of its business is with US customers.

"Blatant violations of US law are not a mere 'risk' to be disclosed to prospective investors," the prosecuting US attorney Michael Garcia said. "Criminal prosecutions related to online gambling will be pursued even in cases where assets and defendants are positioned outside of the US."

NETeller said the two men, who are both Canadian, are no longer involved in the company other than as shareholders, with stakes of 5.9 per cent and 5.5 per cent respectively.

The company asked for its shares to suspended in London yesterday pending clarification of the situation in the US, before the charges were unsealed later last night.

Shares across the sector slipped yesterday but analysts said this could be a time to buy companies that haveclosed their US operations. Shares in NETeller, which has more than 3 million customers and $7bn in annual transactions, fell 79 per cent last year.

Neteller Founders Charged After Sting Operation By FBI (TIMES)

By James Doran In New York

The Times, January 17, 2007

Stephen Lawrence and John Lefebvre, founders of Neteller, the UK-listed online payments company, were last night charged with conspiracy in connection with a multibillion-dollar money laundering scheme linked to internet gambling.

The pair were arrested on Monday after an FBI sting operation discovered that Neteller was being used to allow Americans to place illegal bets on sporting events via internet gambling companies based in foreign countries.

Mr Lawrence, 46, who lives in a luxury home on Paradise Island in The Bahamas, was arrested in the United States Virgin Islands and has been ordered to appear later today in the federal court of St Thomas.

Mr Lefebvre, 55, was arrested at the same time in Malibu, California, and was expected to appear in Los Angeles federal Court last night.

Neither Mr Lawrence nor Mr Lefebvre were available to comment in response to the allegations made in the indictment. If found guilty, the pair face 20 years in jail.

The seven-page indictment, filed in New York last night, claims that the pair set up Neteller in 1999 with the express purpose of providing online payment services to gambling companies. The indictment also claims that between 2000 and 2003 Neteller Inc, a Canadian corporation, offered payment services to various internet gambling companies so that they could illegally access customers in the United States.

From 2004 to the present day, the same operation was conducted by Neteller plc, an Isle of Man-based company which in April 2004 raised some $70 million via a listing on London's AIM. An agent with the FBI named in the indictment claims she used Neteller as a middle man between her US-based bank account and an offshore internet gambling company.

Shares of Neteller were suspended on AIM yesterday before the indictment was released as the company was seeking clarification of its status with US authorities.

A spokesman for Neteller stressed that the founders were no longer employees or directors of the company. "Because of that, this arrest has nothing to do with the company," he added.

Mr Lawrence resigned as a non-executive director of the company on October 13, having stepped down as non-executive chairman last May. Mr Lefebvre resigned as a non-executive director on December 15, 2005. However, the pair still own large stakes of Neteller. Mr Lawrence holds 5.91 per cent of the company, while Mr Lefebvre owns 5.54 per cent.

Neteller claims to operate the largest independent online money transfer business in the world with 3 million customers in 160 countries and over $7 billion in annual transactions.

It specialises in providing instant payment services where money transfer is difficult or risky because of issues of identity, trust, currency exchange, or distance. In the past, it handled funds for online gamblers in the US but it is said to have stopped the practice when tough new laws banned internet gambling in America last October.

Last year authorities arrested a number of prominent executives for breaching US gambling laws, including two from Britain. David Carruthers, the former chief executive of BetOnSports, was arrested in July while Peter Dicks, former non-executive chairman of Sportingbet, was arrested in September.

Arrests In US Rekindle Fears For Future Of Online Gambling (FT)

By James Wilson In Manchester, Gordon Smith And Lucy,warwick-ching In London And Daniel Pimlott In New York

Financial Times, January 17, 2007

US authorities yesterday charged two founders of UK-listed Neteller, one of the leading payment processors for online gamblers, with laundering billions of dollars of gambling proceeds, intensifying concern about the US stance on internet gaming.

Stephen Lawrence, a former chief executive and chairman, was detained on Monday in the US Virgin Islands and was due to appear in court today.

John Lefebvre was held in California and was set to appear in court in Los Angeles yesterday.

The US attorney's office in the southern district of New York said the men, who are Canadian, had been charged with conspiring to transfer funds with the intent to promote illegal gambling. If convicted they could face 20 years in prison.

The two men set up Neteller in 1999 and remain its biggest individual shareholders. But the money transfer company said neither had any current involvement other than as investors.

Mr Lawrence, 46, stepped down from the board last October. Mr Lefebvre, 55, left the board in December 2005.

Michael Garcia, the US attorney for the southern district of New York, said the arrested men "knew when they took their company public that its activities, as well as those of the internet gambling companies it assisted, were illegal in the US".

Neteller, which has its headquarters in the Isle of Man and is listed on Aim in London, had "not received any communication or correspondence from any US authority regarding this or any related matter". Trading in Neteller shares was suspended after the arrests.

Simon Holliday, partner at Global Betting and Gaming Consultants, said: "It could mean anyone . . . ever . . . involved in the online gambling industry faces the possibility of arrest if they travel to the US."

These are the latest in a series of arrests of online gaming executives. David Carruthers, former chief executive of BetonSports and a prominent advocate of regulated online gambling, was arrested in Texas last July. He is, in effect, under house arrest.

Peter Dicks, former chairman of Sportingbet, was arrested in New York but was released and allowed to return to London.

On Monday, shares in Neteller closed down 7 per cent at 163¾p.

Net Execs Face Fed Bet Charge (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, January 17, 2007

The founders of a company that helped send billions of Internet gambling dollars overseas were arrested as part of a government crackdown on wagering on the Web, Manhattan federal prosecutors said yesterday.

Stephen Lawrence, 46, and John Lefebvre, 55, were charged with conspiring to use their Internet payment service company to promote illegal gambling.

Lawrence and Lefebvre, both Canadian citizens, founded Neteller in 1999 and by 2005 they were providing payment services to more than 80% of the world's gaming merchants, prosecutors said. In 2005, the company processed $7.3 billion in transactions, with 95% coming from money transfers for Internet gambling companies.

Lawrence was arrested Monday in St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands and Lefebvre was arrested the same day in Malibu, Calif. They each face a maximum of 20 years in prison. Their company is based in the Isle of Man, near England, and publicly traded in the U.K.

"Stephen Eric Lawrence and John David Lefebvre knew when they took their company public that its activities as well as those of the Internet gambling companies it assisted were illegal in the United States," said Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia.

In recent months, the Justice Department has used money laundering laws to charge two offshore gambling operations. And in 2003, Pay-Pal and parent company eBay forfeited $10 million to settle a lawsuit, that claimed t the company aided illegal online gambling activities.

Neteller Arrests Bode Ill For Online Gambling (BSWK)

By Catherine Holahan

BusinessWeek, January 17, 2007

Two of the company's former directors have been arrested as part of the U.S. government's crackdown on gambling Web sites

When President George W. Bush signed anti-online-gambling legislation into law last October, publicly traded gambling companies folded their cards and left the U.S. table. For instance, PartyGaming, the Gibraltar-based parent of once-leading gambling site PartyPoker, withdrew from the $6-billion-a-year U.S. market. Other companies traded on the London Stock Exchange, such as Sportingbet, followed suit, closing betting sites to U.S. customers and selling off other gambling businesses for $1 to whomever would take them.

However, the game wasn't over for all gambling sites. Private companies such as Antigua-based Bodog Entertainment Group, FullTiltPoker.com, and PokerStars.com kept their virtual doors open to U.S. customers. They took their cues, in part, from Neteller, a publicly traded Internet payment processor used by many online gambling sites, which was making a fortune from transaction fees paid by online bettors. Instead of closing its doors to U.S.-based online gamblers—and forgoing as much as 70% of the $846.7 million it made in fees during the first half of 2006 alone—the company took a wait-and-see approach.

Neteller got an eyeful on Jan. 15. That's when U.S. law enforcement officials arrested two of the company's former directors and founding shareholders, Stephen Lawrence and John Lefebvre. The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York and the Federal Bureau of Investigation have charged that the two men helped transfer billions of dollars in illegal gambling proceeds from Americans to overseas Internet gambling companies. According to the complaint, more than 95% of the $7.3 billion processed by Neteller in 2005 were transactions involving Internet gambling companies. Lawrence's attorney, Peter Neiman of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, declined to comment. Calls to Lefebvre's attorney were not immediately returned. Left in a Lurch

The moves demonstrate how far the U.S. government is prepared to take its crackdown on gambling, and they bode ill for the closely held Internet gambling sites that continue to cater to U.S. clients even after October. "In the eyes of the U.S. Justice

Dept., what Neteller is doing is even worse [than the gaming companies] because they are acting like a bank and helping all this money leave U.S. accounts," says Christopher Costigan, president of the online gaming industry publication Gambling911.com, which initially reported the arrests. He speculates that Neteller will withdraw from the U.S. market.

The case focuses on sports bets placed by a then-Miami resident. According to a statement by an FBI agent involved in the case, the witness bet on National Football League games in August and September with gambling businesses based in Antigua and Costa Rica. In each case, the witness used Neteller to transfer funds. Unlike online poker bets, which are considered illegal by the Justice Dept., though not expressly banned by U.S. laws, sports betting is explicitly outlawed under the 1961 Wire Act (see BusinessWeek.com, 10/3/06, "Online Gambling Still in the Cards?").

The action against Neteller will likely leave the gambling companies that did not withdraw from the U.S. market in a lurch. As long as Neteller was processing payments, companies such as FullTiltPoker.com were able to continue business as usual. After all, many U.S. Internet gamblers were already using Neteller accounts to transfer funds between their checking accounts and online gambling sites because U.S. banks had stopped processing such transactions as early as 2001. Thus, gamblers already on the still-open-for-business private sites could simply continue playing. Those with accounts on sites closed to U.S. business simply needed to transfer whatever money remained with those sites to their Neteller accounts and then transfer the money again to an account with an open site (see BusinessWeek.com, 10/19/06 "Online Gambling Goes Underground"). Riskier Environment

Indeed, sites that remained open in the U.S. by processing payments through Neteller and other services experienced a jump in enrollment, thanks to reduced competition from PartyGaming's sites. While PartyPoker.com saw a 67% drop in its numbers between September and October, when the company withdrew from the U.S. market, FullTiltPoker.com had a 42% increase in audience, according to a November report by Nielsen//NetRatings (NTRT). The site's audience increased to 939,000 in December from 751,000 in November. The total U.S. audience for the top gambling sites, however, decreased 56%.

Meanwhile, PokerStars.com saw its audience jump to 1.5 million U.S. users in December from 1.4 million in November. Bodog.com saw an increase to 771,000 in December from 728,000 in November. Even PartyPoker saw an increase, as U.S. users figured out how to get around the ban on the sites. The company's U.S. audience increased to 1.3 million in December from 1.18 million in November, according to Nielsen//NetRatings.

Without Neteller to process payments, the sites will have to rely more on other, smaller payment processors such as Instant eChecks and ePassporte to process U.S. transactions. However, now that the government has shown it is willing to go after payment processors, that would be risky. In addition, online gamblers may be more skittish about betting now that the state of their funds is in flux. Eleventh-Hour Reprieve?

So far, Neteller says it has not stopped processing U.S. transactions, and it is not clear how the action against the company could affect U.S. customers. Similarly, it is not clear whether the gaming sites are considering dropping Neteller from their list of approved payment services. As of late in the evening on Jan. 16, neither PokerStars.com nor FullTiltPoker.com had taken Neteller off of their lists of approved services. There hands will be tied, however, if Neteller does in fact decide not to process U.S. gambling transactions.

Even if Neteller chooses to leave the U.S. market, however, it would not spell the end for all gambling companies. To date, U.S. law enforcement action has centered on sports betting. Other executives who have been arrested, such as BETonSPORTS Chief Executive David Carruthers, were involved in companies that processed U.S. sports bets (see BusinessWeek.com, 7/19/06, "Justice Gambles on Net Crackdown"). There is still a chance that online poker will receive a reprieve from the new law, which does not explicitly ban poker. Indeed, several U.S. land-based casinos have expressed interest in starting their own online poker sites that would be regulated by U.S. law, in a sign that not all hope is lost for the cause of U.S. online gambling.

Indicted Senator Seeks Case Dismissal (KNOXNS/AP)

By Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), January 17, 2007

CHATTANOOGA - Indicted state Sen. Jerry Cooper contends in court filings aimed at getting his federal mail fraud, bank fraud and conspiracy case dismissed that law enforcement officials coached grand jury witnesses.

Cooper, D-Morrison, is accused of using a fraudulent appraisal and political influence to help an Alabama businessman get a loan from a bank co-owned by then-Lt. Gov. John Wilder in a borrowing scheme involving the 1999 sale of Cooper's lumber mill in Warren County.

Cooper's attorney, Jerry Summers of Chattanooga, has requested government evidence that he believes is grounds for dismissing the charges because of prosecutorial misconduct, court records show.

Summers declined to comment, saying his "motion speaks for itself."

"We're still in the process of trying to get more and more of the evidence as it keeps dribbling in," he said. "We'll address it at the proper time."

Records filed in the case show that Summers is awaiting evidence he expects will show that law enforcement officials coached witnesses in the case "to change their testimony" for a grand jury appearance.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary Humble declined comment about the pending case.

The documents were filed during an attempt by Cooper to postpone his March 5 trial until after the legislative session. Prosecutors are opposing a delay.

Court records show the charges were brought against Cooper after he obtained an appraisal that inflated the value of a lumber mill he was trying to sell by falsely claiming that the property contained a railroad spur.

The fraudulent appraisal by McMinnville real estate appraiser James Passons was used to acquire a $1.7 million loan for Alabama businessman Anthony Auyer to buy the property.

Records show that the loan likely would not have been approved without Wilder's help.

Auyer and his wife, Theresa Auyer, pleaded guilty to charges against them. Auyer is serving a 34-month prison sentence. Theresa Auyer is serving an 18-month sentence.

A jury acquitted Passons.

Another Blow For Pirro (AP)

By Jim Fitzgerald, Associated Press

AP, January 17, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. (AP) - The federal investigation of former Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro has branched out to include the jewelry business she set up while she was in office, a Pirro spokesman said Tuesday.

The spokesman, Pirro family friend Michael Edelman, said agents have begun questioning some of the people who bought the bead jewelry she made several years ago in what he said was an attempt to raise money for charity.

He said clerks, an assistant district attorney and others who were "around the courthouse" when Pirro was district attorney have been summoned by federal prosecutors and several were questioned Tuesday.

"They've subpoenaed a lot of the people who bought the beads," Edelman said.

He said he did not know specifically what interested the investigators, but he said Pirro was cooperating and had turned over all requested records.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia's spokesman Herb Hadad said he couldn't comment on an ongoing investigation.

Pirro acknowledged last year, while she was the Republican candidate for state attorney general, that she was under investigation for plotting to eavesdrop on her husband, Albert Pirro, in 2005, when she believed he was having an affair. She said she had sought help from disgraced former New York police Commissioner Bernard Kerik to plant a bug on the family boat, but she said she never went through with it and broke no law.

Jury Selection Starts In Coke Theft Case (NSDY/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Ap Business Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 17, 2007

ATLANTA -- One hundred potential jurors filed into a federal courtroom Tuesday for the start of the conspiracy trial of a former Coca-Cola secretary accused of stealing trade secrets from the world's largest beverage maker in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi.

The potential jurors answered questions from U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester about whether they work for or have relatives who work for Atlanta-based Coca-Cola, then filled out a questionnaire drafted by the lawyers in the case and were sent home for the day.

Individual questioning of potential jurors by the defense lawyers and prosecutors will begin Wednesday, and opening statements are scheduled for Monday. The trial is expected to last up to two weeks.

Joya Williams, who was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light, faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty. Two co-defendants have pleaded guilty to conspiracy, and at least one is expected to testify against her.

The questionnaire, a copy of which was provided to The Associated Press, asks the potential jurors about their educational background, whether they've held management jobs before, whether they've ever brought documents from their job to their home and whether they or their spouse has ever worked for The Coca-Cola Co. or any of its affiliates.

The questionnaire also asks potential jurors what magazines and newspapers they read, what television shows they watch regularly, whether they own Coca-Cola stock and what they know about this case.

Another question asks if the potential jurors drink Coca-Cola products such as Coke, Diet Coke, Fanta or Dasani and, if so, how often. The potential jurors won't be excluded on the basis of how they answer that question alone, said Williams' defense lawyer, Janice Singer.

Williams, Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson were indicted in July on the single federal charge of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from Coca-Cola and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged plans were foiled after Pepsi warned Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Singer has said she plans to attack the credibility of Dimson and Duhaney.

The two men served prison terms at the same time at a federal penitentiary in Montgomery, Ala. Duhaney served nearly five years of a seven-year sentence on a cocaine charge before being released in 2005; Dimson served less than one year of a two-year sentence on a bank fraud charge before his release in 2004.

Williams does not have a criminal record, another attorney who previously represented her has said.

But prosecutors say they have a strong case. That includes video surveillance showing Williams at her desk at Coke headquarters going through multiple files looking for documents and stuffing them into bags, according to court records. She also was observed holding a liquid container with a white label, which resembled the description of a new product sample, before placing it into her personal bag, prosecutors say.

The prosecution says a box containing two undisclosed product samples and other confidential company papers were found in Duhaney's home during a search on July 5, the day all three were arrested.

Coke has declined to give details about the samples, including which products they are for. The indictment only refers to a mysterious "Project N....."

Strip-club Owners Will Surrender On Tax Charges (PHI)

By John Sullivan

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 17, 2007

Two owners of the Philadelphia strip club Dangerous Curves agreed to turn themselves in to authorities this morning to face federal charges that they sought to avoid paying more than $300,000 in federal taxes, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office and a defendant's attorney.

The case grew out of the federal corruption probe into convicted City Councilman Rick Mariano, according to Rich Manieri, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan. Mariano was sentenced last summer to 61/2 years in prison for taking bribes to help navigate tax and regulatory issues. At some point during the two-year investigation, agents thought Mariano had an interest in the club, but he did not, court documents say.

Chris Warren, an attorney for club owner Kevin Rankin, said agents began looking into his client after suspecting that Mariano may have helped Rankin, his former high school football coach, win zoning for the club.

"That was also untrue," Warren said last night. Federal agents raided the Tacony strip club in October 2005 and arrested Rankin, 60, of Philadelphia, and co-owner Bishop Krabsz 59, of Cherry Hill, on gun charges after finding four firearms at the club and the men's homes. The men still face charges in connection with those arrests.

Now, however, they face a 40-count indictment charging that they hid more than $800,000 in income from 2000 to 2004, skirting a $200,000 tax bill. They are also accused of not paying $107,000 in payroll taxes.

"This was a deliberate deception by an accountant and his clients," Meehan said in a statement.

Also indicted yesterday was accountant Enrico Nardini, 67, of Boothwyn, who Meehan said filed false tax returns for the men.

The indictment says Reinaldo Pastrana, a developer who paid Mariano's gym fees in exchange for help on a city land deal, was a client of Nardini's, who underreported Pastrana's earnings by $150,000 for three years. Pastrana, who was sentenced to 21/2 years in prison in 2006 after pleading guilty in August to three counts of bribery in connection with the Mariano case, was not charged in yesterday's indictment.

Also named as defendants were businessmen James Sanford, 68, of Berlin, N.J.; William Lavan Sr., 73, of Ventnor, N.J.; and William Lavan Jr., 28, of Egg Harbor, N.J. They were charged with submitting false returns prepared with Nardini's help.

Warren, Rankin's attorney, questioned prosecutors' motive for going after his client.

"This is a face-saving move," Warren said.

"They went after them because they thought Mariano was involved, then for guns, and now, for tax evasion," Warren said. "We look forward to defending against these charges."

DOJ_NMG_0117513

Warren said Rankin and Krabsz would surrender to the FBI this morning. The men are expected to be arraigned at 1:30 p.m. in federal court in Philadelphia.

Regulators Investigate Commerce (PHI)

By Harold Brubaker

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 17, 2007

Shares in Commerce Bancorp Inc. fell more than 8 percent yesterday after the Cherry Hill company said it was under investigation by federal banking regulators.

The Office of the Comptroller of Currency and the Federal Reserve are looking into the company's transactions with directors, officers and related parties, "including deals involving banking premises," Commerce said deep in its fourth-quarter earnings report.

The disclosure, in a single paragraph, came just 10 weeks after it said an unrelated federal probe had ended.

For years, Commerce has disclosed in its annual proxy statements that it leases land for some of its 428 branches from a real estate firm partly owned by chairman and president Vernon W. Hill II and uses an architectural design firm owned by his wife.

The bank paid nearly $60 million from 1996 through 2005 to Hill's Site Development Inc. and Shirley Hill's InterArch Inc., both of Mount Laurel. In its April 2006 proxy, the bank said payments to the two companies were at market rates.

The investigation's inclusion of insider deals related to banking sites raises the possibility that investigators suspect additional, unreported transactions.

"There are always questions when an executive of a bank has something to do with outside companies that in turn do business with the bank," said Wilson L. Smith, director of financial services research at Boenning & Scattergood Inc., a West Conshohocken investment firm.

In the case of Commerce, Smith, who owns shares of the company, said he "would certainly hope that the auditors had taken a close look at these transactions over the years."

The comptroller's office would not comment on the case, because it "does not comment on individual bank matters," spokesman Kevin Mukri said.

In a conference call with investors and analysts to discuss the earnings, Commerce officials said they could not comment on the case. In the disclosure in the earnings report, the bank said it was cooperating with the federal agencies.

Commerce is no stranger to federal investigations, having been caught up in Philadelphia's pay-to-play scandal starting in June 2004.

Commerce's attempts to win Philadelphia city business after Mayor Street's election in 1999 brought the bank under the scrutiny of a federal probe of city contracting practices. Also, in the summer of 2005, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said the FBI had seized Commerce records to determine whether the bank had given municipal officials in the suburbs preferential treatment to win government business.

But the company said Nov. 1 that it was no longer being investigated by Meehan. Two of the company's former officers in Pennsylvania were convicted on corruption charges in 2005 and sentenced to prison.

Yesterday, Commerce shares lost $2.89, or 8.3 percent, on the New York Stock Exchange to $31.83.

Heather Wolf, a banking analyst with Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc., said in a research note that the current investigation was likely to "overhang the stock, if not pressure it further, until there is greater information in the marketplace."

As for Commerce's operations, Wolf said she was most concerned about the decline in the bank's deposit growth rate to 19 percent in the fourth quarter from more than 40 percent at its peak.

Commerce, whose hallmark has been gathering deposits from competitors by keeping late hours and operating seven days a week, reduced its long-term goal for increasing deposits to 20 percent from 24 percent to 26 percent a year.

Net income for 2006 was $315.1 million, or $1.63 a share, up 11 percent from $282.9 million, or $1.61 a share, the year before.

Fourth-quarter profit was $78.66 million, or 40 cents a share, up from $46.94 million, or 26 cents a share in the same period of 2005, when the company recorded a $19.3 million nonrecurring charge.

Hill said in a conference call with investors and analysts that the investigation would not get in the way of expansion plans.

He declined to say when the bank learned about the investigation.

2 Arrested In Molestation, Porn Cases (LAT)

From A Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117514

Authorities have announced arrests in separate child molestation and child pornography cases, one involving a website bulletin board used to trade illicit images of minors.

Jeffrey Blaine Hall, 51, subscribed to "North American Man Girl Love Assn." website, where he downloaded and posted child pornography, a federal criminal complaint alleges. Authorities announced the arrest Friday.

Hall is being held without bail at the downtown Metropolitan Detention Center, federal officials said.

In the second case, a Lancaster man was facing dozens of felony counts in state court after being accused of repeatedly molesting and taking explicit photographs of a young girl in his neighborhood.

Christopher Jarold Hoff, 41, also could face federal charges based on evidence seized from four home computers. Authorities also took dozens of movies and computer discs.

Hoff is being held on $5-million bail at Men's Central Jail in Los Angeles.

Ryan Trial Judge Went All Out To Be Fair, Prosecutors Say (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 17, 2007

CHICAGO - The judge who presided over former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial took "superlative care" to see that the proceedings were fair, prosecutors told a federal appeals court Tuesday.

In a 97-page response to Ryan's appeal, the government said U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer had worked hard and effectively to see that the former governor got a fair trial, and succeeded in doing so.

"During these proceedings, Judge Pallmeyer expressed no fewer than 12 times her view that the defendants' right to a fair trial was paramount and that, if fairness could not be achieved, she would not hesitate to declare a mistrial and start the trial over, despite the amount of time that had gone into the trial," prosecutors said.

Ryan, 72, was convicted in April along with longtime friend Larry Warner of racketeering and other offenses.

Ryan was accused of steering lucrative state leases and contracts to Warner and other cronies and receiving rewards ranging from vacations in Jamaica to a free golf bag. He also was accused of using state money and workers to operate his campaigns and burying an investigation of bribes paid in exchange for drivers licenses when he was secretary of state.

Ryan still maintains nothing he did was illegal. His appeal focuses heavily on the dismissal of two jurors, Evelyn Ezell and Robert Pavlick, who were found to have omitted mention on a pre-trial questionnaire of their encounters with police.

Pallmeyer replaced them with alternates after the jury already had deliberated eight times. But she did not replace other jurors when it was discovered that they too had brushes with the law on their records.

Prosecutors said Pallmeyer was right because Ezell and Pavlick's problems were substantially worse than those of the other jurors.

Prosecutors noted that at one time Ezell had been questioned by police and rather than giving her correct name identified herself as "Thora Jones." They said that plainly disqualified her from deliberating charges that Ryan lied when questioned by the FBI about alleged corruption.

"Acting with superlative care, the court made findings of fact that those two jurors, Pavlick and Ezell, and no others had been dishonest ... when honest answers would have been cause for dismissal," they said. They said "no other jurors met the standard for dismissal."

Ryan's attorneys had argued that the alternate jurors brought in as replacements for Pavlick and Ezell may have been biased by news stories.

But prosecutors took issue with that.

"The court meticulously ensured that the alternates had not been exposed to media coverage or other extraneous influences," they said.

They also brushed aside a defense argument that the action of a juror who found legal papers on the Internet and brought them into the jury room wrecked the deliberations.

"The material was consistent with the court's instructions and clearly did not burden the expression of jurors' views," they said. It said the judge was right "in concluding that there was no reasonable possibility that this material prejudiced the jury."

CIVIL LAW:

Insurers Get Backing At U.S. High Court On Credit-Reporting Law (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr

DOJ_NMG_0117515

Bloomberg, January 17, 2007

Jan. 16 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Supreme Court justices signaled they may limit the duty of insurance companies to tell consumers about flaws in their credit histories, questioning a ruling that insurers say would open them to billions of dollars in damages.

More than half the court's nine members today in Washington voiced support for arguments by Safeco Corp. and Berkshire Hathaway Inc.'s Geico Corp. The insurance companies are fighting class-action lawsuits by consumers who sought price quotes, weren't offered the lowest rates and now say they should have been told the insurer relied on their less-than-perfect credit histories. A federal appeals court let the case go forward.

Several justices questioned whether Congress intended for the Fair Credit Reporting Act to require notification of every consumer who doesn't get the best rate. Justice Stephen Breyer said an Internet search he conducted indicated that only 1 percent of Americans have the highest possible credit score.

``There will be tens of millions of these notices going out," Breyer told Scott A. Shorr, the lawyer for the consumers. Breyer predicted the notices ``will become meaningless" to consumers and most will go ``right in the wastebasket."

The insurance industry says the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals misinterpreted a provision in the federal law that requires disclosure only when a low credit score results in ``adverse action" by an insurer.

Insurers also say the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit made it far too easy for consumers to win large awards. The court said companies can be forced to pay penalties of at least $100 per customer when they violate the law based on an ``implausible" interpretation of its requirements.

Skeptical Justices

Some 2,600 lawsuits alleging violations of the fair-credit law are pending in federal courts, according to a filing by State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. in a related case.

Breyer was one of several justices who either suggested or directly said they disagreed with the lower court's interpretation of the ``adverse action" requirement. Justice David Souter joined Breyer in asking whether consumers might receive so many notices as to render them ``meaningless."

Justice Samuel Alito questioned Shorr's contention that the best possible rate should be the ``baseline" for determining whether notification is required. ``I don't understand where that comes from," Alito said.

Several justices said the statutory definition of ``adverse action" includes ``an increase in any charge" as opposed to simply a failure to get the lowest rate. Chief Justice John Roberts questioned whether, as Shorr argued, that definition would be met when an insurer cuts a customer's rate to something short of the company's lowest charge.

Blunt Scalia

Justice Antonin Scalia was even more blunt in questioning a Justice Department lawyer who offered partial support for the consumers' position.

``I find it hard to shoehorn your case into that language," Scalia told the government lawyer, Patricia A. Millett.

Shorr told the justices that ``charging someone more than you charge others is an increase." He said that interpretation squared with Congress's goal of protecting individuals from inaccurate credit-history information.

Seattle-based Safeco is fighting a class action suit filed in federal court in Oregon. The three representative plaintiffs include two customers whose cases center on their premiums -- one for auto insurance and one for renters insurance -- and a third who says her credit report was one reason Safeco wouldn't reinstate her auto policy after it lapsed.

Geico, which is based in Chevy Chase, Maryland, is also battling a class action suit in federal court in Oregon. The lead plaintiff, Ajene Edo, didn't get the company's lowest rate when she called for a quote in 2000.

State Farm and Hartford Financial Services Group Inc. are waging similar fights and have appeals pending at the high court.

Willfulness Questioned

The insurers' Supreme Court lawyer, Maureen Mahoney, argued that the 9th Circuit also misapplied a provision that subjects ``willful" violators to penalties ranging from $100 to $1,000 per consumer, plus punitive damages. The 9th Circuit said the willfulness requirement includes actions taken in ``reckless disregard" of the law.

Mahoney said that the term ``willful" encompasses only intentional wrongdoing and that the companies and their lawyers made a good-faith interpretation of the law -- one later adopted by the trial judge who handled the cases.

``They could not have known anything more about these statutory issues of first impression than the district court did," Mahoney said.

Several justices said Mahoney was going too far in restricting the statute. ``You're changing it to mean `willfully and blatantly' violating the law," Scalia said.

The court is scheduled to rule by July in the cases, Safeco v. Burr, 06-84, and Geico v. Edo, 06-100.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Department Won't Investigate Duke Lacrosse Prosecutor (AP)

AP, January 17, 2007

Officials from the Department of Justice have told a North Carolina congressman that it's too early to launch a federal investigation into the handling of the Duke lacrosse case, a spokeswoman said Tuesday.

Rep. Walter Jones wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last month, asking that the Department of Justice investigate whether the district attorney prosecuting three Duke lacrosse players charged with sexual assault has violated the athletes' civil rights.

The department's Office of Legislative Affairs responded last week that it was premature to initiate a federal investigation while criminal charges and other investigations at the state level are ongoing, said Cynthia J. Magnuson, a Department of Justice spokeswoman.

Jones' spokeswoman Kathleen Joyce said Tuesday that the congressman still planned to meet next week with the head of the department's Civil Rights Division.

"He doesn't consider the letter received as a final response," Joyce said. "He's still pushing forward."

In the letter to Gonzales, Jones asked that the conduct of Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong be reviewed.

Nifong turned the case over to state Attorney General Roy Cooper last week. The North Carolina State Bar has filed ethics charges accusing Nifong of making misleading and inflammatory comments about the lacrosse team.

Cooper's office took possession of all the files in the lacrosse case late Tuesday afternoon.

"Today we transferred to our office six boxes and two folders of files from the Durham District Attorneys Office," Cooper said in a statement. "Our attorneys will immediately begin examining this material. These files contain a substantial amount of information and we will work carefully to ensure a full and fair review."

Cooper said Saturday that two prosecutors in his office would review the files and interview witnesses in the case, including the accuser, before making a recommendation on how to proceed.

Officials from the Department of Justice have told a North Carolina congressman that it's too early to launch a federal investigation into the handling of the Duke lacrosse case.

Representative Walter Jones wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last month. He asked that the Department of Justice investigate whether the district attorney prosecuting three Duke lacrosse players has violated the athletes' civil rights.

The three players are charged with sexual assault and kidnapping.

The Justice Department's Office of Legislative Affairs responded last week that it was premature to initiate a federal investigation while criminal charges and other investigations at the state level are ongoing.

The state attorney general's office took possession of all Duke lacrosse files late Tuesday afternoon. Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong requested that a special prosecutor take over the case.

Justice Department Officially Ends Probe Of Santa Clara County Juvenile Hall (MERCN)

By Mary Anne Ostrom

The San Jose Mercury News, January 17, 2007

The U.S. Department of Justice has closed its three-year investigation into allegations of abuse and excessive force at Santa Clara County juvenile hall.

The department wrote in a letter, dated Tuesday, to Board of Supervisors Chairman Don Gage that after reviewing updated policies -- which give youth offenders due process when they file complaints or are disciplined for misbehavior and include improving the reporting of child abuse -- ``the county has satisfactorily addressed the deficiencies identified over the course of our investigation."

In September, the department had signaled that the county was on the right track, pending final review of the new policies.

The Justice Department also praised the county for working hard to resolve the original complaints and in the letter said the county is ``dedicated to providing the appropriate care for youth in their custody."

The original abuse investigation, launched in early 2003, led to sweeping changes and dramatic reductions in use of force at juvenile hall and created more independent oversight.

Student Now Wants $2M For School Scuffle, Federal Charges Against Officer (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, January 17, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A lawsuit seeking damages from a Greenwood police officer and others after school security cameras captured the officer twice drawing his weapon on a teenager in front of classmates has been doubled to $2 million.

Carlos Moore, the attorney for 18-year-old James Marshall, had earlier sought $1 million in damages after obtaining the school videotapes that show a portion of the Dec. 6 encounter between the white officer, Casey Wiggins, and the unarmed black teenager.

The case has sparked accusations of racism and calls for Wiggins' dismissal. Wiggins' attorney says the officer did "nothing wrong."

Moore obtained copies of the tapes on Jan. 5, after filing a motion with the court. The tapes show Wiggins, who was on a security detail at the predominantly black school, twice pointing his gun at Marshall - once in a crowded school hall - before putting the teen in a choke hold.

Moore told The Associated Press on Tuesday that he's expanded the civil lawsuit to include Greenwood High School, school Principal Percy Powell and Superintendent Leslie Daniels.

Margaret Dean, a spokeswoman for the Greenwood Public School District, said Tuesday that school officials would have no comment because of the pending litigation.

The Mississippi chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union on Monday issued statement supporting legal action "in seeking justice for the Marshall family."

Wiggins, 26, Greenwood Police Chief Henry Harris, Greenwood Mayor Sheriel Perkins and the city of Greenwood had already been named in the lawsuit.

Messages left with the mayor's officer and the police department on Tuesday were not immediately returned.

Moore said he had planned to file a separate civil suit against the school, but decided to lump the complaints together and seek twice as much money because of the detrimental emotional impact the scuffle had on his client.

Marshall's "emotional condition is steadily deteriorating," Moore said. "He's getting worse instead of better. He's withdrawn and hasn't been eating much."

Moore also filed a federal criminal complaint this week with the U.S Justice Department, accusing Wiggins of violating Marshall's civil rights with excessive force and false arrest under the color of law.

State charges had already been filed in the case, but Moore said those were only misdemeanor simple assault charges and did not fit the crime. The federal charges are felonies.

"This is a serious crime ... and we want him prosecuted for a felony," Moore said.

Wiggins' attorney, Mitchell Creel, said Tuesday he was not aware that Marshall was seeking federal criminal charges.

"Obviously, I feel like those charges hold no more water than ... the simple assault charges already pending," Creel said. "As I indicated earlier, I look forward to a court date where Officer Wiggins will be exonerated of the charges so he can get on with his life because in this case he has done nothing wrong."

Meanwhile, Moore tried to derail revelations this week that his teenage client was allegedly involved in a robbery in June of 2006, saying the charges were filed in juvenile court and should not have become public knowledge.

Marshall was accused along with another youth of stealing an $80 necklace from another teen, Moore said. Moore said he is concerned Greenwood officials could push the case into adult court as revenge over the lawsuit.

"My client will be vindicated," Moore said. "Marshall will not back down from his civil suit or his state and federal criminal complaints filed against Wiggins and the Greenwood Police Department."

A message left with the district attorney's office was not immediately returned.

Marshall claims he was standing in the hall at the school Dec. 6 showing his new tattoo - his name on his left forearm - when he was accosted by Wiggins for no reason.

Wiggins' police report says the officer saw Marshall and two other students in the hall standing in a circle, "looking at something the suspect was holding."

The officer claims that when he approached, Marshall became "hostile" and began to struggle.

Inmate's Body Returned To Family; Death Still A Mystery (WILNJ)

Family demanding answers from Department of Correction

Family members of the 24-year-old Dover man who was found dead in the state's newest prison infirmary last week are demanding answers about the death, and getting nothing but silence from the Department of Correction.

Demetrius Caldwell had been undergoing unspecified treatment for a month in the prison infirmary at the Delaware Correctional Center in Smyrna before he was found dead, laying on a mattress on the floor of his cell.

A medical staffer had checked on him 25 minutes before he died.

The Department of Correction has released Caldwell's body to his family, who plan to bury him Saturday, but they have not told them what caused the young man's death.

"It's mind-blowing. They won't even tell us why he died," said uncle Lionel Dixon. "He was a healthy young man, who was getting ready to get out. They had him in the infirmary for a month, and they don't know how he died? They know. They're just not saying."

Dixon viewed his nephew's body at the funeral home, and was shocked by what he saw.

"They cut his head and chest all open, and they don't tell us how he died? That's brutal, man. That's cruel and brutal," he said. "They're not saying anything and they're hoping we don't either."

Calls to Correction Commissioner Stan Taylor and Chief Medical Examiner Dr. Richard T. Callery were not returned today.

Prison officials ruled out meningococcal meningitis as the cause of death late last week, after naming it as a possibility. They've said doctors from the prison's medical provider, St. Louis-based Correctional Medical Services, the Department of Correction, Public Health and the Medical Examiner's Office are still trying to determine a cause of death.

All of Caldwell's family described him as a healthy young man with no known medical issues. Caldwell had been an inmate since Nov. 6 for violating his probation on a 2005 drug charge, to which he pleaded guilty. Nearly half of his incarceration was spent in the infirmary.

Another uncle, Joe Caldwell, said he was contacted a week before his nephew's death by a prison staffer he has known for years.

"He said my nephew was spitting at female guards and cussing male guards in the infirmary," Joe Caldwell said. "He told me they were tired of him, and that they can hurt him."

Joe said his nephew was not allowed visitors, phone calls or even clothes.

"His dad, my brother, is blaming himself because of that warning," Joe Caldwell said. "He feels there's more he could have done."

Demetrius' sister Dominique Caldwell said she'd been told her brother was taken to the infirmary for a psychiatric evaluation.

"But he was only seen by one psychiatrist, one time, in a month -- one time in 30 days," she said. "They never notified us he was even ill."

Dominique said the family had scheduled numerous visits, but all of them were canceled by prison officials at the last minute.

"We drove out there to see him several times, but were told we couldn't see him," she said. "People called us as said we needed to check on him. He was a healthy boy when he went into prison."

The family knew Demetrius as "Dumpy."

"He was always fond of his grandma's homemade dumplings," said aunt Juliette Caldwell. "Of all the people in our family, he was so sweet. He has a good, loving family. His parents have been together for years, and his sister cares about him."

Dominique said her brother enjoyed video games, nice sneakers and drawing.

"I miss him already," she said. "A 24-year-old man shouldn't have died in a manner of minutes."

Last month, the U.S. Justice Department found "substantial civil rights violations" in four Delaware prisons. The federal investigation was prompted by a series of articles in The News Journal that revealed inadequate health care and questionable treatment within the prisons.

The state signed an 87-point settlement with the Justice Department, ending the investigation but setting up Contact investigative reporter Lee Williams at 324-2362 or lwilliams@delawareonline.com.

Texas District Says DOJ Oversight Is Unlawful (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 16, 2007

The small utility district on the outskirts of Austin, Texas, had a simple wish: to move its polling place from a residence to a school.

It may have been simple, but it wasn't easy. The move needed approval from the Justice Department in Washington.

As it happens, the Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District No. 1 (population 3,500) is one of the areas of the country required by federal law to get permission from the government before making any changes to its voting rules.

Now the utility district — with the help of some conservative legal firepower — has decided to mount the most significant assault on the Voting Rights Act in a quarter of a century.

The case, filed last year in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, argues that the federal government's oversight of local voting rules is unconstitutional. And it was selected and prepared with one goal in mind, to get the issue before the Supreme Court. Unsurprisingly, it's drawing attention from civil-rights groups, who fear the wolf is at the door. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, for instance, has hired former Clinton administration solicitor general Seth Waxman to fend off the challenge.

The suit targets the section of the act — which Congress overwhelmingly voted to reauthorize last summer — that requires certain counties and states to seek federal approval before making changes to their voting rules. Known as "pre-clearance," the section was one of the ways the federal government prevented Southern states from continuing to discriminate against African-Americans after the landmark civil-rights legislation passed in 1965.

But the federal government only oversees certain states and counties, the ones that most egregiously suppressed minority voting during the 1964 election. The jurisdictions under such federal authority have remained virtually unchanged, except for a few additions in the 1970s.

"Our primary thing is, when they reauthorized the act this time, nobody went back and said, 'Let's update the test,' " says Gregory Coleman, a partner at Weil, Gotshal & Manges, where he is representing the Texas district pro bono. "What are jurisdictions doing in 2004 and 2006?"

Coleman and other conservatives see the continued oversight as an overreach of federal power. For the federal government to apply a rule to an entity that has no history of discrimination is "arbitrary and irrational," Coleman wrote in his Aug. 4 complaint, and it "infringes on the rights of an entire generation of voters who were not even alive when those discriminatory practices were ended."

As Edward Blum, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute working with Coleman, puts it, "Congress didn't want to make a very hard political argument that one of the provisions of the Voting Rights Act may have outlived its usefulness."

They are hoping that the case will end the federal oversight — or at least force Congress to revise which areas are covered.

But Coleman and Blum are up against the weight of history. The Supreme Court has upheld the pre-clearance provision twice — once in the 1966 case South Carolina v. Katzenbach and again 14 years later in City of Rome v. United States.

"Overwhelming evidence suggests that racial discrimination in elections still exists and still needs to be addressed by the federal government," says David Becker, an attorney with People for the American Way, whose organization has intervened against the case. Other groups that have entered the fray include the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, and the American Civil Liberties Union.

Such opposition is hardly surprising. More than almost any other piece of legislation in recent time, the Voting Rights Act is synonymous with civil rights. Historians have pointed to it as the foundation of the "quiet revolution" against deep-rooted voting discrimination across the South.

"This has been a source of considerable constitutional controversy since it was first enacted," says Samuel Issacharoff, a New York University law professor. "These are very hefty positions, each of which has a constitutional pedigree."

The district line

The Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District is a 700-square-mile swath of suburban tract housing on the edge of Austin. It was formed in 1988 by a Texas developer to build bond-financed sewage and water lines in what was then an undeveloped neighborhood.

Elections to the five-person utility board were not heavily contested until 2002. By then, the neighborhood had grown from barely a dozen residents to more than 3,500, and the homeowners association had grown weary of the developer-backed board. Residents accused the utility district's attorney of suppressing voter turnout by holding utility-board elections in a different location — a resident's home — than the citywide elections. "We had an attorney who had some conflicts of interests," says Donald Zimmerman, a board member.

That year, the candidates backed by the homeowners association swept out the sitting board. Zimmerman, who works at a local car dealership, became president. His first act: to move the polls from the residential house to a local school, where all of the other municipal elections are held.

It was then the rookie board members learned about pre-clearance. "We've never done anything to discriminate against anyone, so we don't know why we are subject to it," says William Ferguson, now president of the board.

Indeed, the district was hardly a microcosm of the city. For one, residents are nearly 80 percent white. The single biggest minority by far is Asian — not Hispanic or African-American — and the neighborhood's median income is nearly double that of the average Austin resident. But the district's lawyer saw no way out of the federal oversight, so the board forked over $1,250 in legal fees and, within a few months, won approval from the Justice Department.

Zimmerman wasn't pleased with the situation, but in 2002 the district had more pressing legal problems. He believed the city of Austin was overcharging the district's residents in property taxes, but lawyer after lawyer turned his idea down. Taking on Austin, they told him, was too "politically charged," Zimmerman says.

Then he found Coleman. Zimmerman says Coleman took one look at the Austin tax issue and said he would take the case for free because he believed they were right. "I was just stunned," Zimmerman says. "Most people have to have monetary incentives or something. He took it because he's an incredibly honest guy."

A true believer

Coleman, 43, has long had an interest in litigation over the scope of federal power. A 1992 graduate of the University of Texas School of Law, he clerked for Judge Edith Hollen Jones of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit and, later, for Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. He headed into private practice but remained an active member of the Federalist Society.

In 1997, Coleman met Blum, a one-time investment banker turned political activist who had organized a series of lawsuits against racial gerrymandering across the country. One of those cases, Bush v. Vera, challenged the use of race in creating the Houston congressional district where Blum lost to an African-American incumbent. Blum won at the Supreme Court.

Blum had expanded his legal interests to other race-related cases and wanted to challenge a Houston school district's racial preferences for its gifted and talented program. He found Coleman to file suit. Just days before the case was set for trial, the school district dropped its race-based policy, ending the suit. In 1999, Coleman joined then-Texas Attorney General John Cornyn (now a U.S. senator) as solicitor general, where he unsuccessfully — and somewhat ironically — defended the state's affirmative-action policy at the University of Texas before the 5th Circuit.

In 2001, Coleman turned back to private practice at Weil, Gotshal in Austin, where he developed a reputation as an up-and-coming Supreme Court lawyer.

But he was no stranger to Washington, either. Cornyn, who was elected to the Senate in 2002, called Coleman to testify in 2004 about potential legal ramifications of the Federal Marriage Amendment. So it was no surprise that when the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which Cornyn is a member, began debating the Voting Rights Act last spring, Coleman was called in to testify once again.

His point was simple: if pre-clearance remained intact, it would face a constitutional test. "I believe that it is unnecessary, unfair, and that it would probably be unconstitutional," he testified in May.

Though some conservative Republicans voiced opposition to pre-clearance, they were in the minority. Other proposed changes to the renewed Voting Rights Act gave conservatives like Coleman another reason to oppose its passage. New language essentially rewrote portions of the law that the Supreme Court in two cases had recently found to be unconstitutional.

When Coleman returned to Texas, he asked Zimmerman if the district would be willing to challenge the constitutionality of pre-clearance. He explained how counties and states can ask the Justice Department to drop them from the list of pre-clearance areas if they can prove a significant period without discrimination. Few counties had actually done so and the Texas utility district cannot.

Despite the fact that in the district's nearly 20-year history it had easily won pre-clearance all eight times it asked for it, the district was restricted from applying for an exemption because it did not register its own voters, relying instead on the countywide voter lists. Technically, the case would ask for a simple exemption from federal oversight, but because it's unlikely the case would succeed, Coleman told them, they needed to make a constitutional claim.

In Coleman's mind, the district's lack of options made the case a winner. It couldn't get out from under government oversight, even if it could prove that it no longer discriminated. Zimmerman was interested. After all, the one-time state-representative hopeful was no fan of big government and had run two local anti-tax campaigns. He brought the idea to the board. At first, the community was reluctant. "A number of people on the board were concerned," says Ferguson, the board president. "This community doesn't want to be tainted as against voter rights or discriminating in any way."

But on June 14, Coleman spoke to the board, which then unanimously agreed to sue the Justice Department. A little more than a month later, Congress voted in favor of reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act.

Less discrimination?

To make its case, the district is relying on a 1997 Supreme Court ruling in a dispute that originated less than 100 miles southwest of Austin. In City of Boerne v. Flores, the Court struck down the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993, saying Congress went beyond its authority in granting religious groups an exception to local laws.

The Flores ruling has been successfully used in other cases at the high court by conservatives challenging federal laws on disability rights and violence against women. Coleman hopes to extend that jurisprudence to race in the voting context.

Certainly, fewer jurisdictions discriminate, he says, pointing to Justice Department figures. Between 1968 and 2004, the Justice Department rejected only 1,116 proposed changes to local voting rules nationwide — less than 1 percent of the total proposals. What's more, Coleman says that since 1982, there have been more violations of the Voting Rights Act in jurisdictions without federal oversight than in those with oversight He points to a 2006 University of Michigan study that found that, of the 211 successful voting-rights lawsuits filed since 1982, 53.5 percent were in areas outside federal oversight.

But civil-rights organizations say pre-clearance is still a central part of making the law function, especially as a deterrent. "Every time I represent a state or local government, when they are getting ready to make voting change, the first question is, 'How will this affect minorities?' " says J. Gerald Hebert, a former Justice Department lawyer representing Travis County, which includes Austin, in the suit. "That's a good thing."

He points to a study last year by civil-rights groups, which found that Texas jurisdictions scrapped voting changes in 54 cases after officials realized the alterations would fail federal scrutiny. And they cite one instance in which a federal court found that between 1976 and 2002, South Dakota had put 600 laws on the books but submitted only 10 percent of them for pre-clearance.

And those districts under federal authority can request a bailout. Hebert says that since 1982, 13 counties — all in Virginia — have done so successfully. Hebert should know — he represented them.

The Texas case is expected to be heard this summer by a special three-judge panel from the district and appellate courts, which is part of the required process for any jurisdiction applying for an exemption. Meanwhile, Blum has been meeting with other local government officials who are interested in filing similar suits and trying to figure out "what it is we need to do to win this case," he says.

Lawmakers, Advocacy Groups Launch Last-Ditch Effort To Save Two Border Patrol Agents From Jail (FOX)

Fox News, January 17, 2007

Two Texas Border Patrol agents who shot a Mexican drug runner in the backside on the U.S. side of the border are hoping a last-ditch pardon from President Bush will save them from serving more than a decade in prison.

Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean are scheduled to turn themselves in to authorities Wednesday to begin serving 11 and 12 years, respectively, for the February 2005 non-fatal shooting.

Several groups, including Friends of the Border Patrol, The Minutemen and Grassfire.org, have been trying through petitions to keep the agents out of prison — through either a motion to U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone to allow them to remain free on bond during an appeal or through a presidential pardon from Bush. About a dozen rallies took place across the country in support of the agents last week.

"Grassroots support for these gentlemen is just through the roof," said Grassfire.org spokesman Ron De Jong. He said people signing the petitions are saying to themselves, "'something just doesn't add up' and they're starting to make great waves."

"We are extremely hopeful that the light of justice will shine and this wrong will be right, because otherwise it would be an absolute travesty if these gentlemen had to go to jail for doing their jobs," De Jong added.

Compean and Ramos were found guilty in a jury trial of violating the civil rights of Osvaldo Aldrete Davila when they shot him in Fabens, Texas, about 30 miles east of El Paso, then tampering with evidence by picking up shell casings from the shooting.

The ex-agents say Davila had a gun, and that's why they fired at him, but a gun was never found.

In exchange for his testimony against the two agents, Davila was granted immunity from prosecution by the U.S. government for attempting to smuggle nearly 750 pounds of marijuana — which had a street value of over $1 million — into the United States on the day he was shot.

DOJ_NMG_0117522

Several lawmakers, including Reps. Ted Poe, R-Texas; Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif.; Walter Jones, R-N.C.; Tom Tancredo, R-Colo.; and Duncan Hunter, R-Calif. last week sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to allow Ramos and Compean to remain free on bond pending the appeal of their convictions.

The letter also notes that several "discrepancies" in the government's case question whether justice has been served and that permitting Ramos and Compean to be jailed puts their lives at risk.

Petitions with more than 225,000 signatures will be delivered to the White House Tuesday afternoon, Poe told FOX News.

"Based on my experience as a former judge, I have looked at this case and our federal government was on the wrong side," Poe said Tuesday.

"They took the side of a drug dealer over the side of the border agents who were just doing their job. Prosecute the border agents and let the criminal go free," he said. "Injustice has occurred, so I think that both of these men who were convicted deserve to be pardoned by the president."

Earlier this month, a letter circulated by Poe and signed by 24 lawmakers requested that the Justice Department not oppose a motion filed to allow the men to remain free pending the appeal.

But Poe said he hasn't heard much from the Oval Office.

"We have been getting some information from low-level members of the attorney general's office," he said. "The White House has not contacted us directly, even though we corresponded with them several times and have called. I'm a little concerned about that."

White House: Look at the Facts

Last month, Bush issued 16 year-end pardons: Five cases involved drug crimes, while others involved bank fraud, mail fraud and the acceptance of a kickback.

In September 2005 the president pardoned 14 people, including a member of the mineworkers union who was convicted for his role in bombings at a West Virginia coal mine; a counterfeiter; several dealers of marijuana and LSD; and a bootlegger.

The president has pardoned 113 people since taking office in 2001.

White House spokesman Tony Snow last week would not comment specifically on pardon proceedings, but he said the facts presented in court showed that Ramos and Compean tried to cover up what occurred.

Apparently, when they tried to pull over Davila, someone pulled out a gun and a scuffle ensued, Snow said. Davila got out of the car and tried to run away, and the agents fired about 14 shots at him — one of which hit him in the "fleshy hindquarters," as Snow said.

Avila then made his way into Mexico, where the agents say a van picked him up.

"Now, at the time this happened, they did not know if he was an illegal. They did not know that there were 700 pounds of marijuana. They didn't know any of those things. But instead you had this," Snow said.

"They also had received arms training the day before; that said, if you have an incident like this, you must preserve the evidence and you must report it promptly. Instead, according to court documents, they went around and picked up the shell casings. Furthermore, they asked one of their colleagues also to help pick up shell casings. They disposed of them."

Ramos and Compean were convicted on 11 of 12 counts.

"The facts of this case are such that I would invite everybody to take a full look at the documented record," Snow said. "This is not the case of the United States saying, 'We are not going to support people who go after drug dealers.' Of course, we are. We think it's incumbent to go after drug dealers, and we also think that it's vitally important to make sure that we provide border security so our people are secure.

"We also believe that the people who are working to secure that border themselves obey the law."

He added: "I do think that there's been a characterization that somehow the government is turning a blind eye toward the law in enforcing the law."

Agent Says He Did Nothing Wrong

Compean, a married man with three children ages 12, 2 and 4 months — all of whom have been living with relatives since the incident — told FOXNews.com he's not even worried so much about whether he will get the pardon but what will happen to his family when he's gone.

"We've basically lost everything — all we have left is our car," he said, adding that his wife hasn't been working since she had their last child.

Compean has been going to school at El Paso Community College, pursuing an education degree on a GI bill; he served in the U.S. Navy from 1994 to 1999.

While he said the judge in the case had no choice but to go along with the sentence and abide by federal gun laws, Compean said Border Patrol agents are trained when to use their weapons, and firing their weapons was warranted in this case.

DOJ_NMG_0117523

"That's what we're trained to do — we see somebody armed — they're obviously not going to surrender, as what was stated in court, that he was trying to surrender and he was simply trying to get home. That wasn't the case," he said.

Compean said his case is already causing other agents to be hesitant on the job.

"A lot of the other agents coming in now, they are afraid. They're afraid of drawing their weapons," he said, adding that a firearms instructor told him recently that he was asked by a student whether he had to wait until he was shot at before he drew his weapon.

"That's what's going on now. A lot of people are afraid to and I know they've been trained [to think] it hasn't affected morale and I know it has," he added.

Asked whether he would ever consider going back to being a Border Patrol agent if allowed, Compean, who spent five years on the job before the Davila shooting, said he's not sure.

"I would like to, just because I enjoy doing the job, but if it's going to mean having to be questioned every time I draw my weapon, then there's no way. That's going to get somebody killed. It may not be me but another agent — they're going to be hesitating."

Court Lets IBM Pension Plan Stand (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Supreme Court let stand a lower court ruling that said International Business Machines Corp.'s switch to a cash-balance pension plan didn't discriminate against older workers, ending a lawsuit that could have cost the company $1.4 billion.

The Supreme Court's decision adds additional certainty to the legality of corporate shifts from defined-benefit pensions to so-called cash-balance retirement plans.

Congress last year also clarified the legality of the plans, but the IBM case could have bearing on a number of corporate retirement plans altered prior to the June 29, 2005 effective date in the legislation.

The class-action lawsuit against IBM was filed by older employees who claimed the company's 1999 retirement benefit changes amounted to illegal age discrimination under federal pension laws.

Cash-balance plans accrue value much like a savings account with regular contributions. They are paid out to employees whenever they leave a company rather than at retirement. Two employees who, regardless of age, work for the same number of years will receive the same benefit. But a younger worker can over time accrue more benefits than an older worker starting in the plan because they have more years before retirement.

IBM's switch to the plan prompted the filing of a class-action lawsuit by two workers. The lawsuit covers about 250,000 current and former employees, court filings said.

A U.S. District Court ruled the plan violated the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, prompting a $1.4 billion settlement that hinged on the outcome of appeals. The Seventh U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the lower court in August 2006 in a decision that said the IBM plan didn't discriminate.

"IBM's pension plan plainly discriminates on the basis of age," attorneys for the workers said in the appeal. "Millions of workers are subject to pension plans similar to that at issue in this case and the Seventh Circuit's misapplication of ERISA's nondiscrimination mandate threatens to deprive them of its essential protection."

IBM's pension plan said the Seventh Circuit decision correctly validated its cash-balance plan. "The court stressed that IBM's cash balance formula is age-neutral," attorneys for the IBM plan said.

The case is Cooper v. IBM personal Pension Plan.

Tuesday's announcement will not change IBM's plans to eliminate its cash-balance plan Jan. 1, 2008. IBM announced in January 2006 that it will eliminate the plan and enhance its 401(k) plan.

Issues Left Unresolved On Pensions (NYT)

By Mary Williams Walsh

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

The Supreme Court’s decision yesterday not to hear arguments that I.B.M. illegally discriminated on the basis of age when it changed its traditional pension plan in the 1990s saves I.B.M. a significant amount of money. But it resolves almost nothing for the many other companies that made similar changes to their own pension plans.

DOJ_NMG_0117524

I.B.M. and the current and former workers who filed the lawsuit had previously reached a settlement in which the plaintiffs would receive $320 million to settle certain legal questions. But had the workers also won on the central question of age discrimination, I.B.M. would have had to pay them an additional $1 billion.

But experts said they did not expect a stampede of companies to start changing their pension plans in light of I.B.M.'s success.

"It's not as clear as it would have been three or four years ago that a green light would mean a rush of traffic through the intersection," said Mark Iwry, a former Treasury official in charge of pension policy.

Too much has changed in the pension industry for that, said Mr. Iwry, now a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, a research organization in Washington. In the seven years since the pension dispute first erupted at I.B.M., companies have gone from showing healthy pension surpluses to suffering painful pension shortfalls. Companies have also heard from investors, regulators and employees angry about pension accounting maneuvers and demanding greater clarity.

The Financial Accounting Standards Board, increasingly concerned about flaws in the pension standards, is now in the process of writing new rules aimed at ending some of the gimmickry and showing much more clearly whether companies can really afford the benefits they have promised their workers.

Along with these changes, Mr. Iwry said he was also seeing a broad shift in attitude among the thousands of companies that offer their workers traditional pensions. In the past, he said, such companies were generally loath to shut their pension plans, and they did so only when their survival hung in the balance.

"But that taboo has to some degree been broken," he said. Today, even healthy companies are sometimes freezing their pension plans, he said. They are making their decisions on the basis of what their competitors are doing, and "unfortunately traditional pensions over all are in decline," he said.

I.B.M. itself makes a good example. In January 2006, it announced plans to freeze the pension plan that gave rise to the lawsuit, citing the need to keep its compensation costs on par with the rest of its industry. When a company freezes a pension plan, its workers keep the benefits they have earned until that date, but they no longer build bigger benefits with each new year of service. When the freeze goes into effect, in 2008, workers at I.B.M. will get 401(k) benefits instead. The company has not reported any difficulty recruiting new workers as a result.

Typically, the people who most value a pension plans are not new hires, but the workers nearing retirement. This is why changes in pension plans so often draw complaints about age discrimination.

The type of pension plan at the heart of the I.B.M. lawsuit is known as a cash balance plan. The plans became widespread in the 1990s when many pension plans were showing surplus assets. The cash balance design gave companies a way to reduce their pension liability to older employees, who in traditional plans earned the biggest part of their benefits in their later years. In the new design, liabilities grow at a steady rate over the years, but often do not reach the heights of the defined-benefit plans they have replaced.

Moreover, many companies with cash balance plans found that when they reduced their pension liability, the accounting rules gave them a boost to their bottom line.

Such pensions have given rise to lawsuits at a number of companies, but the I.B.M. case was the most closely watched because of the company's size, the large amount of money at stake, and the initial victory the employees had won at the federal trial court level, in 2003.

In that trial, the federal judge not only found I.B.M.'s pension changes illegal, but he reasoned that cash balance plans inherently discriminated on the basis of age — no matter which company put them in place.

This opinion, which angered many employers, was overturned by an appellate panel in Chicago that said that terms of the plan were "age neutral." The I.B.M. plaintiffs had hoped to persuade the Supreme Court to reverse that decision.

"For I.B.M., for I.B.M.'s employees and for I.B.M.'s retirees, this sort of closes a book and produces certainty," said Dallas L. Salisbury, president of the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a nonpartisan research center in Washington.

But Mr. Salisbury said the I.B.M. case offered no one-size-fits-all answers. He pointed to a number of other lawsuits involving cash balance pension plans in other parts of the country, and said the plaintiffs in those cases were often disputing other issues or using different legal arguments and strategies.

In the Second Circuit, which covers New York State, Connecticut and Vermont, several lawsuits are still pending at the trial court level. Some courts have issued rulings that favor the employers, while some seem to favor the employees.

"Others will have to wait and see what happens with court cases that haven't been decided yet, or even to see if someone still sues them," Mr. Salisbury said.

For companies wondering whether they should set up cash balance pension plans, the Pension Protection Act — the far-reaching package of pension law amendments signed by President Bush last summer — offers some legal certainty. The act states that companies that convert to cash balance plans after June 30, 2005, cannot be held liable for age discrimination as long as they pass certain basic tests. The tests are intended to protect older workers from the benefit erosion that occurs when employers freeze more senior workers' pension accruals for a period of time as the new plan goes into effect. This erosion is known among pension specialists as "wearaway."

After the Pension Protection Act became law, the Internal Revenue Service began writing the regulations needed to administer it. The I.R.S. also announced in December that it was ending its longstanding moratorium on approvals of pension conversions to the cash-balance format. The I.R.S. normally helps companies make sure any changes in their pension plans are legal.

In 1999, amid Congressional hearings and suits on cash balance pensions, the I.R.S. stopped issuing those letters when companies adopted the cash balance design. That has compounded the uncertainty for the roughly 1,200 companies that adopted such plans from 1999 to 2005.

Supreme Court Refuses To Hear Two IBM Employment Cases (AP)

By Christopher S. Rugaber, The Associated Press

AP, January 17, 2007

The Supreme Court on Tuesday refused to consider an appeal brought by a group of IBM Corp. employees who accused the company of age discrimination when it altered its pension plan. The lawsuit could have cost the company $1.4 billion.

The Court also declined to rule on a separate dispute between IBM and a former employee who accused the company of retaliating against him after he complained about how company managers handled overtime.

In the pension case, a former IBM employee named Kathi Cooper served as the lead plaintiff in a class action suit brought on behalf of 250,000 current and former IBM workers. The suit argued that IBM's "cash balance" pension plan was discriminatory because it allowed younger workers to accrue benefits in the plan at a faster rate than older workers.

IBM switched to a cash balance plan in 1999. Such plans provide workers with individual accounts that can be cashed out when they leave the company and are intended to appeal to younger workers who are more likely to switch jobs.

The IBM case has been closely watched, as roughly 1,500 companies have adopted cash-balance plans. The company earlier agreed to settle the case for $1.4 billion if it lost in the courts.

But the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, based in Chicago, sided with IBM in August, ruling that the "terms of IBM's plan are age-neutral."

In addition, Congress passed legislation, also in August, that clarified that cash-balance plans complied with the age discrimination provisions of ERISA, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act.

Cooper's lawyers argued in court papers that the legislation applied only to future cash-balance plans and did not affect existing cases such as IBM's.

The case is Cooper v. IBM, 06-760.

In the employment retaliation case, an IBM employee named Michael Saville worked for the company for 32 years before accepting early retirement in October 1998. Saville filed suit in August 2000, arguing that he was forced to leave the company in retaliation for his complaints that IBM was violating federal labor law by requiring employees to work overtime without being paid.

The company responded in court filings that Saville was offered a choice to take early retirement or undergo a performance review due to unsatisfactory job performance, not because of his complaints about overtime. Saville voluntarily chose early retirement, the company said.

Furthermore, Saville only made general, limited complaints about overtime that did not qualify for protection under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the company argued.

A federal district court in Utah sided with IBM, and so did the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which ruled in June 2006 that Saville chose to leave the company and was not forced out in retaliation for his complaints.

Saville's lawyers argued that it isn't clear under previous Supreme Court rulings whether forced early retirement qualifies as an unfair employment action that a company might take in retaliation against an employee. IBM argued that the law is clear and the lower courts applied it correctly.

The case is Saville v. IBM, 06-407.

Shares of IBM rose 60 cents to $99.94 in early trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

2 Men Freed In Girl's Killing (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Tami Abdollah

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117526

A few days after a bullet from a gang shooting tore into an Angelino Heights home last month, killing a 9-year-old girl, police announced with much fanfare that they had arrested the two gunmen.

But the suspects — Cesar Zamora, 23, and Steven Castanon, 20 — are now out of jail and back in their old neighborhood, to the dismay of residents who held candlelight vigils to memorialize Charupha Wongwisetsiri.

Police released the men without filing charges after determining that Zamora or Castanon fired the shot that killed Charupha in self-defense when a rival gang member pulled up in a car and tried to shoot them in front of their apartment complex next to Charupha's home.

The situation has shaken and angered residents of Angelino Heights, a diverse neighborhood with commanding views of downtown Los Angeles. The area includes rows of grand Victorian houses restored by television writers and downtown office workers side-by-side with apartments housing working-class families.

"They made it big news when they arrested them and then they quietly let them go," community activist James McHargue said. "I think it is outrageous if the prosecutors don't charge the people who fired these guns."

Bob and Patti Good, who helped organize a candlelight vigil for the girl, can't understand why the two shooters are back on the street.

All of sudden "who gunned down that little girl" are back, said Bob Good, 62, a title insurance officer. "They are looking for him and he's looking for them. Is there going to be more violence now?

"Usually if someone gets killed it's a bad guy, but now it's an innocent party. You cannot get more innocent than a little girl, and people identify with that."

Authorities insist that they are simply following the law.

"Evidence was presented that it was self-defense, and we did not feel we could charge the two people at this time," said Jane Robison of the Los Angeles County district attorney's office.

Instead, police detectives say they now are trying to build a murder case against the man who tried to shoot at Zamora and Castanon — even though his gun jammed and he didn't get off a shot.

He caused "this horrible event, and we hope to make a strong case against him in this murder," LAPD Lt. Paul Vernon said.

Legal experts said the circumstances of the shooting would make it difficult to build a murder case against Zamora and Castanon.

According to police, the men were sitting outside an apartment on East Kensington Road when a car pulled up. One man got out, walked onto the apartment property and pulled out a gun. Witnesses said he tried to shoot but his gun apparently jammed, according to law enforcement sources.

Zamora and Castanon pulled guns of their own and fired several times. None of the shots hit the gunman, who fled in the car. But one bullet traveled down the street and into Charupha's home.

Police believe the shooting was gang-related. But detectives concluded that the pair had the right to shoot because the gunman had pulled out a weapon and seemed ready to fire at them.

Robert Pugsley, a criminal law professor at Southwestern Law School of Law, said the circumstances of the shooting would give Zamora and Castanon a strong self-defense case in court.

"A person has a right of self-defense, and third-party damage, as sad as it may be, is considered an unintended consequence," Pugsley said.

Prosecutors could bring charges if the shooting suggested an act of recklessness, but the sudden nature of the Angelino Heights attack — a gunman leaping out of a car and aiming a weapon — would make that a hard point to prove, he said.

Peter Keane, a professor of law and former dean of Golden Gate Law School, agreed. But prosecutors can pursue an "unreasonable self-defense" manslaughter charge if they believe the gunman's actions were based on an unreasonable belief compared to the threat, Keane said. In that case the killing is not a murder but a manslaughter because they did not act with malice, he added.

The issue of self-defense in gang shootings in which bystanders are killed or wounded has been a matter of debate for years in Los Angeles.

In 2003, a mother decorating her Christmas tree in South Los Angeles was killed by a stray bullet fired during a gun battle between two gangs.

The LAPD eventually arrested the two suspects who fired the shots after someone in a passing car sprayed bullets in their direction. But prosecutors decided not to pursue the case, agreeing with investigators that the men apparently acted in self-defense.

The reasoning doesn't sit well with some residents of Angelino Heights.

Jim Prager, 60, an attorney, said Zamora and Castanon need to be held accountable.

DOJ_NMG_0117527

"They ran away to another known gang house ... they are not innocent people. This represents a lazy" prosecution, he said.

Neither Zamora nor Castanon could be reached for comment. (Castanon was arrested Monday night in Hollywood on suspicion of weapons possession.)

Prosecutors and police say they are doing all they can. They said they could still charge Zamora and Castanon with a lesser crime — such as a weapons or probation violation — but it remains unclear whether they will.

Before the shooting, LAPD officials had identified the apartment where the shooting took place as a gathering point for gang associates. The city attorney's office has taken initial steps to have the residence declared a nuisance property because of gang activity.

On the streets of Angelino Heights, Charupha's killing has sparked a new push by residents to work with police to reduce crime and take other steps to improve the neighborhood.

But Charupha's stepfather, Allan Maxwell, said he'll now sell their home and move to his wife's native Thailand, where they have already bought a home.

"With a self-defense plea there's nothing the guy can do," he said. "I talked to the detectives, and from their point of view it sounded like nothing is going to come of this. I'd like to see them suffer some consequence. But short of becoming a vigilante, I don't know what to do."

Maxwell, who has Parkinson's disease, said that when he heard the first shot that night he screamed for his wife and daughter to get on the floor in the kitchen, where his daughter was playing and his wife was doing dishes.

He said if politicians continue to do no more than pay lip service to combating gangs, others also would leave the neighborhood.

"Politicos make their statements about how they're going to end gang violence and get these creeps out of the area.

"People just sold the house next door to [the gang house] and moved to Arcadia because they had two younger children," he said.

A City's Violence Feeds On Black-Hispanic Rivalry (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 16 — The Latino gang members were looking for a black person, any black person, to shoot, the police said, and they found one. Cheryl Green, perched near her scooter chatting with friends, was shot dead in a spray of bullets that left several other young people injured.

She was 14, an eighth grader who loved junk food and watching Court TV with her mother and had recently written a poem beginning: "I am black and beautiful. I wonder how I will be living in the future."

"I never thought something like this could happen here in L.A.," said her mother, Charlene Lovett, fighting tears.

Cheryl's killing last month, which the police said followed a confrontation between the gang members and a black man, stands out in a wave of bias-related attacks and incidents in a city that promotes its diversity as much as frets over it.

Ethnic and racial tension comes to Los Angeles as regularly as the Santa Ana winds. Race-related fights afflict school campuses and jails, and two major riots, in 1965 and 1992, are hardly forgotten. But civil rights advocates say that the violence grew at an alarming rate last year, continuing a trend of more Latino versus black confrontations and prompting street demonstrations and long discussions on talk-radio programs and in community meetings.

Much of the violence springs from rivalries between black and Latino gangs, especially in neighborhoods where the black population has been declining and the Latino population surging. A 14 percent increase in gang crime last year, at a time when overall violent crime was down, has been attributed in good measure to the interracial conflict.

This month, the authorities reported that crimes in the city motivated by racial, religious or sexual orientation discrimination had increased 34 percent in 2005 over the previous year. Statistics for 2006 have not yet been compiled.

Rabbi Allen Freehling, executive director of the Los Angeles Human Relations Commission, a group created after the 1965 riots, said the recent growth in hate crimes reflected a failure by government and community leaders to prepare residents for socioeconomic changes in many neighborhoods, "and therefore people have a tendency to lash out, out of desperation."

In November, three Latino gang members received sentences of life in federal prison for crimes that included the murder of two black men — one waiting for a bus, another searching for a parking spot — and assaults on others in a conspiracy to intimidate black residents of a northeast Los Angeles neighborhood.

In another case, a twist on past racial dramas, 10 black youths, some of whom prosecutors say had connections to a gang, are on trial for what prosecutors contend was a racially motivated attack in neighboring Long Beach on three young white women who were visiting a haunted house on Halloween. Long Beach also experienced an increase in hate crimes in 2005.

But even with the alarm caused by the recent increase in bias crimes, Constance L. Rice, a veteran civil rights lawyer, said that, considering Los Angeles's diversity, race relations remained relatively calm and were even marked by many examples of groups getting along.

Still, in several corners of the city, particularly where poverty is high and demographics are shifting, tensions have been flaring.

"You don't find entire segments of the city against one another," Ms. Rice said, "but in the hot spots and areas of friction you find it is because the demographics are in transition and there is an assertion of power by one group or the other and you get friction."

In Harbor Gateway, the neighborhood where Cheryl Green was killed, tension had grown so severe that blacks and Latinos formed a dividing line on a street that both sides understood never to cross and a small market was unofficially declared off-limits to blacks. Ms. Lovett had warned her children not to go near the line, 206th Street, but Cheryl had ridden her scooter near it to talk to friends when she was shot.

Neighbors said the dominant 204th Street gang, which is Latino, had harassed blacks and Latinos alike and effectively kept the groups divided, though language and cultural differences also have contributed to segregation.

"We wave hello, but I cannot really talk to blacks because my English is limited and I don't want to mess with the gang," said Armando Lopez, speaking in Spanish, who lives near where Cheryl was shot.

A man who described himself as a former member of the 204th Street gang said black gang members had shot or assaulted Latinos, too, and explained the violence as a deadly tit-for-tat.

"They shot a Mexican guy right around the corner from here and nobody protested or said anything," said the man, who asked that his name not be used for fear of retaliation. He referred to neighborhood speculation that Cheryl's killing was in retaliation for the killing of Arturo Mercado, a Latino shot to death in the neighborhood a week before Cheryl in what the police call an unexplained shooting.

The violence in that neighborhood and others has prompted a flurry of announcements by Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa and police officials promising a renewed crackdown on gangs, particularly those responsible for hate-related crimes. Mr. Villaraigosa plans to meet Friday with Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, about expanding its assistance in investigating gang and hate-related violence; the agency has been working with the police on such investigations in the San Fernando Valley, where gang violence has increased the most.

Chief William J. Bratton has said the Police Department would soon issue a most-wanted list of the city's 10 to 20 worst gangs, with those most active in hate crimes likely to land on it.

"It's to say, 'We're coming after you,' " Mr. Bratton said.

A city-financed report by Ms. Rice released Friday said Los Angeles needed a "Marshall plan" to address gang violence in light of a growth in gang membership and a lack of a comprehensive strategy to curb the problem.

Despite the spike in hate crimes in 2005, the total number of bias-related incidents in Los Angeles, 333 in a city of 3.8 million people, was down from peaks in violent crime in the mid-1990s and just after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Cheryl Green's killing particularly alarmed community and civil rights advocates because of her age and the indication that the neighborhood's long history of racial violence was continuing. Two Latino gang members have been charged with murder in the case. With the district attorney having filed a formal allegation that the men were motivated by hate, they could be eligible for the death penalty or life in prison without parole if convicted.

Mr. Villaraigosa, the city's first Latino mayor in over a century, was elected in 2005 in part on a promise of keeping peace among racial and ethnic groups. He attended a rally in the Harbor Gateway neighborhood Saturday, one of a few demonstrations calling for unity. He hugged Ms. Lovett and Beatriz Villa, the sister-in-law of Mr. Mercado, the Latino killed earlier.

"Our cultural and ethnic diversity are cornerstones of a strong L.A.," the mayor said Friday, "and violent crime motivated by the victim's skin color will not be tolerated."

Earl Ofari Hutchinson, an African-American syndicated columnist who plays host to the Los Angeles Urban Policy Roundtable, a weekly gathering in the Leimert Park neighborhood of South Los Angeles, said blacks complained that illegal Latin American immigrants were stealing jobs. Latinos, particularly newcomers unaccustomed to living among large numbers of African-Americans, in turn accuse blacks of criminal activity and harassing them.

DOJ_NMG_0117529

"I think L.A. is a microcosm of what could happen in big cities in the future," Mr. Hutchinson said. "When we have the kind of tension you see in L.A. in the schools, the workplace and now hate-crime violence, my great concern is this is a horrific view of what could happen in other cities."

Ms. Lovett, Cheryl's mother, said the family moved to Harbor Gateway six years ago to get away from a high-crime neighborhood in another part of Los Angeles. A relative of a black neighbor was shot by the gang a few years ago, she said, and recently she had begun looking for a safer area.

"I feel it is unfortunate my daughter had to be the sacrificial lamb," she said. "But I just hope there is a change in this neighborhood."

Key Tactic In Hate-crime Case Assailed (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

Long Beach trial turns largely on an ID method that experts say is inherently fallible and rarely used in isolation.

With closing arguments set to begin today, the case against 10 Long Beach youths accused of beating three white women Halloween night hinges almost entirely on identifications made in a Ralphs parking lot the night of the attack.

In a procedure known as a field show-up, police told the victims and a reputed witness that the youths — nine girls and a boy, ages 12 to 17 — were suspects and asked if they recognized them from the melee. In several subsequent police interviews, witnesses were never asked to pick the juveniles out of a lineup that included non-suspects: a means to test their memory that experts say is a standard and crucial procedure. Nor were they asked to identify them in open court.

Long Beach Police Cmdr. Jeffry Johnson said the field show-up is the most accurate form of identification in a case like this. "Especially when you talk about numerous suspects, you have to go with immediate recollection," he said.

But experts say field show-ups are inherently fallible and rarely used in isolation.

"I can't remember ever seeing a case go to trial in which the only identification is a field show-up," said Kathy Pezdek, a professor at Claremont Graduate University and expert witness in the area of eyewitness identification, in an interview. "It's extremely unusual."

Much of what has occurred in the Long Beach courtroom of Judge Gibson W. Lee, however, is unusual. The mild-mannered jurist has let attorneys deliver long fiery speeches, make objection after objection that all but stopped the testimony and ignore his orders to stick to the facts of the case.

Deputy Dist. Atty. Andrea Bouas has accused the youths of having gang connections, of orchestrating the destruction of a witness' car, of calling the witness "a stupid bitch" outside of court to intimidate her. None of Bouas' accusations are based on evidence in the case, and they normally would have been heard out of the presence of a jury.

But the Long Beach hate-crime case highlights a critical — and many experts say troublesome — difference between adult and juvenile court: There are no juries in juvenile court; a judge decides the minors' fate.

"A jury is the great equalizer," said Cyn Yamashiro, a professor at Loyola Law School and director of its Center for Juvenile Law and Policy. "It is the true challenge to the people's case. That is the component of due process that is absent in the juvenile system."

The public doesn't often see the juvenile system at work, because the proceedings are usually closed. In this case, Lee opened the doors based on the seriousness of the allegations: All 10 are charged with assault with intent to cause great bodily injury, and eight face hate-crime sentencing enhancements.

The result is a glimpse into how justice is administered for children that raises questions about whether they would get a fairer trial in adult court.

Seven of the defendants have court-appointed attorneys, who are paid a flat rate of $325 to try the entire case, now in its seventh week. Court-appointed attorneys in adult court are paid an hourly rate of $68 to $91.

The Long Beach minors, none of whom have criminal records, have been in custody since Halloween, with no chance for bail.

The first day of trial, Nov. 28, Deputy Public Defender Stephanie Sauter voiced concern that the youths could not get a fair trial in Long Beach because of heated local press coverage.

Lee — a judge for 21 years with deep ties to the city, where he grew up and his father practiced law for 50 years — denied her motion for a change of venue. He indicated that public pressure would not influence him.

From the get-go, the prosecution has depicted the assault as a vicious, unprovoked attack motivated by racial hatred:

Three young white women — Loren Hyman, 21; Laura Schneider, 19; and Michelle Smith, 19 — were trick-or-treating on a street known for its Halloween displays, when a crowd of 30 or more black youths began shouting racial epithets and pelting them with pieces of fruit. The women tried to get away, but the crowd set upon them, severely beating all three before a good Samaritan rescued them, Bouas has argued.

But the version of events that emerged in court was messier.

The good Samaritan, Marice Huff, testified that the attack began when a boy tried to trip Hyman and she turned around and punched or slapped one of the black girls in the face. Schneider and seven of the minors independently told the same story to police. Huff also said he saw the white women fighting back and holding their own.

Although Hyman testified that she had not been drinking that night, the doctor who treated her testified that she had. Although she said most of the assailants were girls, a neighbor who called 911 in the presence of the victims described the culprits as 10 or 12 "black men."

And although witnesses testified that they heard someone yell racial slurs, no one could say who.

Undisputed is a key piece of circumstantial evidence — Hyman's cellphone, knocked from her hand during the attack and later recovered from the car of one of the defendants — as well as the victims' injuries. Hyman suffered a broken nose, along with what physicians call a tripod fracture: a cracking of the cheekbone and two paper-thin bones around the eye. Schneider may have suffered a concussion, a doctor testified. There was no testimony of injuries to Smith.

For the field identifications, the three victims and an 18-year-old woman, Kiana Alford, who said she had witnessed the attack, were driven separately to the parking lot where the minors were detained.

Alford would testify later that officers told her, 'We caught the people who did this,' and that she felt it was her responsibility to identify them.

Hyman identified four of the minors as attackers. Schneider identified three, Smith none and Alford eight. Only Hyman and Alford were called to testify.

Pezdek, the eyewitness identification expert, said it is highly unlikely that a witness could make out what numerous individuals did in a mob, even more so at night and at a distance. "To say in this melee there are eight people who did this and that is kind of silly," she said.

On the stand, Alford first gave a cinematic account of the attack. But under cross-examination, she said that she saw the fight as she drove away, looking over her shoulder and in the rearview mirror, and that the distance — up to 175 feet — and darkness made it impossible to pick out individuals.

The day after Alford stepped down, police moved to shore up the case with more physical evidence. Officers went to Los Padrinos Juvenile Hall to look at the minors' clothes, kept in a locker since Halloween night.

Analysts found bloodstains on the jeans of a 16-year-old girl. A week later, Bouas told the court in a closed hearing that a DNA analysis showed the blood was from Hyman. But the judge barred the evidence, saying presenting it would take too long.

Police Cmdr. Johnson said investigators had scrambled to do everything they could, given the time crunch.

"Normally, between the time of the arrest and the trial, you have months," he said. "We had two weeks."

In the end, the prosecution's strongest witness was Hyman, who testified that she and her friends were simply walking by when a group of black youths began to taunt them, then yelled slurs and pelted them with small pumpkins. Schneider was pulled by the hair into the mob and hit with a skateboard by a male, Hyman testified. As she went to help her friend, the crowd — most of them girls — began to pummel her too, she said.

In a bid to undermine the prosecution's case, the defense played the 911 tapes that described the attackers as male and called two witnesses: Lineshia Hill, who was with Alford that night and says they arrived after the fight was over, and a defendant, Anthony Ross, now 18.

Ross testified calmly that, sitting in a car just feet away, he saw a male he didn't know kick Hyman in the back of the leg. She then slapped his sister in the face, he said, and a group of males jumped in and started beating the women. Ross said he leapt out of the car when a boy hit the woman with the skateboard and that he ripped the board from the boy's hands.

After the prosecution rested its case, Lee gave some indication he believed that its evidence, taken alone, was sufficient.

Tom Harmon, the attorney for a girl who turned 12 the night before the attack, argued that the only evidence against her specifically was Alford's statement that she saw her "throwing newspapers around at the girls," an observation she made from 300 feet away.

Bouas did not dispute Harmon, but Lee swiftly denied Harmon's motion to dismiss the case against the girl.

Gay Lawyer's Suit Accuses Firm Of Bias (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117531

An associate at one of the country's most prestigious law firms, Sullivan & Cromwell, filed a state lawsuit in Manhattan yesterday accusing the firm of a systematic campaign of discrimination and retaliation against him because of his sexual orientation.

Aaron B. Charney, 28, who is a fourth-year associate, asserts in the lawsuit, filed in New York State Supreme Court in Manhattan, that several partners in Sullivan & Cromwell's highly regarded mergers and acquisitions practice subjected him to "lewd and illegal conduct," beginning in the fall of 2005. He is seeking a jury trial and unspecified compensatory and punitive damages.

In his lawsuit, Mr. Charney accuses members of the firm of demanding he be terminated for carrying on an "unnatural" gay relationship with another Sullivan & Cromwell associate; Mr. Charney denies the relationship. The suit also contends that after he filed a formal internal complaint, members of the firm suggested that he move to a foreign office and then fabricated reviews to accuse him of overbilling clients, among other things.

While Mr. Charney has not been terminated, he says he was told he should not come to the office while an internal investigation is continuing.

In an e-mailed statement, the firm's chairman, H. Rodgin Cohen, said the firm "categorically denies Mr. Charney's allegations of discrimination and retaliation."

Another of the firm's partners, David H. Braff, said that the firm had a strong culture of acceptance and that it had handled several landmark cases over the years that protected gay and lesbian rights.

"I've been openly gay since I arrived at this firm in 1984," Mr. Braff added. "There's absolutely no atmosphere of hostility toward gay people here."

A handful of suits against law firms asserting discrimination or harassment have been filed by assistants or secretaries, including one filed against Baker & McKenzie by a secretary who contended she had been sexually harassed by one of its partners. That suit resulted in $3 million in damages.

Yet it is virtually unheard-of for associates, who typically work long hours in their quest to become partners, to file such suits, which can stall or even end their legal careers.

"The day I derailed my career was the day I complained about the discrimination," said Mr. Charney, who said he was representing himself in the case because no other lawyers wanted to take on the law firm.

Mr. Charney, who joined the firm in the fall of 2003 after graduating from Columbia University Law School, contends that hostility toward him because of his sexual orientation began in the fall of 2005.

In his complaint, Mr. Charney claims that a partner in the mergers practice, Eric M. Krautheimer, began to make lewd sexual remarks to him based on his sexual orientation.

The next month, he said, James C. Morphy, the managing partner of the merger group, gave Mr. Charney his semiannual review, in which he conveyed outstanding work evaluations that had been written by several partners and clients on Mr. Charney's behalf.

At the conclusion of the evaluation, however, Mr. Charney asserts that Mr. Morphy said that several partners had complained about seeing Mr. Charney and another male associate in the group "walking the halls together" and "eating lunch together" and that this "needs to stop." In his complaint, Mr. Charney said it was a thinly veiled and false accusation that the two were engaged in a gay relationship.

In May 2006, Mr. Charney lodged a formal complaint with David B. Harms, a co-managing partner of the firm's general practice. A few days later, Mr. Harms said that Mr. Krauthemier and another partner whom Mr. Charney asserted had made inappropriate remarks denied doing so.

Mr. Harms assured Mr. Charney that making the complaint would not result in any change to his employment status at the firm.

But a few hours later, Mr. Charney said he learned he was not included on a mentoring list for the 2006 summer associate program. Messages left with Mr. Krautheimer, Mr. Morphy and Mr. Harms were not immediately answered.

ANTITRUST:

If XM, Sirius Pursue Merger, Hurdles At FCC, Justice Loom (WSJ)

By SARAH MCBRIDE And AMY SCHATZ

Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117532

With speculation on the upswing about a possible merger between satellite-radio rivals Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., the companies face a serious obstacle: Federal Communications Commission regulations that appear to specifically forbid a merger.

Winning approval for any deal, from both the FCC and the Justice Department, may rest in persuading regulators that the two companies face many more competitors than just each other. Competing technologies that have helped damp satellite radio's growth -- like iPods, podcasts and Internet radio -- may give the companies ammunition to persuade regulators that a merger of the only two satellite-radio players isn't a threat to competition.

Merger rumors involving the companies have surfaced periodically over the last year, stoked by Sirius officials like Chief Executive Mel Karmazin, who has said he would be interested in buying XM. Officials at XM typically dismissed the possibility.

But in recent weeks, XM has notably softened its stance. While XM still stops short of saying it is exploring a deal, it no longer rules out the possibility. That has given new life to hopes for a deal. Since the beginning of the year, XM's stock has risen almost 19% and Sirius's 17%.

"I think that absolutely [XM executives] have softened their public posture," says Barton Crockett, an analyst at J.P. Morgan who upgraded both companies to "overweight" positions yesterday. "To my mind, that is a strong indication that they are open to this, at least attempting it."

An XM-Sirius merger is gaining more urgency in the industry as both companies struggle to win consumers. While both firms add new listeners each quarter, neither is reaching the lofty subscriber levels that were expected a few years ago.

The merger talk, to some, seems like a trial balloon intended to gauge the reaction of both investors and regulators. Such advance work may be necessary given that any deal would face significant hurdles.

The companies would need to persuade the Justice Department that a merger wouldn't be anticompetitive, even though it would likely result in higher subscription rates and less consumer choice. The companies, however, say thinking about satellite radio on its own defines the options too narrowly.

"I don't know how you come up with a market definition so that we and they compete only against each other," says David Frear, chief financial officer at Sirius. "We see ourselves competing primarily with terrestrial radio as well as this plethora of new services, including MP3s, Internet radio and cellphones."

Indeed, when satellite radio was first conceived, it was difficult to imagine it would compete with a device like the iPod, which offers the kind of broader listening choice that was the heart of satellite radio's appeal. Much like satellite radio, iPods offer hours of advertisement-free music.

The companies would also need to make a case at the FCC, where there are several regulatory hurdles facing a potential deal. Primary among them is an FCC rule that on the face of it appears to prohibit the two companies from merging. In 1997, when the companies won their licenses, the FCC stipulated that one satellite-radio company wouldn't be permitted to "acquire control" of the other license. The prohibition "will help assure sufficient continuing competition," the regulation states.

Communications lawyers say that the rule could be overturned after a public comment period. Mr. Crockett, the J.P. Morgan analyst, suggested in a report yesterday that the FCC could also permit XM, of Washington, and Sirius, of New York, to hold their licenses in two separate companies while consolidating operating and financial efficiencies.

FCC chairman Kevin Martin hasn't said how he might view a deal, but he could be leaning toward a stricter definition of competition in the satellite-radio arena. When asked about a potential XM-Sirius deal last week at the Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas, Mr. Martin pointed to how the agency viewed competition in the satellite-television market during its review of EchoStar Communications Corp. and DirecTV Group Inc.'s failed merger attempt a few years ago. In that case, the FCC took a narrow approach to defining the market for video competition.

Mr. Martin's support for a deal would be critical to its success. The political climate at the Republican-controlled commission has been more strained than usual since Democrats took control of Congress, and it isn't clear that the five-member commission's two Democrats could be persuaded to support a further consolidation of the market, given their staunch opposition to relaxing media-ownership rules.

So far, XM and Sirius don't appear to be lobbying regulators or lawmakers directly to allow a merger. While both companies meet regularly with the FCC to discuss various issues, commission officials say they haven't been meeting with satellite-radio companies or their representatives to discuss a potential merger. Staffers at some key congressional offices -- such as Democrats who oversee commerce and antitrust issues -- also say they haven't taken meetings to discuss a merger.

Some communications lawyers say that if the Justice Department decided not to block a merger, the FCC could likely fall in line, as it has with some recent telecommunications mergers.

Of course, issues between XM and Sirius themselves could be difficult to resolve. Those include how to value each company and which company would end up with more control. Even if they merged, cost savings wouldn't necessarily be as good as investors believe, in large part because each company is locked into long-term contracts with talent such as Sirius's Howard Stern and XM's Oprah Winfrey.

RBC Capital Markets' David Bank says programming costs could fall 50%, but not until 2010; because the companies use different encoding technologies, it would be difficult to merge operating platforms. By 2015, he believes the companies would be saving $360 million annually in costs including advertising and subsidies.

In order to merge, the companies would need to act fast. Lawyers say they would need to get a proposal before the FCC within the next couple of months so the heavy lifting would be finished by the time the 2008 election cycle kicks in. If a Democrat took the presidency, control of the FCC would also switch, making a merger that much harder to pull off.

Deutsche Bank Swap Makes Pennsylvania Taxpayers Lose $230,000 (BLOOM)

By Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, January 17, 2007

Jan. 17 (Bloomberg) -- The third-poorest city in Pennsylvania is a lot poorer because of a 28-year bet on interest rates that already has gone awry.

The Reading, Pennsylvania, school district, which has 18,323 students, this week must pay $230,000 to Deutsche Bank AG, Germany's largest bank, because it's on the losing side of a wager that long-term interest rates will rise faster than short-term interest rates. In April, the board rushed approval of the so-called interest rate swap in eight days after its adviser said the transaction may earn the district $16 million by 2034.

While Reading's taxpayers are liable for the loss, bankers and advisers already have pocketed $1 million in fees for arranging the swap, enough to buy 11 Mercedes-Benz S-550 sedans. This week's payment to Deutsche Bank would have covered the school district's monthly utility bill.

``It was all done in a real hurry," said Keith Stamm, the only member of the board to vote against the deal. ``The whole board is so desperate to try to find a way to raise money, they see this floated in front of them as a big-time amount of money and they want to go forward with it."

Local governments from Augusta, Georgia, to Oakland, California, are being lured by similar opportunities to speculate with derivatives created by the world's biggest banks. Most of the $400 billion of private agreements sold to municipalities escape taxpayers' notice and are little understood by the public officials and administrators who approve them.

Risky Practice

``It's a recipe for disaster and it's also a recipe for sharp practices by charlatans," said James Cox, the Brainerd Currie Professor of Law at Duke University and a securities law specialist. ``The gains that a community stands to derive from this are at the margins and the risks they're exposing themselves to, frequently, are greatly in excess of what the expected rewards are."

While financial firms often promote the agreements as a way for municipalities to lock in borrowing costs for future projects, the swap bought by Reading amounts to a bet on the relationship between short-term and long-term interest rates. If long-term rates rise higher than short-term rates, the municipalities will profit from the agreement and vice-versa.

Trading, Not Hedging

``It's more of a trading strategy than a hedging strategy," said Peter Shapiro, managing director of South Orange, New Jersey-based Swap Financial Group, which advises governments on derivatives including interest-rate swaps. ``All transactions include an element of speculation. The ones which are more speculative, like the yield-curve swap, are only suitable for issuers who are more sophisticated."

A derivative is a financial contract whose value is derived from stocks, bonds, loans, currencies and commodities, or linked to specific events such as changes in interest rates or the weather. A swap is a type of derivative, where parties agree to exchange interest payments, usually a fixed payment for one that varies based on the movements of benchmark indexes.

The school board paid Frankfurt-based Deutsche Bank $575,000 to arrange the contract, known as a constant maturity swap, and awarded $400,000 to its financial advisers, including Reading-based Concord Public Financial Advisors Inc. and lawyers for arranging the trade, school officials said.

Ted Meyer, a spokesman for Deutsche Bank in New York, declined to comment on whether the agreement, also called a yield-curve swap, was suitable for the school district. Concord principal Mike Setley didn't return calls seeking comment.

Unemployment Rate

Dennis Kelley, the school district's director of finance, said he was ``surprised" to learn he owes $230,000. He said the district would pay the money using proceeds from another interest-rate swap.

DOJ_NMG_0117534

Reading is a town of 80,000 about 60 miles (96.5 kilometers) northwest of Philadelphia where the unemployment rate is almost twice the U.S. average.

The town depends on state funding for $106 million of its $162 million school budget. Enrollment has grown 24 percent in the past decade, while the tax base dropped by about 6 percent, according to school district documents. Almost 70 percent of the students come from poor families. Schools are overcrowded and some are more than 80 years old.

The contract was approved after Concord said the swap ``would allow us to get some cash now to help the district," said Pierre Cooper, a social worker and the former board president. ``I don't know the particulars off the top of my head."

William Cinfici, another board member and a registrar for the state's division of vital records, said Concord didn't provide enough financial information to evaluate the transaction.

`Nobody Questioned It'

``It was arcane, nobody questioned it," Cinfici said. ``Everything was presented to us at the last minute. I said, `Well, I'll trust in the guys' judgment.'"

Stamm, a real estate broker and the current president of the nine-member board, said Concord told the board the swap was ``a roll of the dice."

Reading, like most municipalities, borrows with long-term bonds. The most recent bond the school district sold in December 2005 has a final maturity of 2036. The interest-rate swaps that Reading and other borrowers are purchasing are typically matched to the maturities of bonds that have been issued.

Reading Swap

The Reading contract is based on $103 million of zero-coupon bonds issued by the district in 2003 that come due from 2026 to 2034. Reading is required to pay Deutsche Bank the equivalent of 67 percent of the one-month London interbank offered rate, a lending benchmark, plus 0.3 percent every Jan. 15 and July 15. That amounts to about $2 million for the period ending this week.

In return, Deutsche Bank must give the district a rate equivalent to 66 percent of the so-called five-year swap rate, which is the interest rate a borrower is willing to pay to exchange fixed payments for those that reset each month. That totals about $1.77 million for the period. The difference amounts to the $230,000 the district owes Deutsche Bank. Only the net payment changes hands.

The contract became a money loser because the five-year swap rate has declined to 5.145 percent from 5.5945 percent in July. Meantime, Libor dropped to 5.32 percent from 5.37 percent, according to data compiled by Bloomberg.

Reading's schools will profit if five-year rates are higher relative to one-month yields. That's been the case 80 percent of the time during the past 10 years, according to Citigroup Inc., the biggest underwriter of municipal debt.

``So long as interest-rate relationships return to normal conditions, this transaction should provide a significant financial benefit to the school district," Concord said in a memo to the district May 22. While Reading is paying now, it may earn money on the swap over time.

Over the Counter

The swap market is unregulated and trading occurs over the counter, so municipalities can't be sure they are getting the best price on contracts. In Jefferson County, Alabama, one of the tens of thousands of borrowers in the municipal bond market, officials have bought $5.8 billion of swaps. Officials there have received subpoenas from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission asking about the swaps.

An August 2005 Bloomberg News article reported that New York-based JPMorgan Chase & Co. overcharged Jefferson County by $45 million for swaps tied to sewer debt. The SEC has subpoenaed three current and two former county commissioners asking for records related to bond issues and swaps sold since January 2002.

Diverging Interests

The Internal Revenue Service has probed whether the mispricing of municipal swaps has allowed advisers and banks to make excessive fees, depriving the federal government of earnings from the investment of tax-exempt bond proceeds. The U.S. Justice Department and SEC have asked for information on swaps as part of an antitrust investigation into alleged bid- rigging in the $2.3 trillion municipal market.

In the Reading deal, Pottstown, Pennsylvania-based Investment Management Advisory Group worked with Concord to set up the swap, according to the May 22 memo from Concord to the district. The firm, known as Image, also worked as a consultant to Deutsche Bank, records of the swap contract show.

Federal regulators haven't said if they are probing the Reading deal. Reading hasn't been contracted by any regulator agency about the investigation, said Stamm.

DOJ_NMG_0117535

The dual roles illustrate conflicts of interest that occur in the market, said Andrew Kalotay, chief executive officer of Andrew Kalotay Associates Inc., which advises corporations, federal agencies and municipalities on debt management.

Image Raided

``Even though the swap adviser's client is the municipality, their financial interests are not aligned," Kalotay said. ``The swap adviser is paid only if there is a transaction, and the larger the transaction the larger the fee, so there is an inherent conflict."

Deutsche Bank spokesman Meyer said the bank doesn't have a business relationship with Image. ``The school district directed us to make that payment," Meyer said. ``It's as if they had a lawyer and had to pay their attorneys."

Image was among three brokers raided in November as part of the U.S. antitrust probe. The firm, which is cooperating with investigators, declined to comment on the Reading deal. Image has said it is ``confident that our business practices and employees will be fully vindicated as this investigation continues."

Concord said Deutsche Bank won the business after beating proposals from four banks, according to the May 22 memo. Concord didn't arrange a public auction to get the lowest cost for taxpayers. Deutsche Bank offered to do the swap for a commission of 5.75 basis points, compared with no less than 6 basis points from the other companies, Concord said in the memo. A basis point is 0.01 percentage point.

`Pay for Ingenuity'

Kentucky's Louisville-Jefferson County Metropolitan Sewer District, the city of Port St. Lucie, Florida, and Augusta, Georgia have purchased similar swaps. Image made $400,000 brokering two swaps with New York-based Morgan Stanley and Deutsche Bank for the Louisville sewer district.

Mountain States Health Alliance, a 1,100-bed hospital system in eastern Tennessee bordering the Appalachian Mountains, paid an adviser, Public Advisory Corp., almost $3 million to help arrange three swaps totaling $483 million with Merrill Lynch & Co.

``We really act as bankers," said Steven Pischke, president and chief executive officer of Atlanta-based Public Advisory. ``We come up with ideas, we develop them. You need to pay for ingenuity and for new ideas." Pischke said the cost to Mountain States was within ``industry standards."

Lowest Fees

Marvin Eichorn, the hospital system's chief financial officer, said he understood the risk and got the best deal possible. The hospital took bids from two banks and New York- based Merrill proposed the lowest cost, Eichorn said. He declined to name the other bank and said the hospital didn't need to seek more bids because Public Advisory would ensure fair pricing.

``We've always gone with whoever had the lowest fees," Eichorn said. Swaps have saved the hospital more than $1 million on its debt-service costs, he said.

More than 70 Pennsylvania school districts have notified the state they planned swaps with banks including Morgan Stanley, Wachovia Corp. and JPMorgan since 2003, when state legislators permitted them. The law requires districts to hire an independent financial adviser to ensure the swap is appropriate and help develop an ``interest-rate management plan," which analyzes the benefits and risks of swaps.

Reading has done two other swaps with Charlotte, North Carolina-based Wachovia.

``Why are municipalities doing these swaps?" Kalotay said. ``There may be legitimate reasons such as managing their mix of fixed- and floating-rate debt, but all too often they get talked into speculative deals. And if speculation is the goal, why not pork belly futures?"

Commentary: What Is The Proper Level Of Judicial Review For Mergers? (LAW)

By David T. Blonder, The Deal

The Deal, January 17, 2007

The controversy surrounding Judge Emmet Sullivan's review of the merger consent decrees entered into among Verizon Communications Inc., AT&T Corp. and the U.S. Department of Justice is shining the spotlight both on the boundaries of independent judicial review in assessing the impact of antitrust consent decrees on market competition, and on the implications of a more stringent evaluation of future mergers.

Sullivan, of the U.S. District Court in Washington, has delayed a ruling on whether to grant his required approval of the SBC Communications Inc.-AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications-MCI Inc. mergers. The judge recently took umbrage at comments from a Verizon attorney who said that company's merger would not be undone by the court, and he vowed to finish his independent review.

The Antitrust Procedures and Penalties Act, 15 U.S.C. §16, referred to as the Tunney Act, was enacted in 1974 to prevent the federal antitrust agencies from entering into any settlement agreement that was contrary to the "public interest." In 2004, in response to a widespread perception that judges were simply "rubber-stamping" antitrust consent decrees, Congress amended the act to require courts to more closely scrutinize settlement agreements entered into by the DOJ, making the public interest evaluation mandatory. The amendments also allowed courts to evaluate the impact that the consent judgment might have on market competition and whether any ambiguity exists in the consent judgment.

At press time, the outcome of Sullivan's proceedings was unknown, but sideline spectators wonder whether the case will change the role of courts operating under the "new and improved" Tunney Act and whether courts may consider the need for remedies for violations not alleged in the complaint.

Commentators claim that increased judicial scrutiny may alter how merging parties negotiate settlement agreements with the DOJ. If the prospect of settlement dims due to increased oversight, the parties' negotiating tactics may change, and the incentives for either side to make early concessions may be eliminated. This might further create a perception that the DOJ has to litigate cases even though a structural settlement is available to remedy competitive harm.

The facts, however, seem to belie the inference that settlements are less likely. Judicial review of the decrees that have followed the Tunney Act amendments suggests that Sullivan's role in these proceedings is anomalous to that of other courts. Since the amendments, courts, including the D.C. court, have approved at least eight merger settlement agreements. Of these, no court engaged in the type of review that Sullivan is contemplating.

As evidenced by the telecom mergers, greater judicial scrutiny of merger agreements is providing parties' competitors a second bite at the apple through their judicially blessed "amici-intervenor" status. If competitors don't like the proposed remedy, they can go to court and throw stones at the DOJ. While competitors may choose this path, it is questionable whether judges would view this as an efficient use of limited resources, whether it would benefit consumers or whether Congress intended such a result in amending the Tunney Act. This is significant, as third-party intervention is not expressly mandated by the act.

In merger investigations, competitors are often subpoenaed for information and data relevant to competition in the affected market and often have significant access to agency staff to present their case. If competitors are permitted active involvement in the review process, they clearly may pursue strategic action to further delay approval of the merger and to extract concessions from the merging parties. In the end, it is suspect whether this aids the review process or even helps consumers. When competitors aren't entirely happy about a merger remedy but readily line up to purchase divestiture assets, it may signal that the settlement is tailored adequately to the competitive harm and is a favorable result for competition.

Despite best intentions to comply with mandates, busy district court judges are generally ill-equipped to evaluate the merits of a complex merger settlement agreement without conducting a protracted and fact-intensive investigation of the competitive dynamics of an entire industry. This is presumably why the antitrust agencies (not judges) conduct investigations, develop industry expertise and are therefore better situated to make these determinations. The judge's role is to evaluate the harm as articulated in the complaint and competitive impact statement and to review whether the settlement meets the public interest. The scope of a court's review cannot be unlimited, and anything more might be considered constitutional overreaching into executive enforcement discretion.

It seems unlikely that Congress intended the Tunney amendments to effectively eliminate the utility of negotiated merger settlements or to put judges in the role of Monday morning quarterback. More important, the "public interest" standard itself is an amorphous concept.

The current judicial hullabaloo likely is limited to the confines of Judge Sullivan's courtroom. Only time, and possibly a decision from an appeals court, will tell whether Sullivan is ushering in a new era for merger settlement review or whether this exercise was simply much ado about nothing. This interested spectator thinks it will be the latter.

CVS Raises Caremark Bid, Pressuring Express Scripts (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Challenging a rival bid from Express Scripts Inc., drugstore chain CVS Corp. bumped up its offer for pharmacy manager Caremark Rx Inc. by $2 a share, to be paid in the form of a dividend, while also agreeing to a large share buyback that would shrink the combined companies' shares about 10%.

The moves ratcheted up the competitive dynamic between Express Scripts and CVS, which are battling for the allegiances of Caremark shareholders in an increasingly caustic battle of words and takeover tactics.

CVS's move was the first acknowledgment that holders were uncomfortable with the company's Caremark offer, which previously valued the manager of pharmacy benefits at around $53.09 a share, and is now valued at $55.09. Yesterday,

DOJ_NMG_0117537

Caremark shares traded at $56.25 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Express Scripts' cash and stock offer is valued at about $57.24 a share.

The Express offer put CVS in an increasingly untenable position, particularly as it headed on the road to sell its deal to shareholders. The question now is how well the $2-a-share dividend -- coupled with a $5 billion share buyback -- will placate shareholders.

The initial reaction was a positive one from John Ransom, an analyst with Raymond James Financial Inc. He said the improved CVS bid significantly narrows the gap between the two offers. "At its peak, there was a 16% difference in the premium between the Express Script and CVS offers. The difference is now 4%. I would think at the moment, the CVS bid would have to be considered superior. It's not hostile, you don't have the antitrust risk and you still have the same synergies as before."

People in the Express camp took exception with the improved offer terms, arguing that the special dividend was really valued at $1.09 a share. They pointed out that the cash would come only after the deal was closed -- and thus would be financed by the 45% of the new company that will be comprised of Caremark. "It's like taking cash out of your own pocket and putting it in the other," said one person close to the Express camp.

CVS also is hoping to woo shareholders with estimates of what it calls "revenue synergies" -- basically new sales it hopes to drive by putting the two companies together. CVS put those synergies at as much as $1 billion by 2008, coming from increased CVS store traffic, greater mail-order usage and more generic-drug prescriptions.

"Revenue synergies" nonetheless are discounted heavily by shareholders, who came to distrust them after many overly optimistic figures surfaced in the past decade's merger boom. Investors tend to take cost synergies more seriously, because things like jobs and factories can be cut more easily than new sales are produced.

Express is sure to apply pressure of its own as the Feb. 23 voting deadline for the CVS deal approaches. Yesterday, the company took the first step by launching an official $25 billion exchange offer for Caremark shares, a transaction that the Caremark board has continued to rebuff.

As recently as last year, Express and Caremark explored a deal of their own, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings. That deal never led to anything substantive, and at least by Express's reckoning, faltered primarily on valuation.

That undercuts Caremark's contention that the two would be unworthy partners because of antitrust concerns and strategic fit, said Express Chief Executive George Paz in an interview yesterday.

"I was at all those meetings," Mr. Paz said. "No one ever raised antitrust concerns. We felt it could get through. ... I'm at a loss for what they're doing" by not speaking to Express.

Express Scripts Begins Exchange Offer For Caremark (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport

Bloomberg, January 17, 2007

Jan. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Express Scripts Inc. began a hostile tender offer for all outstanding shares of Caremark Rx Inc., seeking shareholder support for its $24.3 billion takeover bid over a smaller offer from CVS Corp.

Express Scripts offered Caremark stockholders $29.25 in cash and 0.426 share of Express Scripts stock for each share of Caremark, Express Scripts said today in a statement. Based on closing prices from Jan. 12, the offer has a value of $56.87 a share. CVS, the second-largest U.S. drugstore chain, offered $48.53 a share on Nov. 1., or $22.3 billion.

Express Scripts' unsolicited offer was rejected last week by Caremark's board. Buying Caremark would make Express Scripts, based in Maryland Heights, Missouri, the largest manager of drug benefits in the U.S. CVS, based in Woonsocket, Rhode Island, wants Caremark to help give it more bargaining power in negotiating the price of medicines.

``There is nothing new in this Express Scripts offer and nothing unexpected," Caremark spokeswoman Nina Devlin said in a telephone interview today. ``We remain committed to our merger agreement with CVS." Caremark said Jan. 8 that an alliance with Express Scripts ``would result in a highly leveraged and weakened business."

Shares of Express Scripts rose 88 cents, or 1.4 percent, to $65.71 at 4:00 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Caremark fell 58 cents, or 1 percent, to $56.25 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, while CVS slipped 15 cents to $31.79.

`Numerous Times'

Express Scripts has spoken with Caremark ``numerous times over the past four years" about a possible alliance, said George Paz, Express Scripts' chief executive officer, during a conference call with investors today.

``Our offer delivers superior value," Paz said. ``It's fully financed and the regulatory process is well under way."

Between Feb. 2001 and mid-2005, Caremark and Express Scripts had ``several series of discussions and meetings concerning potential strategic transactions, including the acquisition of Caremark by Express Scripts and the acquisition of Express Scripts by Caremark," Express Scripts said today in a regulatory filing.

Express Scripts on Jan. 3 asked U.S. antitrust regulators to approve both its proposed tender offer and its takeover bid, the company said in the filing. The deadline for the U.S. Federal Trade Commission to review these proposals is midnight Feb. 2, unless regulators extend the waiting period by seeking additional information, Express Scripts said.

Lose Contracts

Caremark may lose contracts that would generate more than $8 billion in revenue because of a threatened proxy fight, Caremark Chief Executive Officer Mac Crawford said Jan. 10 at a meeting with investors in San Francisco.

Uncertainty generated by the Express Scripts Caremark's ability to sign new contracts for managing drug benefits, Crawford said. Caremark has said a combination with CVS could lower costs by $400 million.

``We are already being shut out by decision makers" because of the possibility that Express Scripts may take over Caremark, Crawford said. ``They like us and our pricing, but they can't take the risk that we won't be in charge."

Crawford accused Express Scripts of setting out to disrupt Caremark's planned combination with CVS and of making an estimate of $500 million in savings that was ``plucked entirely out of the air."

`Committed'

CVS spokeswoman Eileen Howard Dunn said in a telephone interview today that the company ``remains committed to closing its merger with Caremark in the first quarter of 2007."

Express Scripts said at a Jan. 8 meeting with investors in San Francisco it expected its takeover of Caremark to be completed by the end of the third quarter of 2007. Express Scripts said it started the tender offer ``in light of the Caremark board's rejection of and refusal to even discuss our superior proposal."

The company sued Caremark on Jan. 10 in Delaware Chancery Court in Wilmington, asking a judge to rule that a $675 million breakup fee if the CVS deal fails is ``unreasonable, unlawful and invalid."

``Express Scripts shares are likely to be volatile over the next few months as investors determine whether Caremark will be acquired by CVS or Express Scripts," said Matt Perry, an analyst with Wachovia Capital Markets LLC in New York, in a Jan. 12 note.

Caremark said Jan. 8 in a regulatory filing that it couldn't ``envision any scenario where it would be willing to trigger the imposition of a $675 million breakup fee without having the competing party obligated to fund the payment."

Paz today said Caremark was interpreting that fee as ``a speaking fee" and as ``the price of admission just for having a conversation" about a possible alliance.

Express Scripts Launches Caremark Offer (MRKTWTCH)

CVS says remains committed to deal with PBM Caremark

NEW YORK (MarketWatch) -- Pharmacy-benefit manager Express Scripts Inc. said Tuesday it launched a $25 billion exchange offer for the outstanding shares of larger rival Caremark Rx Inc., pressing ahead after Caremark last week rejected the offer in favor of a deal with drugstore operator CVS Corp.

Under the terms of the deal, St. Louis-based Express Scripts is offering to pay Caremark stockholders $29.25 in cash and 0.426 of a share of Express Scripts for each share of Caremark held. Based on Jan. 12 closing stock prices, Express Scripts said its offer has a value of $56.87 per share, or about $25 billion, and gives Caremark stockholders a 7% premium to the current value of the rival offer from CVS .

For its part, CVS said it remains committed to closing its merger with Caremark in the first quarter. Under the terms of its offer, Caremark shareholders will receive 1.67 shares of CVS for each share of Caremark held.

Express Scripts shares closed up about 1.4%, while Caremark lost about 1% and CVS slipped fractionally.

The offer from Express Scripts and withdrawal rights are scheduled to expire at midnight Eastern Standard Time on Feb. 13, subject to extension.

Last week, Caremark spurned Express Scripts' offer, saying it lacked a "strategic rationale." See full story.

"While we would prefer to meet with the Caremark Board and management to negotiate a transaction ... we are taking this action in light of the Caremark board's rejection of and refusal to even discuss our superior proposal," Express Scripts said in a statement. "We remain committed to pursuing a combination of our two companies to create superior value for our respective stockholders, plan sponsors and patients."

The move is the latest development in the fight for Caremark. In November, Caremark and CVS said they would combine in a "merger of equals." The combined company, to be called CVS/Caremark, would be based in Woonsocket, R.I., where CVS has its headquarters.

Express Scripts, which announced its intention to bid for Caremark in December, has said it would nominate four members to Caremark's board and has asked a Delaware court to void the $675 million breakup fee protecting the Caremark and CVS combination.

Weighing the odds of success

"CVS remains in the driver's seat in this contest with this latest effort no more likely to succeed than the others that have preceded it," Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel wrote in a note to clients.

Heinbockel said key factors are the spread between the two bids as well as antitrust approval and how combining with Caremark would transform the winner's business. The spread on the Express Scripts offer has narrowed from 16% to 7%, he said.

In other words, the bid by Express Scripts "is no longer notably superior" to what CVS has offered, Heinbockel said.

All the same, the closing of a deal with CVS is far from certain. Some industry watchers have said that CVS needs to sweeten its offer in order to get more shareholders on board.

As it is, the companies are promoting the fact they the deal has received antitrust approval and is expected to close by the end of the first quarter.

Express Scripts has just started the antitrust process, Caremark has said, and that proposed deal -- which could meet with antitrust resistance since it would pair up two pharmacy-benefit managers, or PBMs -- has a closing target of the third quarter at the earliest.

The battle comes at a time when health-care costs are rising. The pressure to rein in retail drug prices, however, is increasing as well, and discount retailer Wal-Mart Stores Inc. upped the ante in this market by launching a $4-per-prescription program for certain monthly supplies of generic drugs.

PBMs administer drug-benefit programs for health insurers and employers. Through their mail-order and specialty-pharmacy businesses, PBMs also dispense drugs directly to patients, much like retail pharmacies. Angela Moore is a MarketWatch editor based in New York.

In Search Of . . . Better Ways To Search (WSJ)

By JESSICA E. VASCELLARO

Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Google, Microsoft, Ask.Com Quietly Use Spinoff Sites To Test New Features, Solicit Feedback; Pulling Up Videos

Kevin McCarty, long a devout Google user, recently discovered a search engine he often finds more helpful. It's called SearchMash.com, and unlike Google and other major search sites, it pulls up video, images and text all at the same time.

It turns out, though, that SearchMash is Google. In recent months, the top search engine and its main rivals have stealthily set up a new generation of search engines where they try out new tools and features on consumers -- without putting their tried-and-true formulas at risk. If something proves to be a hit -- the combined search results that Mr. McCarty likes so much, for instance -- it could eventually be folded into the parent site. For now, though, these sites provide an entertaining and even useful glimpse into the evolution of Web, and in particular, search engines, which in their basic operation haven't changed much in years.

Google Inc. launched SearchMash.com in September without the Google name, although it is mentioned in the site's privacy policy. SearchMash displays a subset of the normal Google search results in an entirely different interface with collapsible menus for video, blog and image results on the same screen. In December, IAC/InterActiveCorp.'s Ask.com launched Ask X, which chops up the results page into an unconventional three-panel format. Standard search results are flanked on the left by suggested terms to help you narrow or expand your search and, on the right, by results broken down by categories such as news and dictionary results.

Yahoo Inc. now uses AlltheWeb.com and AltaVista.com, both of which it acquired in recent years, to experiment with processes like livesearch, a feature that will start suggesting search terms for you when you type just one letter. Microsoft Corp.'s Windows Live unit recently launched MsDewey.com, a search engine where users pose their query to prerecorded video clips of an actress playing the role of Ms. Dewey, a brassy and attractive woman in a low-cut black dress. The site is helping Microsoft test users' tolerance for a fancy interface with high-resolution images and audio. In response to a particular search query, Ms. Dewey pipes back with one of some 1,000 scripted responses pegged to what the user typed. (The search results appear on the side). If you search for "President Bush," for instance, one possible response from the actress may be: "Hey there, big guy, watch it ... or maybe I should just turn your name over to the Justice Department."

All of the leading search brands have operated their own internal test sites and labs for years. They frequently test layout and formatting tweaks on their main sites, often without users knowing. But now they are making their bold new ideas more public and asking users for feedback. Ask X links to a feedback form where users can submit random thoughts about the quality of the results. SearchMash devotes space on its results page to a box that asks users to select whether the results in categories like Web, image, blog and video search were useful.

With the exception of MsDewey.com, which is largely for entertainment, the sites aim to test new features that may make search more successful, often hoping to fold them back into core sites if they prove popular. Users don't have to rate the features to try them. Unlike other search sites that ask users to rate the accuracy of results to create a community-driven search formula, these sites generally stick to the same set of search results you would find on the branded site, but package them in new ways. For example, all four search engines so far have resisted combining various types of search -- like image search, video search and local search -- on one screen, worried that consumers would find it too messy.

But the spinoffs are embracing that approach, often displaying results from multiple sources on the same screen. Another theme: trying to better guess users' intentions and help them change their mind without starting their search all over again. Google's SearchMash, which swaps new features in and out every few weeks, has experimented with blending in spell-check adjusted results. Yahoo's livesearch -- which pulls up possible queries before the user is finished typing -- was launched first on AlltheWeb.com and is now on next.yahoo.com, the company's site for test projects.

The companies are starting to show their cards as Internet users demand more than just the basics from Internet search services. After all, the standard search model hasn't changed much in almost a decade. "For 90% of Internet users, search today is exactly like it was in 1998," says Ken Cassar, chief analyst for Nielsen/NetRatings.

But the new content from videos to maps to social networking profiles and the spread of broadband that makes searching it faster has many predicting that radically new approaches to search are just around the corner. "It is still the early days in search and in the user interface," says Justin Osmer, senior product manager for Windows Live.

That sense -- and with paid search spending forecast to climb to $7.6 billion in 2007, according to Jupiter Research -- have motivated a host of start-ups, including a soon-to-be launched search engine from the founder of Wikipedia, called Search Wikia (search.wikia.com).

The companies approach their public testing grounds with varying degrees of secrecy. Google, Yahoo and Microsoft haven't prominently branded the sister sites with their name, although they disclose their affiliations in the "terms and conditions" and privacy policies or in the fine print. The anonymity ensures users aren't potentially biased when they rate results, says Mike Bostock, a software engineer at Google. To further cloak their affiliations, the properties generally have a remarkably different look than the core brands with alternate colors, graphics and fonts.

Ask's approach with Ask X is slightly different. The company plans to use the site, launched in December, as a home for gathering feedback on a variety of possible products before they launch, starting with Web search. The three-panel interface currently being tested is likely to become the backbone of Ask's new home page expected out this year, says Daniel Read, vice president for products and user experience at the company. Ask X also has a video search tool, a feature currently not available through Ask.

Christina Pikas, a 34-year-old librarian, says Ask X surfaces some useful details that are buried in other search engines. When Ms. Pikas of Laurel, Md., recently searched for her last name, Ask X pulled out not only results pertaining to the animal the Pikas, but also a photo, encyclopedia entry, and, to her surprise, a characterization of its kingdom, phylum, class and order. It also found her personal Web page, which was listed a few links below.

A DVD Copy Protection Is Overcome By Hackers (NYT)

By Brad Stone

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 16 — The 2005 science fiction film “Serenity” portrayed a ragtag crew of space pirates fighting to unravel the mysteries of their galaxy.

Reality may now be mimicking fiction.

DOJ_NMG_0117541

Last weekend, a loose-knit coalition of hackers around the world defeated the antipiracy software protecting several high-resolution movies in the HD DVD format. They then began distributing copies of the films — starting with Universal Pictures' "Serenity" — using BitTorrent, a popular file-sharing tool.

The move could send the technology companies behind the new wave of advanced DVDs scrambling back to the drawing board to improve their copy protection, and prompt Hollywood studios to rethink their alliances in the war between the HD DVD and Blu-ray formats.

The HD DVD standard is backed by Toshiba, Microsoft and Intel and uses copy protection technology known as the Advanced Access Content System. The rival Blu-ray format, supported by Sony, Hewlett-Packard and Dell, uses the same system but adds a level of software that acts as a backup when the first level is compromised, so it is considered to be slightly more secure.

A spokeswoman for Universal, the only film studio to back the HD DVD format exclusively, said no executives were available to discuss the HD DVD issue.

The new intrusions came less than a month after a programmer calling himself Muslix64 announced in a Web forum that he had unraveled at least part of the HD DVD protection system. Muslix64 released free software that allows users to insert HD DVDs into their computers and make copies of those films without the original encryption. However, to make it work, users still needed a special title key, generated by the A.A.C.S. software, for each movie they were trying to copy.

Muslix did not provide any title keys — in a sense challenging others to finish his work. On Saturday, the response came in the form of dozens of keys for movies like "King Kong," "Mission Impossible: 3" and "Superman Returns," posted on Web forums like those at Doom9.net. At least two Web sites were created to provide lists of the keys.

Security experts said that the hackers appeared to have discovered the secret keys on their own computers — stashed there by WinDVD, a commercial program for playing DVDs.

Michael Ayers, a lawyer for Toshiba who is chairman of the business group of the trade organization that administers A.A.C.S., acknowledged that the intrusion was serious, but said he viewed it as an attack on DVD-playing software and not the overall protection system for HD DVD.

"It's like somebody picked the lock on an individual house, but he has not discovered the secrets to lock-making at the master padlock company," Mr. Ayers said.

He added that A.A.C.S. was explicitly designed so that compromised players and programs like WinDVD can be disabled remotely by revoking their licenses. He said the A.A.C.S. group might take that approach after an investigation.

Bill Rosenblatt, president of the consulting firm GiantSteps which specializes in content protection issues, said the intrusion was less of a crisis than the 1999 defeat of the encryption that protects standard DVDs, which allowed movie files to be freely copied and shared online.

"It's a pretty nice victory for hackers, but this newer scheme was designed to fail more gracefully and not be as brittle as the DVD scheme," Mr. Rosenblatt said.

However, some security experts said the intrusions were more serious. Bruce Schneier, the chief technology officer of the security company BT Counterpane, said it was unclear what effect revoking licenses would have. If new discs of the movies are updated with new title codes, the old discs in stores will still be vulnerable. And hackers will surely redouble efforts to crack the new discs.

Mr. Schneier said the new DVDs would inevitably be vulnerable to hacking. "Data is inherently copyable, just as water is inherently wet," he said. "All the technology companies are doing is putting in tricks to make it harder to copy. But all they are is tricks."

Nike Appears Primed To Seek Acquisitions (WSJ)

By Paula L. Stepankowsky

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Nike Inc. hasn't made an acquisition since it bought the Starter brand in 2004. But with a lot of cash on its balance sheet, and fast growth in its niche brands, the Beaverton, Ore., athletic footwear and apparel company appears poised to pounce when the time is right.

During the past two years, Nike has focused on internal reorganization and developing its core Nike brand. During its fiscal second-quarter conference call, however, executives appeared more open to the acquisition idea than they have been recently.

"In the past, they've been kind of defensive about acquisitions," said Sara Hasan, an analyst with financial-services firm McAdams Wright Ragen. "But now they are seeing those brands give them additional penetration into new markets."

While Nike continues to see steady growth globally in its Nike brand, the potential for faster growth comes from some of the smaller brands it has bought over the years.

These include Cole Haan for upscale dress shoes, Bauer Nike Hockey, Hurley International for the surf/skate market, Converse, and Starter, which has been renamed Exeter Brands, for the discount market. Nike developed its golf business internally.

"With the Nike brand mature and few opportunities to grow in the double digits except BRIC (Brazil, Russia, India and China) countries, this is the area of their business that will provide them with higher growth," said Kate McShane, an analyst for Citigroup.

Revenue for non-Nike brands in the 2007 fiscal second quarter grew 21% to $526.8 million from $434.8 million last year. Pretax income increased 136% to $54.3 million for the quarter. For the company overall in the same quarter, revenue grew 10% to $3.8 billion, while net income rose 8% to $325.6 million.

Nike has pleased investors by buying back about 1.47 million shares for about $126 million in the second quarter as part of the company's four-year, $3 billion share-repurchase program approved in June 2006. In November, Nike increased its dividend by 19%.

The company also counted cash and short-term investments of $1.9 billion at the end of the second quarter.

"There has been a lot of speculation about what Nike may do with the cash hoard they are sitting on besides buy back shares and increase the dividend," said John Shanley, an analyst with Susquehanna Financial Group.

A Nike spokesman said the company doesn't comment on speculation.

But on Nike's fiscal 2007 conference call last month, Chief Executive Mark Parker said the company is actively looking for acquisitions, although it has "nothing specific on the radar screen right now."

"In our history, it's safe to say we've been more reactive, but now we're taking a more active view," Mr. Parker said during the call. "We're looking at underpenetrated segments where we feel we can add some value."

Nike has mentioned interest in the outdoor sector, as well as the action/sports sector.

The company has pursued the outdoor segment with its All Condition Gear division, and the surf/skate sector with Hurley. While these have done well, they haven't been huge successes, Ms. McShane said.

"There are certain industries where you need credibility and authenticity," Ms. McShane said.

While some have speculated that Nike might be interested in acquiring a large company like Germany's Puma AG Rudolf Dassler Sport or Columbia Sportswear Co. of Portland, Ore., analysts don't believe such a move is likely.

Mr. Shanley said Puma's ownership structure, dominated by insiders and two German banks, make it unlikely the company will fall into non-German hands.

Columbia Sportswear would be an expensive acquisition, and the founding Boyle family has a large ownership stake, making it unlikely an acquisition will take place, analysts said.

Outdoor footwear company Timberland Co. is a possibility, although a shift in fashion away from bulky boots, and the expense of acquiring Timberland would be stoppers, Mr. Shanley said. Nike would have to pay a premium of 20% to 25% over Timberland's roughly $2 billion market cap to make it work. Timberland is based in Stratham, N.H.

Under Armour Inc. would also be an expensive acquisition and duplicates existing Nike product lines, analysts say.

Rather than making large acquisitions, Nike is likely to look at smaller companies that can benefit from its marketing muscle.

A case in point is Converse, which saw sales jump from $200 million to nearly $600 million since Nike bought it, Mr. Shanley said.

Smaller-brands analysts say possible Nike matches include urban boot and footwear maker Lugz Shoes, snowboard and apparel company Burton, hybrid footwear-maker Keen Footwear, and Wolverine World Wide Inc., which makes the Merrell and Hush Puppies brands. An accessory maker like New Era Cap Co. is also a possibility, analysts said.

Cablevision Board Rejects Offer By The Dolans (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

The board of the Cablevision Systems Corporation rejected an $8.9 billion offer yesterday to sell the company to the Dolans, its founding family.

The rebuff was a rare example of a board standing up to and denying a request by a controlling shareholder.

The rejection by the board, which set up a special committee to review the Dolans' proposal, is the second time it has refused to sell the company to the family.

DOJ_NMG_0117543

In 2005, the Dolans, led by the founder, Charles F. Dolan, and his son James, offered to break the company in two and buy Cablevision's cable television assets. But they were forced to withdraw the offer before the board formally rejected it.

The Dolans' latest effort, though, was much more public, and at times it appeared acrimonious. Rather than withdraw its offer when told it would be rejected, the family increased its bid last Friday by about $1 billion and tried to put pressure on the board by setting a deadline tomorrow, declaring that the proposal was its "best and final" offer.

In rejecting the bid, the board said in a letter to the family that the offer "does not represent fair value for the company's public shareholders nor does it contemplate a transaction that is in their best interest."

It said it had warned the family that it would reject the bid, noting that "indications were given" about the "the inadequacy of the prior proposal" and that the directors had provided "general guidance" about how much the family would need to pay to strike a deal.

A spokesman for the Dolans declined to comment last night.

Yesterday's decision leaves the company publicly owned but at the mercy of the Dolan family, which owns 20 percent of Cablevision equity and controls 70.4 percent of the voting power.

With little chance of a sale of the company to anyone else, Cablevision's future remains clouded. Some analysts last night questioned why the Dolans did not bring in a private equity firm as a partner to allow them to increase their bid further.

Investors have worried for weeks that the Dolans would buy the company at a steep discount to its value.

While the Dolans had offered $30 a share, most analysts estimate that the company would be worth at least $40 a share if it were put up for auction. When the Dolan family made its bid, it insisted that it would not sell the company to anyone besides itself.

"It's a corporate governance victory," said Richard Greenfield, an analyst at Pali Research, who wrote a note to investors last week titled, "Do Not Let Chuck and Jim Dolan Steal CVC."

"This is exactly what the independent committee should have done," Mr. Greenfield said. "The price was not fair for shareholders. If they had put it up for auction, it would have fetched far more."

In his note, he suggested that the company was worth at least $33.50 a share and said that there was "a strong likelihood of a Time Warner Cable takeover attempt over the next 12-18 months."

Time Warner has long been mentioned as a potential suitor because Cablevision's systems, which are centered in New York suburbs, fit neatly into Time Warner's regional network.

Some cable industry analysts speculated last night that the Dolans might attempt to raise the offer while also orchestrating a sale of assets — perhaps some cable networks — or trying to close some start-ups like the Fuse network, that are part of efforts to develop business. By doing either, the Dolans could keep the debt-to-cash flow levels acceptable to the banks.

The push by the Dolans comes as enthusiasm for cable companies has rebounded. Only a year ago, investors were concerned that as telephone companies entered the video market the value of distribution assets would fall. But perception has shifted, and many investors now argue that rival services to cable TV will materialize slowly and that cable is still the best-positioned rival to the phone companies and satellite TV.

With the recent boom in buyouts led by management, shareholders have become increasingly anxious about whether their interests are being properly represented and whether a board's links to management might be too cozy. For instance, when the energy company Kinder Morgan was sold to a group led by its founder, Richard D. Kinder, shareholders were irate about what they considered a sweetheart deal.

The special committee in this case was Thomas V. Reifenheiser, a former media banker at Chase who had represented Cablevision, and a retired Navy vice admiral, John R. Ryan, who is chancellor of the State University of New York. Both joined the board in 2002, and neither is a personal friend of the family.

The committee was advised by Lehman Brothers and Morgan Stanley. Its legal adviser was the firm of Willkie Farr & Gallagher.

Oil Lease Chief Knew Of Error, Report Asserts (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117544

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — A top Interior Department official was told nearly three years ago about a legal blunder that allowed drilling companies to avoid billions of dollars in payments for oil and gas pumped from publicly owned waters, a report by the department's chief independent investigator has found.

The report, which was sent lawmakers on Tuesday, suggested that Interior officials could have fixed the mistake far more easily if they had taken action when they first recognized it. Oil and gas prices were far lower than they are today.

The report contradicts statements by the official, Johnnie M. Burton, the director of the department's Minerals Management Service, who told a House hearing last September that she first learned about the royalties problem in January 2006.

Confronted by e-mail messages from subordinates from early 2004, the report said, Ms. Burton conceded that she probably had been told earlier, but "did not remember putting a great deal of thought into the matter."

Investigators calculated that the government could have collected an additional $865 million in the last three years alone if officials had told companies drilling in the Gulf of Mexico that they owed all the royalties required on oil and coal extracted from federal waters.

Unless the leases are changed, administration officials expect the mistake to cost billions of dollars in royalties that drilling companies usually are required to pay the federal government for oil and gas pumped from the gulf.

The report is the result of a nine-month investigation by the Interior Department's inspector general in response to questions raised by the Senate Energy Committee and the House Natural Resources Committee. It will be the focus of a hearing Thursday by Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico and chairman of the Senate Energy Committee.

And while the report confirms that the original leasing blunders were made under the Clinton administration, it provides new details about the reluctance of the Bush administration to discuss the issue publicly or find a fix for the problem for nearly six years.

At issue are more than 1,000 offshore drilling leases for the gulf that the Interior Department signed in 1998 and 1999, during the Clinton administration.

The government offered drillers lucrative "royalty relief," a holiday from the standard 12 percent royalty, as an incentive to increase exploration and production in waters that were thousands of feet deep.

But as a result of what investigators believe was bureaucratic bumbling, the leases for 1998 and 1999 omitted a standard escape clause that rescinded the special inducements if oil prices climbed above $34 a barrel.

Midlevel officials at Interior spotted the omission in 2000, and quietly made sure to include the escape clause in all subsequent leases. But no one tried to fix the leases that had already been signed, and almost no one talked about them until oil prices started to climb above $34 a barrel in 2004.

At a hearing of the House Government Reform Committee last September, Ms. Burton testified that she had first learned about the problem in late 2005 or January 2006. Ms. Burton and other senior officials publicly confirmed the error in February 2006, after The New York Times published an article about it.

But investigators have unearthed a series of e-mail messages by officials working under Ms. Burton in March 2004. At the time, energy prices had recently climbed above the thresholds that were supposed to stop the incentives, and oil companies were pressing the Interior Department to confirm how it would treat the leases from 1998 and 1999.

Marshall Rose, chief economist for the Minerals Management Service, wrote the agency's associate director at the time, Thomas Readinger, that the decision had to be made by the "directorate" — Ms. Burton and her top deputies.

Mr. Rose told Mr. Readinger that he believed the leases entitled companies to the incentive regardless of oil price levels, and that he had told his own subordinates that "you and the director were aware of the need to make a decision on this matter." Mr. Readinger, who retired last year, responded to Mr. Rose a few hours later by writing, "Sounds like we have an answer. Let's go with it."

According to the report, Mr. Readinger told investigators "he was sure" that he had discussed the issue with Ms. Burton.

Ms. Burton, after seeing the e-mail messages from her subordinates and with Mr. Readinger's recollections, told the investigators that Mr. Readinger "must have mentioned the issue to her at that time," the report said.

In a written statement Tuesday night, the Minerals Management Service said Ms. Burton did not deny but could not remember being told about the mistake three years ago.

"Director Burton responded that if an employee said that to her, it was likely true but she could not remember the event nor the circumstances," the agency said.

Walter Cruickshank, Ms. Burton's deputy director, originally told investigators he had first learned about the problem around January 2006. But investigators found an e-mail message by Mr. Cruickshank from 2000 in which he said the provisions had been "inadvertently omitted" from leases in 1998 and 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0117545

Shown his own messages, Mr. Cruickshank told investigators that "he did not remember" the discussion, but he was "probably in the room during the meeting" at which it took place.

On Thursday, House Democrats hope to pass a bill that would put a heavy tax on companies that refuse to change their leases and would repeal several other tax breaks and royalty incentives for companies that drill in deep waters.

White House Denies Climate Change U-turn (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, January 17, 2007

The White House on Tuesday denied it was planning a U-turn on its climate change policy by embracing a system of formal caps on greenhouse emissions, despite rising pressure from European governments to change its stance.

Although energy security will be a key theme in President George W. Bush's State of the Union address next week, the White House issued an unusually public rebuttal of rumours about its climate change policy. Tony Snow, White House spokesman, said: "I want to walk you back from the whole carbon cap story...The carbon cap stuff is not accurate. It's wrong."

International pressure for Mr Bush to consider reducing US emissions via a form of "cap and trade" system like that in force in the European Union has intensified. The issue has been raised in the last two weeks by Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, and José Manuel Barroso, European Commission president. Tony Blair, the British premier, has also been persistent in lobbying the president.

The Bush administration has consistently stressed technological solutions, rather than formal treaties such as the Kyoto accord. Mr Snow said: "What the president has talked about all along is the importance of innovation," adding there was a need to focus on change "consistent with economic growth".

After meeting Ms Merkel, Mr Bush said he would focus on "technological developments that will enable us to be good stewards of the environment, and enable us to become less dependent on oil and hydrocarbons from parts of the world that may not like us".

The president is also under pressure at home. Last Friday six US senators – including two presidential hopefuls for 2008, the Republican John McCain and the Democrat Barack Obama – presented a cap and trade proposal to force industries, such as electricity utilities, to cut by 2050 greenhouse gas emissions to one third of the levels of 2000.

White House officials remain privately sceptical about a British report produced in October by Sir Nicholas Stern on the economics of climate change, suggesting it would be wrong to make big decisions based on what some officials dismiss as "popular science". Mr Stern is due to testify next month before a Senate committee that will address emissions legislation.

Bush Set Against Carbon Emission Limits (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

The White House said yesterday that President Bush has ruled out Kyoto-style caps on carbon emissions as the solution to global warming, rejecting the proposal favored by Democrats and most European leaders.

Spokesman Tony Snow said Mr. Bush will lay out his new climate-change policy in his State of the Union address next week, but sources familiar with the drafting of the speech said the president will argue that global warming can be better addressed through technology and greater use of renewable energy sources than through caps imposed on businesses and industries.

Analysts and observers have speculated for months that Mr. Bush is due for a change in his global-warming policy, not least because some of his top advisers, including Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., support such a move.

Reports from London this week said British officials were predicting Mr. Bush would adopt mandatory carbon caps, the type of solution called for in the Kyoto Protocol negotiated by President Clinton but rejected by Mr. Bush.

Yesterday, though, Mr. Snow shot those reports down. "That's not something we're talking about," he said.

Michael McKenna, a Republican strategist and lobbyist on energy issues, said Mr. Bush will continue and expand his policy of pushing technology and renewable energy fuels, such as ethanol.

"What he's doing is simply amping up what he has said all along -- that the answer to this thing is technology, technology that gets developed as quickly as possible and shared as quickly as possible," Mr. McKenna said.

After years of calling for more science on the issue, Mr. Bush announced last year that he has concluded humans are a component of global warming. But he also has concluded that mandatory Kyoto-style caps -- which set a limit for carbon emissions, which are cited by many scientists as the cause of global warming -- wouldn't work and would harm the U.S economy.

DOJ_NMG_0117546

Mr. Bush also argues that the Kyoto Protocol fails because it doesn't include developing nations such as China and India. That was also one of the primary reasons the treaty was rebuffed 95-0 by the Senate in July 1997 in a sense of the Senate resolution and was never submitted for ratification.

Mr. Bush has pushed for international cooperation to encourage transfer of clean technology to those nations as an alternative to mandatory caps.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said that his party will work with Mr. Bush on the issue, but that the president has been in "a state of denial with respect to global warming."

For months, there has been a debate inside the administration about which path Mr. Bush should follow, but Mr. McKenna said the speech will end that -- and signal a victory for those who oppose Kyoto-style caps.

"It is going to be an implicit rebuke to folks ... who are pressing for mandates. It's really going to be sort of a relatively clear restatement of 'Here's how I think we should go about this,' " Mr. McKenna said.

Mr. Snow said that Mr. Bush has committed $29 billion to climate science and clean-energy technology, and that although funding for climate research at NASA is falling, the budget for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration is increasing.

"We're not only putting more money into it, but we're also trying to figure out ways to use technology so that you can handle the complex business of trying to measure and characterize changes in global temperature to try to figure out what the precise causes are," he said.

Bush Prepares State Of The Union Address (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 17, 2007

President Bush, already facing fierce opposition to his decision to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, will confront a tough audience next Tuesday when he delivers his State of the Union address to the first Democratic Congress in 12 years.

Reducing U.S. dependence on foreign oil and supporting alternative fuels are expected to be prominent themes of his speech. Bush also will challenge Congress to fix Social Security's long-term solvency problem, find a way to compromise on immigration and preserve tax cuts. Lawmakers also will be listening for hints of what he might veto.

Republicans see the speech as a chance for Bush to put a wide-angle lens on the nation's problems, taking the focus away from Iraq. Still, the war's shadow will hang over the joint session of Congress when Bush speaks.

Democratic Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, whose upset victory over Republican Sen. George Allen was the decisive race that gave Democrats control of Congress in last year's midterm elections, will give the Democratic response to Bush's address. The selection was made Tuesday by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, said Webb spokeswoman Jessica Smith.

A former Navy secretary to President Reagan and a decorated Marine combat veteran of the Vietnam War, Webb was among the earliest and most vocal opponents of Bush's decision to invade Iraq. His son is in the Marines, serving in Iraq.

During the nationally televised address, Bush will be flanked by Vice President Dick Cheney and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, sitting like symbolic bookends of the political divide over the war and other issues.

"Probably the most interesting part of the speech is going to be the tone," said presidential speech expert Kathleen Hall Jamieson, who directs the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania.

"Pelosi is going to be signaling the Democrats by when she applauds and when she doesn't, and Cheney is going to be signaling the Republicans," she said. "In parts where Bush seems more accommodating than Cheney might like, what are Cheney's nonverbal cues going to say to the public?"

Pelosi said Monday that Democrats will counter Bush's proposal to send more troops to Iraq with a plan changing the U.S. mission there "from combat to training, to fighting terrorism, to protecting our forces."

"We are saying to the president, 'What you are doing, first and foremost, has cost over 3,000 lives, every one of them precious to us,'" Pelosi said at a Martin Luther King Jr. Day speech in San Francisco. "The president does not have a plan. Democrats will hold him accountable."

Bush could use his speech to challenge war critics to propose a plan of their own. But he'll leave room to cover domestic issues and other foreign policy concerns such as North Korea and Iran's nuclear programs. The costs of the war and the deficit will likely preclude him from announcing expensive new initiatives.

While one team of writers was working on the Iraq speech Bush gave last week, those charged with crafting Bush's sixth State of the Union address were continuing the work they began months ago. White House officials say Bush has met with the speechwriters and given them direction, but the staff is not yet editing drafts of the address.

"President Bush will use the State of the Union to unveil a positive, comprehensive agenda that will improve the daily lives of the American people and explain how our actions in the world will make our nation safer and better," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said.

In a recent speech, Al Hubbard, chairman of the National Economic Council, predicted Bush will generate "headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off in terms of our commitment to energy independence."

The hint was that Bush, who exclaimed in his 2006 State of the Union address that America is "addicted to oil," is ready to pump more tax dollars into finding alternative sources of energy and developing domestic production of oil.

The White House has expressed interest in a recent government energy report that calls for the United States to produce more biofuels made from corn, wood chips and switchgrass. The report says the U.S. goal should be to produce 13 billion gallons of biofuels by 2015 — up from 1.1 billion gallons when Bush took office.

At this time last year, Bush was driving toward an election in which Republican control of Congress was at stake. This year, he'll speak for the first time to a Congress led by the opposition party.

Last year, he rebuked critics of his stay-the-course strategy in Iraq, where more than 2,240 American troops had died. This year, he'll defend his new strategic plan in Iraq, where the U.S. death toll now exceeds 3,000.

Last year, Bush was a politically weakened president with a job approval rating of 40 percent. This time, he's weaker. The most recent AP-Ipsos poll shows the president's overall job approval rating at 32 percent.

Congress' approval rating isn't any better, also at 32 percent.

Bush has pledged to work more closely with Democrats and has signaled a willingness to compromise on some issues of interest to both parties.

Webb To Give State Of The Union Response (AP)

AP, January 17, 2007

Freshman Sen. Jim Webb, a Vietnam War veteran, will deliver the official Democratic response to President Bush's State of the Union Address, where the war in Iraq is expected to be a central topic.

As a combat veteran, Webb, D-Va., "understands personally how crucial it is to find a new direction in Iraq and begin to bring the war to a close," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Tuesday in announcing their choice of Webb to respond to Bush's Jan. 23 address to Congress.

Webb, 60, a former Marine who served as Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, upset incumbent Sen. George Allen, R-Va., in the November election, helping the Democrats capture a slender majority in the Senate.

Webb Tapped For Democrats' State Of The Union Response (CQ)

By Greg Giroux

Congressional Quarterly, January 17, 2007

Newly elected Virginia Sen. Jim Webb — an early opponent of the Iraq war, a critic of President Bush's current proposal to increase troop strength there, and a vocal advocate of economic populism — will deliver the Democratic Party's response to Bush's State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

Webb's political credentials and background in the military surely were the major factors in the decision by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada to choose Webb for the role.

Webb's defeat of Republican Sen. George Allen last November clinched a Democratic Senate majority, installing Reid in his role as the top-ranking senator.

And with Bush pressing his plan to add more than 20,000 U.S. military personnel to the current troop commitment in Iraq — in the face of strong public opposition to the war — Webb emerged as a natural spokesman for the Democrats' contrary views.

Webb is a Vietnam War veteran and a former Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan, who only in recent years has broken longstanding ties with the Republican Party — mainly because of his disagreements with the Bush administration's Iraq policy.

In September 2002, Webb expressed his misgivings about an invasion of Iraq in a Washington Post opinion piece entitled, "Heading for Trouble; Do We Really Want to Occupy Iraq for the Next 30 Years?" This was published a few weeks before the Senate, then narrowly controlled by Democrats, and the Republican-controlled House overwhelmingly passed the resolution sought by Bush that authorized military operations in Iraq.

Throughout his Senate campaign — which was his debut as a candidate for public office — Webb called for a region-wide Middle Eastern political solution to the crisis, involving countries that are historically and politically invested in a stable Iraq.

But even though Webb's views on Iraq and other national security got the most attention, his campaign for the Senate and his agenda as a new lawmaker are hardly uni-dimensional.

During the campaign, Webb also promoted "economic fairness" proposals that would arrest stagnating wage growth for many Americans and ameliorate a growing gap in compensation between executives and workers. Webb emphasized these populist tenets in a speech last Thursday to the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank. [Please LINK to http://www.cqpolitics.com/2007/01/webbs_economic_fairness_marked.html]

Webb's remarks will mark the second consecutive year that a Virginia Democrat will be delivering the party's official response to Bush's annual message to Congress. In 2006, Democratic Gov. Tim Kaine — elected to his office in 2005 — delivered the party's response.

This is symbolic of Democratic inroads in conservative-leaning Virginia that can be traced to the 2001 victory for governor by Mark Warner, who was highly popular during his single four-year term. Virginia is the only state in which the governor is barred from serving two consecutive terms, though a former governor can come back and seek the office again in a later election.

Despite big wins by Warner, Kaine and Webb, though, Republicans still maintain the state's other Senate seat, held by the long-tenured John W. Warner (no relation to Mark Warner); an 8-3 edge in the state's U.S. House delegation; and sizable majorities in the state legislature.

Webb Picked To Give Democrats' Response To Bush (WP)

By Tim Craig

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Virginia Sen. James Webb, a former Marine elected in November after vehemently opposing the Iraq war, will give the Democratic response to President Bush's State of the Union speech next week, party leaders announced yesterday.

Webb's five-minute speech Tuesday will mark the second consecutive year that a Virginia Democrat has been selected to respond to the president. Timothy M. Kaine (D), then Virginia's newly elected governor, gave the response last year.

The selection of Webb by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) underscores the party's efforts to counteract Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq at a time when opinion polls show most Americans want to begin exploring ways to bring more troops home.

Webb, a former secretary of the Navy who has a son in Iraq, has been one of the Bush administration's most vocal foreign policy critics. Webb has stopped short of calling for an immediate withdrawal, but wants to start repositioning troops to other Arab nations to get them out of harm's way.

"I ran for the Senate to bring an experienced set of eyes to the problems that face our country, ranging from the need for a new direction in Iraq to assuring economic fairness for American workers," Webb said.

On the campaign trail, Webb was fond of saying Bush was going to wake up the day after the election and say "we've got a problem" because the Democrats are in charge.

Webb's upset victory over former senator George Allen (R) provided Democrats with the sixth seat they needed to take control of the Senate. "In a call echoed by Americans across this nation, the people of Virginia sent Senator Webb to Congress to help take our country in a new direction," Reid and Pelosi said in a joint statement.

Webb serves on the Senate Foreign Relations, Armed Services, Joint Economic and Veterans Affairs Committees. At a Foreign Relations Committee hearing on Iraq last week, Webb chastised the decision to go to war.

"We went to war in Iraq recklessly; we must move forward responsibly. The war's costs to our nation have been staggering. These costs encompass what we hold to be most precious: the blood of our citizens. They also extend to the many thousands more Iraqi people killed and wounded as their country slides into the chaos of sectarian violence and civil war."

Several Democrats said the decision to have two Virginia lawmakers in a row give the speech highlights the party's efforts to continue to make inroads into what has long been a conservative-leaning state. Some political observers believe Virginia could be competitive in the 2008 presidential race, even though the state has not voted for a Democrat for president since 1964.

"It's a wonderful recognition of the state of the Virginia Democratic Party," said Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Arlington), chairman of the House Democratic caucus.

Webb To Give Response To State Of The Union (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

National Democratic leaders have selected Virginia Sen. James H. Webb Jr. to deliver the party's response to President Bush's State of the Union address next week.

DOJ_NMG_0117549

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Mr. Webb, a Vietnam War veteran, "understands personally how crucial it is to find a new direction in Iraq and begin to bring the war to a close." Mr. Webb's son, Jimmy, is a Marine serving in Iraq.

"In a call echoed by Americans across this nation, the people of Virginia sent Senator Webb to Congress to help take our country in a new direction," Mr. Reid and Mrs. Pelosi said. "Senator Webb represents the sweeping demand for leaders who will put aside gridlock in Washington to deliver change at home and abroad."

A former Navy secretary and early-warning voice against the 2003 Iraq invasion, Mr. Webb said he was honored to deliver the response and hoped Bush would discuss "fresh, creative solutions" that would "move the country forward."

"I ran for the United States Senate to bring an experienced set of eyes to the problems that face our country, ranging from the need for a new direction in Iraq to assuring economic fairness for American workers," Mr. Webb said.

Since ousting Sen. George Allen in November, Mr. Webb has continued to question Mr. Bush's handling of the war, including the recent decision to send 21,500 additional troops to the region.

Mr. Webb's selection to deliver the response also has fueled further speculation that Democrats plan to push harder to win Virginia, known as a "red state," in the 2008 presidential election.

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine delivered the Democratic response to the State of the Union last year.

Craig Shirley, a Republican strategist, said Democrats are smart to select Mr. Webb because it helps them get away from the perception that liberals from northern "blue states," such as Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, rule the national party.

"Choosing Denver for the Democratic convention [in 2008] is the right thing to do, and picking centrist Democrats from red states is the right thing to do," Mr. Shirley said. "Democrats want to widen their mainstream appeal, and one way to do that is to send a message to the rest of the world that they are drawing a spokesman for a red state that has elected quote-unquote moderate Democrats."

Dave Saunders, a Democratic strategist working for presidential contender and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, seemed to agree.

"If the Democrats are trying to remove the [weak] factor from the public perception, they sent the right guy out there because [Mr. Webb] is a pure man," he said.

Mr. Webb's win tipped control of the U.S. Senate to Democrats and marked the party's third consecutive victory in prominent statewide elections. It also stung Virginia Republicans, many of whom considered Mr. Allen their party's modern-day patriarch.

Republicans and Democrats now say Virginia will be a battleground in the 2008 presidential election.

"In 2008, Democrats will come hard after Virginia's 13 Electoral College votes," Ed Gillespie, state Republican party chairman, said last week. "John Kerry's campaign was here through July of 2004, and I guarantee you the Democrats' nominee will stay through November in 2008, and we will know the joys of target-state status every time we turn on our television."

Virginia has been a Republican stronghold in previous presidential contests. The last time the state supported a Democrat for president was in 1964, when President Johnson defeated Sen. Barry Goldwater, Arizona Republican.

"For Democrats to take Virginia in '08 would be nothing less than astonishing, but I think it is possible," Mr. Shirley said.

Virginia's Feb. 12, 2008 presidential primary also could play a hand in deciding the party's nominee if a clear front-runner does not emerge from the January caucuses and primaries in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

Bush Vs. Webb, Round 2 (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 17, 2007

The freshman senator who confronted President Bush face to face on the war in Iraq last month will again rebut the White House before millions of viewers, as Democratic leaders yesterday tapped Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) to deliver their party's response to the State of the Union address on Tuesday.

Webb will be the second rising Virginian in a row to deliver the Democratic response, following Gov. Tim Kaine (D), who gave the traditional high-profile speech last year. But Webb will bring a unique vantage point on the war as a military expert who served as Navy secretary under President Reagan and did not flinch from challenging Bush to begin troop withdrawal during a visit just after Webb unseated Sen. George Allen (R).

"As a combat veteran, he understands personally how crucial it is to find a new direction in Iraq and to bring the war to a close," Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said in a joint statement on Webb's selection.

BP Failed To Emphasize Safety At U.S. Plants Before Deadly Explosion, Panel Report Says (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Porretto, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

(AP) - HOUSTON-British oil company BP failed to emphasize safety at its U.S. refineries before the 2005 Texas City explosion that killed 15, according to a report released Tuesday by an independent panel led by former U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III.

The panel, in a statement summarizing its 300-plus page report on BP PLC's operations, said the company had made strides in personal accident prevention but came up short on the bigger picture.

"The panel maintains a central theme that prior to the Texas City tragedy BP emphasized personal safety and had achieved significant improvements in personal injury rates, but the company did not emphasize process safety," the statement said. "BP mistakenly interpreted improving personal injury rates as an indication of acceptable process safety performance at its U.S. refineries."

The 11-member panel made 10 recommendations, including that an independent monitor report to the company's board of directors for five years.

"BP gets it and I get it, too," BP CEO John Browne told reporters by video link from London. "I recognize the need for improvement."

Browne, who got the report from Baker on Sunday, called the report a "hard-hitting and critical analysis that focused on deficiencies and negatives."

Browne defended the company's overall safety record, which the Baker report acknowledged was sufficient in terms of personal injury prevention and environmental safety.

But on so-called process safety, "it wasn't excellent enough," Browne said. "And the standard is excellence."

The chief executive said the company would implement the panel's recommendations, including the independent monitor. But he said the company needs to compare Baker's report with a companywide safety examination that began soon after the Texas City explosion and gave no time frame for making the changes Baker's group suggested.

Baker has led the panel investigating corporate management at Houston-based BP Products North America following the March 2005 blast that killed 15 people and injured more than 170 others.

The U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, known as the CSB, urged BP in August 2005 to hire outside experts to look at the company's oversight of safety management systems and make its findings public - similar to an investigation at NASA following the space shuttle Columbia tragedy.

The panel, announced in October 2005, has traveled to BP's five U.S. refineries and interviewed hundreds of employees.

"BP tended to have a short-term focus in its U.S. refining operations, and its decentralized management system and entrepreneurial culture delegated substantial discretion to U.S. refinery plant managers without clearly defining process safety expectations, responsibilities or accountabilities," the panel said in the report.

Baker, a senior partner at the Houston-based Baker Botts law firm, was White House chief of staff and treasury secretary in the Reagan administration and secretary of state in the first Bush administration. The release of the BP report was twice delayed because of his work with the Iraq Study Group, which made its recommendations to President George W. Bush last month on how to revamp U.S. policy in Iraq.

The release of the report comes less than a week after London-based BP said Chief Executive John Browne would step down by the end of July, more than a year ahead of schedule.

BP said Friday that Browne, 58, will be succeeded by Tony Hayward, the head of exploration and production, who will assume the task of trying to repair the company's reputation with the public and investors. Problems stem from a series of well-publicized mishaps that include the Texas explosion and last year's giant oil spill in Alaska.

Browne said Tuesday the report had "nothing to do" with his decision to retire earlier than expected, noting that he decided in December that when the company's board found a successor, he would step aside.

John Manzoni, the company's head of refining and marketing, said Tuesday he had no plans to resign.

The 2005 explosion has so far cost the company around $2 billion (â‚¬1.54 billion) in compensation payouts, repairs and lost profits. BP has settled hundreds of lawsuits related to the accident, putting aside $1.6 billion (â‚¬1.24 billion) just to resolve legal disputes.

Based on its investigation, the CSB has criticized BP for its safety systems at Texas City, about 40 miles (65 kilometers) southeast of Houston, finding the company fostered bad management at the plant and failed to fix problems.

DOJ_NMG_0117551

In September 2005, the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration found BP committed more than 300 willful violations of its rules and fined the company $21.3 million (â,¬16.5 million).

BP's own December 2005 report blamed failures by management at the refinery, saying it didn't make safety a priority, tolerated risks and failed to communicate. But BP added it "found no evidence of anyone consciously or intentionally taking actions or decisions that put others at risk."

The CSB has credited BP for cooperating with its investigation, making sweeping changes in how it recognizes potential hazards and hiring the Baker panel.

BP has said it will invest about $1 billion (â,¬770 million) over five years to improve and maintain the Texas City site. BP also operates refineries in California, Indiana, Washington and Ohio.

BP shares fell 1.5 percent to close at 541 pence ($10.62, â,¬8.20) on the London Stock Exchange.

Panel Criticizes BP Safety Efforts (HC)

By Anne Belli And Brett Clanton, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 17, 2007

Sources say the Baker-led group found the oil giant ignored broader refinery problems

BP's most senior executives failed to emphasize the importance of safe operations within their U.S. refineries, resulting in widespread problems throughout the plants, a harshly worded and highly critical report released today says.

Federal investigators have said such problems have led to the March 2005 blast in Texas City, where 15 people were killed and scores more injured.

However, the report's authors said their goal was not to affix blame for the accident. Rather, it was to evaluate BP's corporate safety culture and its oversight of safety management programs at its five U.S. refineries.

The report was prepared by an independent safety review panel chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. The panel is made up of 11 people with expertise ranging from process safety to risk management to nuclear power.

The report says BP's board should appoint an independent monitor to routinely report back over the next five years on progress the company is making toward implementing 10 recommendations being made by the panel.

The panel found no evidence, though, that BP purposely turned a blind eye toward operational safety or intentionally short-changed safety.

Instead, it found that BP chiefs were focused on personal safety statistics concerning such minor accidents as slip and falls and vehicle collisions. Meanwhile, they were oblivious to the broader problems brewing in operations, which the panel refers to as "process safety," at all five of their domestic refineries.

"Based on its review, the panel believes that BP has not provided effective process safety leadership and has not adequately established process safety as a core value across all its five U.S. refineries," the panel's report said.

The lapse has resulted in a scatter-shot safety culture that is different at each of the five factories.

In a press conference Tuesday morning, in which the report was made public, Baker said if BP implements the panel's recommendations, it could become an industry leader in process safety. But he cautioned that the "ultimate effectiveness of the company's commitment to process safety can only be determined over time."

In a statement Tuesday morning, BP said it takes the panel's findings seriously. The company said it already has taken steps to address issues raised in the panel's recommendations and "after a more thorough review" will develop plans for additional action at its U.S. refineries.

"Many of the Panel's recommendations are consistent with the findings of our own internal reviews," said BP Group Chief Executive John Browne. "As a result, we have been in action on many of their recommendations for a year or more. Our progress has been encouraging but there is much more to do."

BP announced last week that Browne, the embattled company head, will move up his retirement from 2008 to this summer.

The Texas City explosion occurred as workers were restarting a unit after a maintenance shutdown. Federal investigators looking into causes of the blast have said that malfunctioning equipment, poor communication between workers and managers, outdated or nonexistent safety plans, even worker fatigue were contributing factors.

Although their final report isn't due out for two months, the U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board last year urged BP to create an independent panel to review the corporate safety culture after finding evidence that management may have a lax attitude toward process.

BP acknowledged last year in its own final investigation report that upper management seemed more concerned about personal safety statistics than process safety. And it has said it has worked to make managers more accountable for the kinds of mishaps that can lead to explosions.

DOJ_NMG_0117552

In addition to the Texas City plant, BP operates refineries in Whiting, Ind.; Carson, Calif.; Cherry Point, Wash.; and Toledo, Ohio. The Texas City site is the largest refinery in BP's portfolio.

Last month, in what the panel described as an "encouraging" sign, BP said C.J. Warner, a regional vice president for health, safety and the environment, would become BP's new refining global vice president. She replaces Mike Hoffman, who will leave the company on April 30.

BP Rejects 'profits Above Safety' Accusation (FT)

Financial Times, January 17, 2007

BP on Tuesday night hit back at suggestions it put profits over safety after a damning independent report found "material deficiencies" and systemic problems in stewardship of all five of its US refineries.VIDEO ANALYSIS

Ed Crooks, Energy editor, on the Baker report and its implications for BP

A panel led by James Baker, former US secretary of state, commissioned after the fatal 2005 Texas City refinery explosion, identified a series of weaknesses in BP's safety practices. "Significant process safety culture issues exist at each refinery, not just the Texas City facility," it said.

The explosion killed 15 people and 170 were injured. It was America's worst industrial accident in a decade.

The panel's 374-page report was intended to make recommendations about all BP's US refineries. It refrained from criticising individuals but it said Lord Browne – who made the surprise announcement last week he would step down in July and hand over to Tony Hayward – was "instrumental in shaping BP's corporate culture".

It added: "While BP has an aspirational goal of 'no accidents, no harm to people' BP has not provided effective leadership in making certain its management and US refining workforce understand what is expected of them regarding process safety. The panel believes that BP has not provided effective process safety leadership and has not adequately established process safety as a core value."

Lord Browne – who denied his early departure was prompted by the report – said: "If I had to say one thing which I hope you will all hear today it is this: BP gets it. And I get it too." He denied cost-cutting was responsible for failings: "We've never focused on profits above safety." He added: "I certainly never turned down a request [for safety funds]."

The report's findings are likely to be used against BP in many outstanding civil cases and could be seized by the grand jury investigating whether to bring criminal charges.

Mr Baker said Peter Sutherland, BP chairman, described his findings as "quite a harsh report".

The inquiry acknowledged BP had improved its safety record since the blast, but said management failed to provide leadership when tackling the systemic problems in the rest of the US.

Mr Baker said earlier: "There are some changes [in management] that we believe perhaps could be helpful" but did not discuss individuals. John Manzoni, BP's board director with responsibility for refining and marketing at the time, remains in that position. He said he would not resign after Mr Baker's findings.

The report made 10 recommendations that BP is expected to follow in full. It said executive board members must show leadership on safety and establish integrated, comprehensive safety management. It also urged BP to establish a more open safety culture at each refinery and advised it to work with government agencies and unions to develop indicators to monitor safety.

It said BP had failed to ensure that suffiicent resources "were effectively allocated to support or sustain a high level of process safety performance" but that it did not have enough information to conclude whether BP had "intentionally withheld resources on any safety-related assets or projects for budgetary or cost reasons."

BP expects to fund the recommendations from within the US safety, compliance and regulatory affairs budget which it increased last July from $6bn to $7bn.

BP Failed On Safety, Report Says (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

BP's safety practices came under fire yesterday from a blue-ribbon panel that said the oil company skimped on spending and failed to take other steps that might have prevented a deadly refinery explosion in March 2005.

In a 347-page report, the panel chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III said that the London company failed to provide "effective" leadership to make the safety of its industrial equipment "a core value" at its five U.S. refineries."

The 11-member panel, asked by BP to study all of its U.S. refineries at the urging of the U.S. Chemical Safety Board, made 10 recommendations for BP to improve safety, including hiring a special monitor to check on the company's progress.

DOJ_NMG_0117553

BP said it would adopt all the recommendations and noted that it had already taken many steps to fix the problems that led to the blast at its Texas City, Tex., refinery, which killed 15 workers and injured more than 170 others.

"BP gets it, and I get it too," chief executive John Browne said yesterday in a teleconference with reporters. "I recognize the need for improvement."

But he took issue with those who criticized him for failing to devote enough money to refinery safety. "We've never focused on profits above safety," he said.

The Texas City refinery explosion was the first of a series of setbacks over the past two years that sent BP reeling and contributed to the announcement Friday that Browne would retire early. Browne, who built BP into one of the world's supermajor oil companies in 10 years as chief executive, had said he would stay until the end of 2008. He now plans to leave in July and join a private equity firm.

The Baker panel's report did not point a finger at Browne or any other BP executive, but it targeted some of the same issues cited by government regulators and lawyers suing BP on behalf of those injured in the blast.

The panel said that BP had not learned from a long string of past accidents , had "a false sense of confidence" about safety, "did not always ensure that adequate resources were effectively allocated to support or sustain a high level" of safety in the industrial process and rotated refinery chiefs too quickly.

The Texas City refinery, built in 1934, has had eight managers since 2000. BP executives said yesterday that managers would now remain at one refinery for three to five years.

The panel also cited earlier reports that some Texas City refinery workers had put in 12-hour shifts for 30 consecutive days, and that even if fatigue did not cause the accident, it contributed to safety risks.

Some BP critics have said that top executives are culpable because of cost cutting that might have led to the accident. The Baker report notes that before the accident, Amoco, which was later bought by BP, had cut maintenance spending at the Texas City refinery by 41 percent and capital spending by 84 percent from 1992 to 1998. Despite those cuts, BP asked for a 25 percent reduction in costs after it took over the refinery in 2000 as part of its purchase of Amoco. The panel noted that managers' performance was measured in part by their ability to meet that target. Texas City came close, the panel said.

The Texas City plant was not the only refinery in need of greater company spending. The panel said that many hourly workers interviewed at BP's Whiting, Ind., refinery reported that as a result of underfunding, "preventive maintenance was seldom practiced, the refinery had a 'run until it breaks' mentality, and the workforce had a great deal of experience running equipment with 'Band-Aids.' " A survey of people working at a Toledo refinery showed that 33 percent of operations managers, 44 percent of maintenance technicians and 63 percent of health-and-safety employees disagreed with the statement that "process safety programs . . . have adequate funding."

After a consultant hired by BP urged bigger refinery budgets, BP increased spending somewhat. But in late 2004, weeks before the explosion, BP headquarters had asked its refineries to trim costs by an additional 25 percent. "It is not clear to the Panel why the U.S. refineries did not receive greater funding," the Baker report says.

Browne said yesterday that no specific request for spending on safety was ever turned down, though he acknowledged that he only set broad budget guidelines.

The Baker panel will not have the last word on the Texas City disaster. The Chemical Safety Board expects to issue a report in March. Daniel Horowitz, a spokesman for the board, said yesterday that the Baker panel's report showed that many things contribute to accidents like the one in Texas City. "It is a very significant finding that BP does not effectively investigate incidents throughout the corporation," he said. "If you're not learning from near misses, you're not in a position to prevent major disasters like the one in Texas City."

Browne, who visited the refinery the day after the blast, said: "I will always remember that day vividly." He said it "was a watershed" that would "forever change BP."

Inquiry Faults Management At BP In Blast That Killed 15 (NYT)

By Heather Timmons

New York Times, January 17, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 16 — An investigation led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III has concluded that weak leadership at BP and a lack of attention to effective safety helped create a dangerous setting that led to 15 deaths at the oil giant's Texas refinery, according to the report released Tuesday.

Based on hundreds of interviews with employees, the 374-page report painted a layered picture of recurring neglect, avoidance and wrong-headed corporate directives that culminated in the fatal explosion at the refinery in 2005.

The panel made 10 recommendations, including the creation of an independent monitor to report to the company's board over a five-year period. BP responded that it would carry out the 11-member panel's findings.

The company's departing chief executive, John Browne, denied that there were fundamental problems with BP's structure or that a succession of problems were related. But he said he "has a responsibility to implement these findings" and a "moral responsibility" to make sure the company is improved.

Mr. Browne said last week that he would retire from BP in July, 18 months sooner than expected. He will be succeeded by Tony Hayward, the head of exploration and production, who will face the challenge of trying to repair the company's reputation with investors and the public.

The Baker report said the company had fundamental problems in its "decentralized management system and entrepreneurial culture," which left safety processes to the discretion of managers and did not define what was expected of them. Executive management was not held accountable for safety process of the United States refineries, the report said.

Though the panel did not explicitly blame Mr. Browne, he was a key proponent of the entrepreneurial culture.

The Baker report said that workers at BP's United States refineries were overworked and the refineries thinly staffed and that employees there did not report accidents and safety concerns because they feared repercussions or judged that the company would not do anything about them.

Internal company audits were focused on making sure that refineries were in compliance with laws, rather than ensuring that management systems were making the refineries safe, it added.

The report made a series of suggestions about improving safety culture, including improving the auditing and safety education at all the United States refineries. Since the explosion, BP has created a safety and operations division that reports to the chief executive and has increased its budget for its refining operations.

BP has said in the past that it will spend $200 million to pay for 300 external experts to conduct audits and redesigns. It has also said it has set aside money to compensate victims of the explosion at Texas City, Tex., near Galveston, which also injured 170 people.

Though it did not conclude that BP purposely reduced safety spending, the report said that cost-cutting at BP had been severe. At the Texas City refinery, total maintenance spending fell 41 percent from 1992 to 1999, and total capital spending fell 84 percent from 1992 to 2000. On top of those cuts, BP challenged its managers to reduce costs by 25 percent after its merger with Amoco in 1998.

The investigation was initiated after the Texas City refinery explosion. Investigators at the Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board say that flammable liquids overflowed at the plant, creating a cloud of vapor that ignited.

BP has had a succession of diverse problems in recent years, including leaks in its Alaska pipeline and accusations of market manipulation at its trading desks, leading some to re-examine a once highly praised company and its longtime chief executive, Mr. Browne.

Many workers at Texas City, Toledo and Whiting refineries complained about a lack of funds that helped create unsafe conditions, the report said, telling investigators they thought that "profit comes before safety" at the company.

On Tuesday, BP officials denied that this was the case.

Mr. Baker served as chairman of a panel reviewing BP's safety practices.

The chairman and president of BP America, Robert A. Malone, said in an interview that the report is "hard-hitting and it hurts." Mr. Malone emphasized that reducing costs did not necessarily translate into safety problems, and that the company had never refused to finance a safety matter.

BP managers were flooded with what the report called "initiative overload." The company required that managers follow numerous initiatives, on issues as diverse as health, environmental matters and asset sales, which took attention away from day-to-day safety concerns. The "large number of initiatives and related paperwork contributed to a heavy workload and prevented the work force from being as focused on safety and operations as they would like," the report found.

Employees at BP's United States refineries also worked significant amounts of overtime, it found. According to minutes of a 2003 meeting, some laboratory staff members worked 24 hours consecutively. High turnover at BP refineries, particularly in management, also contributed to inconsistent safety procedures.

It was clear from the report that BP managers had been aware there were problems at refineries. In 2003 and 2004, managers said the refinery in Texas City was at risk because of "infrastructure integrity and mechanical reliability."

BP Neglected Refinery Safety, Says Report On '05 Plant Explosion (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, January 17, 2007

British oil giant BP (BP) suffered from safety deficiencies at all five of its U.S. refineries, according to a report released Tuesday by a panel investigating the energy company.

Led by former Secretary of State James Baker, the panel's report comes two years after an explosion and fire at BP's refinery in Texas City, Texas, killed 15 people and injured 170 in one of the worst U.S. workplace disasters in history.

REPORT: Read the full report of the BP U.S. Refineries Independent Safety Review Panel and BP's response

The panel said BP had improved "personal safety" procedures and lowered the injury rates for workers in recent years. But BP failed to create company-wide safety performance systems and oversight that could prevent fatal serious blasts, fires and spills.

As a result, BP had "a false sense of confidence" that it was "properly addressing process safety risks," said Baker, a partner at the Baker Botts law firm in Houston.

The panel found no evidence that BP made "any deliberate and conscious efforts to short-circuit safety," added Slade Gorton, a panel member and former U.S. senator from Washington.

But the 374-page report concluded that:

•The refineries in Texas City; Toledo, Ohio; Whiting, Ind.; Carson, Calif. and Cherry Point, Wash., suffered from "a lack of operating discipline," complacency and a tolerance of serious safety risks.

•BP failed to provide effective safety leadership and performance at all corporate levels, partly because of high turnover of plant managers.

•High overtime by operations and maintenance workers may have hurt their ability to perform their jobs safely.

•Top-level BP executives and managers were not held accountable for poor safety performance.

•Many workers believed that profits, production goals and budgetary constraints overrode safety at the plants.

The panel recommended a range of safety measures, including a strong safety audit system and an independent monitor to follow BP's progress for five years.

BP said it will adopt the panel's recommendations at its 23 refineries worldwide, adding that its internal reviews found similar problems. "We asked for a candid assessment from this diverse group of experts and they delivered one," said BP CEO John Browne.

The panel was appointed by Browne in 2005 at the urging of the U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, which is conducting a separate investigation and report on the Texas City explosion to be released early this year.

Browne said Friday that he will retire in July, a year earlier than expected. He will be succeeded by Tony Hayward, BP's head of exploration and production.

BP will increase its spending on safety from $1.2 billion in 2005 to $1.7 billion annually from 2007 to 2010. BP also has set aside $1.6 billion for victims of the explosion, and it will pay $21 million to settle 300 suspected safety violations alleged by the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

Baker said the safety deficiencies found by the panel are not unique to BP, and that the oil and chemical industries would have safer workplaces if it used the panel's recommendations.

Safety Report Will Test BP's Incoming CEO (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

LONDON -- BP PLC'S effort to minimize damage from a critical independent safety review of its U.S. operations presents the first big test for BP's next chief executive, Tony Hayward.

The London-based oil titan, reacting to the review released yesterday by an independent panel, promised to embrace a number of sweeping changes at its U.S. oil refineries, including engaging an independent body to monitor safety practices at the company. The panel, led by former U.S. Secretary of State James Baker III, sharply criticized practices at BP's American refineries, saying the company lacked strong leadership on safety.

The panel said it found significant problems at BP's five U.S. refineries. BP commissioned the panel after an explosion at its plant in Texas City, Texas, killed 15 workers in March 2005. "BP has not provided effective process safety leadership and has not adequately established process safety as a core value across all its five U.S. refineries," the report said.

Mr. Baker, in a news conference in Houston yesterday, said BP appeared to take safety seriously. But he said the company focused on "personal safety" improvements, for instance tracking statistics such as frequency of accidents and days lost to injuries. Such statistics led to a "false sense of confidence" in the company's safety culture and didn't enable the company to develop adequate, corporatewide safety procedures, Mr. Baker said.

The report also cited BP for not always ensuring that adequate funding and manpower were devoted to safety. But the panel never found that BP "purposefully withheld resources" that shortchanged safety, Mr. Baker said.

BP itself has issued stinging self-critiques of its Texas City plant after the accident. The U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration and the U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board have both alleged specific safety shortfalls in Texas. Officials at the chemical-safety board, for instance, said that BP's cost cutting there played a direct role in causing the accident, an allegation BP has denied and that the Baker report said it couldn't substantiate.

The report is the most recent rebuke to longtime BP CEO John Browne. Last week, Lord Browne said he would step down about a year and a half earlier than expected. It comes amid other major problems for the company in the U.S., from oil spills and corrosion in Alaska to alleged improper energy trading, a charge BP denies.

Still, the Baker report contained little in the way of dramatic revelations, and its findings weren't as blistering as many BP executives and industry experts had anticipated. Thus, the publication of the report could provide the company an opportunity to show investors and regulators that it is acting quickly to shore up what has become a big American liability: safety.

The effort will be the first big test for a new management team led by Mr. Hayward that is gearing up to take over from Lord Browne. Currently BP's head of exploration and production, Mr. Hayward will take over as CEO in August. 9

Mr. Hayward will have to deliver on BP's promises to improve safety and make the structural and cultural changes pushed by the Baker panel. BP said yesterday it had already moved to shore up safety at its plants and was spending more money on its refineries.

The company said it would embrace all of the panel's recommendations, including agreeing to an outside body to monitor safety for five years. That recommendation was reported over the weekend by The Wall Street Journal. The Baker panel said that the outside body should report periodically to the board about how well the company is living up to its promises to improve safety and that BP should make those findings public.

BP's Safety Failures Are Not Yet Resolved (FT)

Financial Times, January 17, 2007

Another month, another Baker report. December's report from the Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by James A. Baker III, former US secretary of state, has been largely ignored by America's president. But the management of BP, the oil giant, must not ignore yesterday's report from a panel chaired by Mr Baker into the safety and management of the company's US operations.

The independent panel was formed on the recommendation of a safety watchdog investigating the explosions at BP's Texas City refinery, which killed 15 workers and injured 500 more in March 2005. The panel looked at safety culture across BP Products North America, not just at Texas City, reflecting other accidents, including some at BP's Alaskan operations.

The Baker panel found that BP "has not provided effective process safety leadership", that "material deficiencies in process safety exist at BP's five US refineries" and that "BP's executive management either did not receive refinery-specific information on process safety deficiencies . . . or did not effectively respond to the information that it did receive".

That is a damning verdict. The panel's conclusions suggest that BP's executives were most at fault, but the board of directors does not escape. The board relied on information about safety given to it by management. But, implies the report, the board did not question that information. As a result it failed to ensure that effective management systems for process safety were actually put in place.

When management failures lie behind a tragedy on the scale of Texas City there must be accountability. BP has convened the Baker panel and conducted a thorough review of its own safety procedures: for that it deserves applause. Lord Browne, the company's iconic chief executive, announced last week that he will step down a year earlier than planned.

For Lord Browne, who as CEO must bear ultimate responsibility, the safety failures are a blot on an otherwise stellar career. But his departure does not draw a line under the Texas City disaster. The executives in charge of BP's North American refineries should consider their positions. The boardroom, meanwhile, where many non-executives have been in place for almost a decade, needs to be revamped.

There should be no schadenfreude inside other companies. Instead they should realise that, despite increased board-level scrutiny of financial affairs in the wake of the Enron scandal, businesses face other grave risks. At an industrial company, safety is one. Non-executives need to start asking the right questions.

The Baker panel goes on to set out how BP can improve its process safety: through better management, monitoring, accountability and, most important of all, leadership. If BP and others follow that advice, it will be a big step towards better industrial safety.

Justices Decline To Take Up New Eminent Domain Case (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0117557

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — The Supreme Court on Tuesday bypassed an opportunity to revisit or limit its much-disputed 2005 ruling that upheld governmental power to use eminent domain to foster economic development.

Without comment, the justices declined to hear a case from Port Chester in Westchester County, N.Y., that challenged the village's use of eminent domain in a dispute between a property owner and a private company designated as the developer of a run-down 27-acre urban renewal area.

The redevelopment plan, adopted by Port Chester in 1999, envisioned a retail area that would include a drugstore. In 2002, the developer, G & S Port Chester LLC, announced that a Walgreens store would be part of the project. But Bart Didden, the owner of the parcel where the store was to sit, had by that time separately entered into a lease with a competing drugstore chain, CVS.

After negotiations between Mr. Didden and G & S Port Chester failed, the village sided with its developer and notified the property owner that his half-acre parcel would be taken by eminent domain and made available for the developer's use. Mr. Didden and his business partner, Domenick Bologna, brought a lawsuit in 2004 arguing that Port Chester's condemnation of the property was not for a true "public use," the phrase that identifies the constitutionally permissible use of the eminent domain power, but rather for the private financial benefit of the developer.

The lawsuit accused Gregg Wasser, G & S Port Chester's owner, of having improperly demanded a financial stake in the plan for the CVS store as the price for permission to proceed with it. Both the Federal District Court in Manhattan and the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit dismissed the lawsuit.

In their Supreme Court appeal, Didden v. Village of Port Chester, No. 06-652, Mr. Didden and Mr. Bologna were represented by the Institute for Justice, a public interest law firm in Arlington, Va., that litigated on behalf of the property owners in the 2005 Supreme Court case and that has organized a national campaign against what it calls eminent domain abuse.

Partly in response to the Supreme Court's ruling in that case, Kelo v. City of New London, 34 states have adopted measures limiting the use of eminent domain. The Institute for Justice publicized the Port Chester case widely and looked to it as an opportunity for the court to clarify "that Kelo did not suddenly turn every redevelopment area in the United States into a Constitution-free zone," as Dana Berliner, a senior attorney with the institute, said when the appeal was filed in November.

"The court will have to review an eminent domain case sometime soon," Ms. Berliner said on Tuesday.

The vote in the Kelo case was 5 to 4. The recent changes at the court are not likely to have an impact, however, because both Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the two justices who have since been succeeded, were among the dissenters.

Even if there was interest on the court in revisiting the issue, the justices might have seen the Port Chester case as a poor vehicle for doing so, because the lower courts based their dismissal on the property owner's failure to file his lawsuit within the three-year statute of limitations. The suit should have been filed within three years of the village's July 1999 adoption of the redevelopment plan, the courts ruled, rejecting Mr. Didden's argument that the clock did not start running until late 2003, when the village announced that it would take his property.

"I'm so disillusioned with the whole court system at this point," Mr. Didden said on Tuesday.

Mark S. Tulis, special counsel to the village, said in an interview that the village had had to choose between condemning Mr. Didden's property or breaching its 1999 contract with the developer. "Either way," Mr. Tulis said, "we knew there was no way both sides would be happy."

The amount that Port Chester has to compensate Mr. Didden is the subject of a separate lawsuit.

In other action on Tuesday, the court declined to hear a California utility company's appeal of a ruling that required administrative review of the potential environmental impact of a terrorist attack on the Diablo Canyon nuclear power plant in San Luis Obispo.

The utility, Pacific Gas and Electric, is seeking a 20-year license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to build and operate a spent-fuel storage installation there. Responding to a lawsuit brought by a local antinuclear group, San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ruled that before granting the license, the nuclear agency had to take account of the potential environmental risk of terrorism.

The utility's appeal, Pacific Gas and Electric v. San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, No. 06-466, argued that the ruling was a misinterpretation of federal environmental law that would place unnecessary burdens on license applicants.

The government itself did not file a Supreme Court appeal, however. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement told the court in his brief that while the decision was incorrect and potentially "disruptive," it was too soon to know how disruptive it would prove to be in practice. While the government would support the utility if the justices nonetheless wanted to accept the case, the brief said, the appeal "does not clearly satisfy the court's criteria" for taking up appeals and should be denied.

Order For Diablo Review Stands Up (SLOT)

By David Sneed

San Luis Obispo Tribune, January 17, 2007

The U.S. Supreme Court will not review a lower court decision requiring an examination of how a terrorist attack on Diablo Canyon nuclear power plant's aboveground waste storage could harm the environment.

The court announced Tuesday it will not hear the case. Doing so exhausted all review of the lawsuit, forcing the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission and plant owner Pacific Gas and Electric Co. to comply with a ruling of the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

That ruling will likely force the agency and PG&E to redo the environmental analysis of the dry-cask storage facility, complete with more public hearings to specifically address how the environment could be harmed if terrorists attack the facility. NRC officials do not yet have a timeline for fulfilling the court ruling, said Dave McIntyre, NRC spokesman.

"It's early in the process, but the word we are getting from upstairs is that they will act soon," he said.

PG&E officials are encouraging the agency to act quickly to avoid any delays in the project. Construction is continuing on the storage facility, which consists of a thick concrete slab behind the plant upon which large casks containing highly radioactive spent fuel rods will eventually be stored.

"It's up to the NRC to define whatever steps we need to take to resolve this issue," PG&E spokesman Jeff Lewis said. "The ball is in their court."

An attorney for the plaintiffs in the case, the San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, said the utility cannot load any casks with spent fuel until it complies with the court ruling.

The question of whether PG&E can load the casks is a moot point, McIntyre said; the utility will not start loading until early 2008, and the NRC plans to have the case resolved by then.

Mothers for Peace spokeswoman Jane Swanson said the group is elated by the Supreme Court's decision. It will force the NRC and the nuclear industry to more openly consider health and environmental risks associated with terrorist attacks when designing and building nuclear facilities, she said.

"Now, after years of resistance, the NRC and PG&E are forced to address these concerns," she said.

The NRC and PG&E argued that additional reviews under the National Environmental Policy Act are unnecessary, because protecting nuclear facilities is already covered by the Atomic Energy Act.

While the PG&E case is lost, the NRC has other cases before it that deal with the NEPA and terrorism issue.

"There may be opportunities for the NRC to raise the issue again in future court cases," McIntyre said.

Diablo Canyon's used but still highly radioactive nuclear waste is now stored in two pools at the plant. These pools are nearly full, and PG&E needs to transfer some of the older spent fuel to dry casks to make way for newer spent fuel.

PG&E applied to build the dry-cask facility in 2001. The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks of that year prompted the Mothers for Peace and other groups to ask the NRC for hearings into the adequacy of the storage facility.

The agency denied the request, prompting a federal lawsuit. On June 2, the federal appeals court in San Francisco ruled in favor of the Mothers for Peace.

The ruling caused utilities and infrastructure managers across the country to re-evaluate how they protect their facilities from terrorist attacks and, specifically, how much public involvement in the process is appropriate. PG&E, with the backing of the NRC, appealed the ruling to the Supreme Court and lost.

Supreme Court Won't Hear PG&E Appeal Of Diablo Canyon Nuclear Storage Ruling (SLOT)

By David Sneed

San Luis Obispo Tribune, January 17, 2007

The U.S. Supreme Court announced today that it will not review a lower court ruling, which requires the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission and Pacific Gas and Electric Co. to analyze the environmental impacts of a terrorist attack on an aboveground storage facility for highly radioactive used fuel at Diablo Canyon nuclear power plant.

The ruling settles the case once and for all. It is now up to the commission to decide what additional action must be taken to comply with a June 2 ruling by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco.

Dave McIntyre, an NRC spokesman, said it is too early to know exactly what the commission will do to satisfy the court ruling. Redoing the environmental review including more public hearings is possible.

DOJ_NMG_0117559

Jane Swanson, spokeswoman for the San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, said the group is elated by the ruling. The nuclear watchdog group filed the original lawsuit against the agency.

"What the little Mothers for Peace has done is truly amazing," she said. "We have changed the rules the nuclear industry must follow."

Spokesmen for PG&E and the NRC said they are disappointed with the decision. PG&E spokesman Jeff Lewis said the utility calls on the NRC to decide quickly how it will comply with the ruling.

"It's up to them to decide whatever steps we need to take to resolve this issue," he said.

PG&E had filed the appeal to the Supreme Court.

Construction is continuing on the dry casks and is not expected to be delayed as the NRC decides how to respond to the court ruling. PG&E may not be able to load spent fuel into the casks before the NRC decides how to act. However, the fuel wouldn't be loaded for at least another year anyway.

Supreme Court Refuses To Hear PG&E Appeal (LR)

By April Charlton

Lompoc Record, January 17, 2007

San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, a local Diablo Canyon Nuclear Power Plant watchdog group, has won a victory against utility giant Pacific Gas and Electric Co.

On Tuesday, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled the Nuclear Regulatory Commission must follow an earlier ruling by a lower court that the agency consider environmental impacts of a terrorist attack on the dry-cask storage facility planned for the nuclear plant.

The NRC issued PG&E a permit to construct an above-ground storage facility on the hillside above Diablo Canyon, where the power plant's spent-fuel rods would be stored.

At that time, the regulatory agency found that a potential terrorist attack on the dry-cask storage facility was “remote and speculative” and didn't warrant examination.

Mothers for Peace challenged the federal agency's ruling, and in June, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed with the NRC's 2003 finding, ordering the commission to reconsider the likelihood of an intentional attack on the storage facility.

PG&E appealed the lower court's ruling, requesting that the Supreme Court review the decision, which it formally declined on Tuesday, leaving Mothers for Peace members elated.

“After the events of Sept. 11, it is only reasonable that the significant health and environmental risks of terrorist attacks be considered when designing and building nuclear facilities,” said Jane Swanson, Mothers for Peace spokeswoman. “Now, after years of resistance, the NRC and PG&E are forced to address these concerns.”

Jeff Lewis, PG&E Diablo Canyon spokesman, said the utility company is disappointed but plans to proceed with the dry-cask project while the NRC decides how it will comply with the Supreme Court's ruling.

“To this point, we've spent $74 million on this project,” Lewis said, “and we're on schedule to start the initial loading (of the casks) late this year, pending any other developments.”

Lewis added that to keep the dry-cask project on schedule, “PG&E expects the NRC to clearly define the issues to be resolved to address the Ninth Circuit's concerns, the procedures to be followed and the schedule for resolution.”

U.S Supreme Court Rules Diablo Must Consider Environmental Impact Of Terrorist Attacks On Nuclear Facilities (KSBY-TV)

By Andrew Masuda

KSBY-TV, January 16, 2007

Decision could significantly impact the future of Diablo Canyon

The U.S. Supreme Court delivers a major victory today to nuclear power opponents here on the Central Coast. The decision could significantly impact the future of Diablo Canyon and other nuclear power plants.

Today, the U.S. Supreme Court said it won't consider PG&E's appeal of a previous ruling that involves the storage of used nuclear fuel at Diablo Canyon.

It's a major victory for the local watchdog group, Mothers for Peace, and nuclear opponents nationwide.

"Today's ruling is a real triumph," says Mothers for Peace spokesperson Jane Swanson.

The "triumph" to which Swanson is referring is a setback for PG&E, which operates Diablo Canyon.

Tuesday, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a U.S. Court of Appeals ruling that the NRC -- or Nuclear Regulatory Commission -- must consider the environmental impacts of a terrorist attack on nuclear facilities.

Mothers for Peace raised the issue over PG&E's already NRC-approved dry cask storage project at Diablo.

"Since 1973," says Swanson, "we've been plugging away. So it feels really good to be validated by the highest court in the land.

PG&E actually started construction last October of its dry cask storage facility, which will store used nuclear fuel above ground.

PG&E says the $95 million project is essential to the plant's future, because they're running out of space in their used fuel pools.

"If we're not able to continue with this project, you know, ultimately the plant would have to shut down sooner than it's licensed," says PG&E spokesperson Jeff Lewis.

PG&E planned to begin storing spent fuel when construction is completed in November. Now, they must wait for the NRC to comply with the law and consider the impact of an attack.

"We're saying that's redundant," says Lewis.

Redundant to Jeff Lewis, but a precedent to Jane Swanson, who says her local group has finally prevailed over nuclear giants. Swanson hopes the ruling will be applied to nuclear operators nationwide.

PG&E officials say, without the storage project, Diablo could be forced to shut down in three years -- 15 years early. Not only would that hurt the state's power grid; Diablo is also the largest private employer in San Luis Obispo County. Experts estimate it has a $643 million impact on the local economy -- that's 7% of the county's entire economy.

PG&E hopes the NRC will comply by November. A spokesperson for the NRC says it's too early to know exactly when that will happen. A new environmental review with more public hearings is possible.

Supreme Court Action May Jeopardize Oyster Creek Relicensing (PofAC)

Press of Atlantic City, January 17, 2007

The U.S. Supreme Court let stand today a decision by a lower federal court that could jeopardize the re-licensing of the Oyster Creek nuclear generating station.

The justices decided against reviewing a 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco decision on the storage of spent nuclear fuel rods at Diablo Canyon nuclear power plant in California. In June 2006, the 9th Circuit Court ruled that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission was wrong when it refused to consider the possibility of a terrorist attack in preparing an environmental impact statement under the National Environmental Policy Act, or NEPA.

That ruling came in a California case, brought by the San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, who challenged the NRC's view that the possibility of a terrorist attack on a nuclear facility is so remote that the potential consequences of an attack need not be considered in such a review.

Although that ruling was aimed at the storage of spent nuclear fuel rods at Diablo Canyon Power Plant in California, the ruling by the Supreme Court could force a re-evaluation of Oyster Creek's ongoing attempt at license renewal. The Oyster Creek plant stores spent nuclear fuel rods in a pool which is 119 feet above the ground and holds about 375 tons of highly radioactive fuel rods.

The state of New Jersey last year filed a contention nearly identical to the one filed with the 9th Circuit Court by the San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace.

Utility Ruling Could Have Effect On New Jersey (CHCP)

Cherry Hills Courier Post, January 17, 2007

The U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday may have strengthened New Jersey's case to have federal regulators consider the impact of a terrorist attack on the Oyster Creek nuclear power plant in Lacey before renewing its operating license.

The justices, without comment, turned away an appeal by a California utility, which had unsuccessfully argued that regulators should not have had to evaluate an attack's impact before approving a storage site for radioactive waste.

But the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in June said such an evaluation should have occurred. The Supreme Court let that decision stand on Tuesday.

The arguments presented by the plaintiff in the California case, a citizens' group, and those presented by New Jersey officials in seeking a federal administrative hearing on the terrorism issue were nearly identical.

Calif. Court Ruling Could Have Bearing On Oyster Creek Relicensing Bid (APP)

Threat of attack must be weighed at plant in Calif.

The U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday might have indirectly bolstered the state's case for requiring federal regulators to assess the potential impact of a terrorist attack on the Oyster Creek nuclear power plant in order for it to receive a renewed license.

The justices, without comment, decided not to hear an appeal by California utility PG&E, which argued that regulators should not have to evaluate the possible impact of an attack before approving a storage site for radioactive waste.

In June, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said such an evaluation should have occurred, and the Supreme Court let that decision stand.

Neil Sheehan, a spokesman for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, said it is now up to the NRC to decide what additional action must be taken in regards to the California waste site proposal for the agency to comply with the appellate court ruling.

The winning arguments presented by the citizens' group San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace and then by New Jersey environmental officials seeking a federal hearing on the terrorism issue were nearly identical.

Both argued that the National Environmental Policy Act, a landmark law created 36 years ago, requires the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission to take terrorism into account when reviewing license and permit applications.

"It's certainly validation of the point we've made to the NRC about Oyster Creek," said state Department of Environmental Protection Commissioner Lisa Jackson, referring to the Supreme Court's decision.

Considering that the policy act requires all federal agencies to assess the environmental consequences of major projects, Tuesday's decision might eventually have effects beyond the Lacey plant and the nuclear power industry. Susceptible to change are the approval processes for liquefied natural gas terminals, dams, highways and railways.

Implications debated

Before Tuesday's ruling, the Nuclear Energy Institute, an advocacy group for the industry in Washington, said a terrorism review triggered by the policy act might impede the licensing of nuclear power plants and delay important federal projects.

But Sheehan said the appellate decision only applies to the 9th Circuit.

"If the Supreme Court would have taken this up and ruled on it, then it could have had national implications," he said.

Sheehan said it is now up to the NRC to decide what additional action must be taken in the California waste site case to comply with the appellate court ruling.

The state Department of Environmental Protection believes the policy act requires that a terrorism vulnerability study be part of the review performed on plants seeking renewed licenses, which are for 20 years.

Oyster Creek, the nation's oldest operating commercial reactor, might have a decision on its renewal application as soon as May.

According to the NRC, renewal reviews do not currently include terrorism because that threat is evaluated regularly through drills and inspections.

State officials want to change that, and have a hearing request on the issue pending before the top five officials at the NRC.

More formal than most governmental hearings, the one sought by the state would involve lawyers presenting positions before a three-judge NRC panel. In the end, the judges could require the plant to meet certain conditions to obtain a renewal.

The commissioners were supposed to grant or deny the request in September, but decided to table it until they heard from the Supreme Court on the Ninth Circuit ruling.

Sheehan said the commission will soon decide on the request.

State's position unchanged

Jackson, the DEP commissioner, said her department has stated its case and will not attempt to file any additional arguments with the federal commission.

The case hinges on how to characterize the likelihood of a terrorist attack. Although the NRC contends that such attacks are "remote and speculative," the state has described an attack on Oyster Creek as "reasonably foreseeable."

"A reasonably foreseeable impact is the usual trigger-point for NEPA reviews," state lawyers argued in a brief submitted to the commission.

At the core of its argument, the state said it is difficult to reconcile the NRC's stance on the risk of a terrorist attack and the great steps the agency took after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, to bolster security at the nation's 103 reactors.

"It is illogical for the Commission to consider the threat of terrorist attacks extremely serious outside the NEPA context but only speculative and theoretical within it," state lawyers wrote.

NRC lawyers pointed to numerous agency and court decisions, which advise that terrorism should not be looked at during licensing decisions under NEPA. Doing so would be redundant and nonsensical — the agency should not wait for a licensing decision to consider terrorism concerns at a particular facility, regulators have said.

Jamestown 400th Anniversary Commission Member Resigns Amid Probe (AP)

By Sonja Barisic, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

NORFOLK, Va. - The Interior Department's former No. 2 official has resigned from a federal commission for Jamestown's 400th anniversary amid reports that he is a target of a probe involving imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"As you have no doubt seen, recently there have (been) published reports concerning investigations of actions involving me," J. Steven Griles wrote in a letter to Frank Atkinson, chairman of the Jamestown 400th Commemoration Commission.

"Without commenting on those reports, I have come to the conclusion that it would be better for the commission that I withdraw my membership," Griles wrote in the letter, dated Jan. 10 and provided to reporters by the commission on Tuesday.

Griles, an energy lobbyist, did not immediately return a telephone call Tuesday seeking comment to the Washington, D.C., firm where he works.

Atkinson was unavailable for comment Tuesday and has made no statement about the resignation, commission spokesman William Allcott said. The commission's office in Williamsburg received the letter Saturday, Allcott said.

The commission works with the state agency planning events for the 400th anniversary of Jamestown, America's first permanent English settlement. Its responsibilities include a series of conferences on the future of democracy.

Griles, former deputy interior secretary during President Bush's first term, was notified by letter and told of possible charges - including lying to Congress - at a meeting this month with Justice Department prosecutors, The Associated Press reported last week, citing people familiar with the probe who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The charges involve questions about whether Griles falsely testified in 2005 before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee about Abramoff's attempts to hire Griles away from Interior.

Griles told the committee that Abramoff had no special access to him. Griles' attorney, Barry Hartman, has said that committee's report in September found no evidence that Griles acted improperly.

Abramoff is serving about six years in prison for a fraudulent Florida casino business deal and awaits sentencing in a Washington bribery scandal. The Abramoff investigation ensnared former Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, this fall when the congressman acknowledged accepting gifts in exchange for government action. Several Capitol Hill staffers and a former Bush administration official also have pleaded guilty or have been convicted in the case.

The Senate committee's investigation and e-mails detailed numerous contacts with Abramoff and Italia Federici, who was a go-between for Abramoff. Federici headed the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, and federal investigators have been looking at donations the group received from Abramoff's Indian tribal clients and from energy and mining companies, including some that were Griles' ex-clients.

Appeal Of Pollution Limits Rejected (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

The U.S. Supreme Court let stand yesterday a lower court's ruling that would set stricter pollution limits for the Anacostia River, giving environmentalists a victory in a long-running battle over the river's gluts of raw sewage.

The court's decision means that there will be daily caps on the amounts of various pollutants dumped into the Anacostia, although federal officials said it could take until next year for the details to be worked out.

Previously, the Environmental Protection Agency had required only annual or seasonal pollution caps, which can be easier to meet. A panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit rejected that approach in April, and yesterday the Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal from the EPA and the D.C. Water and Sewer Authority.

The river has fecal bacteria, trash and toxic chemicals that make it one of the most unhealthy streams in the region.

The most significant effect of the decision probably will be on the District's antiquated sewer system, which dumps out raw sewage and rainwater during storms. Environmentalists had argued that the damage done by each one of these "overflows" was so severe that an annual limit was not adequate.

"If you have these big slugs of pollution, over a day or two days, the oxygen level goes down [in the river] and fish die," said David Baron, an attorney for Earthjustice, which filed the suit on behalf of a group called Friends of the Earth. "It doesn't help the fish that, a week or two weeks later, the water's clean again."

Although the environmental groups celebrated yesterday's decision as a victory, it was unclear what the immediate impact on the river's pollution would be. Participants in the case said the EPA might not have the details of the daily limits ready until next year.

DOJ_NMG_0117564

If the standards are violated after that, polluters could be fined, Baron said. But he said environmental groups acknowledge that it could take years for that to happen. The EPA had fought for less stringent standards in this case on the grounds that they were more obtainable and easier to measure.

The head of the D.C. sewer authority, which is responsible for the damaging sewage "overflows," said he believed the ruling might actually slow down the pace of the river's cleanup.

He said the agency might have to put some or all of its $2 billion, 20-year cleanup plan on hold while it waits for the EPA to issue details on the daily limits. General Manager Jerry N. Johnson said the agency was concerned that the EPA might call for different alterations at that point than the ones WASA had planned.

"The net effect is that we'd have to slow down the long-term control plan," Johnson said. "Because we don't know what we're designing to.

"I really think that this is not the best outcome for the river," he added. The agency's plan involves digging massive tunnels under the city, where water can be stored during a storm and afterward pumped to a sewage plant for treatment.

The lawsuit itself turned on an unusual semantic argument. The Clean Water Act requires states to determine "total maximum daily loads" of various pollutants, determining how much of each a water body can take without becoming too polluted.

Environmental groups used that language to justify their call for a daily pollution cap. The EPA had argued that the law should be construed to allow annual or seasonal limits in some cases.

In the April ruling, Judge David S. Tatel -- writing for the appeals court panel -- sided with the environmentalists.

"The law says 'daily.' We see nothing ambiguous about this command," Tatel wrote. " 'Daily' connotes 'every day.' "

Cleveland's New FBI Chief Calls Terrorism A Priority (CLPD)

By Mike Tobin, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, January 17, 2007

The new head of the Cleveland FBI just bought a house in Bay Village and is moving his family here.

That might not sound like much, but it's a leap of faith for C. Frank Figliuzzi, who last month became the fourth man in five years to head the local FBI office.

"I'm here for as long as I can be," Figliuzzi said. "We want to be here and plant roots in the community."

Figliuzzi, 44, will lead a field office for the first time after running large FBI units in San Francisco, Miami and Washington, D.C.

Figliuzzi said he will follow the priorities outlined by the FBI's leaders, which puts counter-terrorism at the top.

In 2001, Figliuzzi was running the FBI's white-collar crime squad in Miami, investigating corrupt politicians and police. Then came the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and he was chosen to lead the counter-terrorism squad in Miami.

"To realize that the majority of the 9/11 attackers operated right under our noses in South Florida," he said, "it was an eye-opener to say the least."

"The threat is very real," Figliuzzi said. "The fact that there hasn't been an attack since Sept. 11 is not the result of luck."

Figliuzzi repeats the mantra of local law enforcement, that cooperation among the various agencies is paramount. One of Figliuzzi's first acts after coming to Cleveland was to have lunch with Police Chief Mi chael McGrath.

McGrath said he is eager to continue work ing with the FBI. "We've never had a bet ter relationship with our federal partners, and we'll continue moving forward," McGrath said.

Figliuzzi's background seems to have prepared him for the wide range of responsibilities he'll face as the local head of the FBI.

A Connecticut native, Figliuzzi joined the FBI after graduating from the University of Connecticut law school. He investigated economic espionage cases before taking over the FBI's Palo Alto office -- a satellite of the San Francisco field office -- where he investigated trade-secret thefts from high-tech companies in Silicon Valley.

Figliuzzi's most recent assignment was as the FBI's chief inspector, responsible for assessing FBI operations around the world.

In recent years, the local FBI and U.S. attorney's office have teamed to prosecute a variety of kickback and bribery schemes involving politicians and, more recently, to target street gangs in Cleveland. Those efforts will continue, Figliuzzi said.

"These gangs provide jobs for kids who hang around and serve as lookouts," Figliuzzi said. "We have to find something better for them to do."

Figliuzzi is proud that he was able to forge relationships with Arab and Muslim groups in Florida while investigating terrorism there. He looks forward to doing the same with groups here.

Altaf Ali, director of the Florida chapter of the Council on American Islamic Relations, said Figliuzzi often visited and met with leaders at mosques while working in Miami. Muslims will find him a good working partner, Ali said.

"He was an individual who actually understood and recognized that the Muslim community is the best tool in helping protect our country," Ali said.

In his free time, Figliuzzi likes to fish and snorkel. The wall of his Lakeside Avenue office is adorned with photos of his big catches in the Florida Keys.

Snorkeling on Lake Erie is probably out, but Figliuzzi said he's ready to try some freshwater fishing.

"I've been hearing a lot about walleye," he said.

Israeli Drug Kingpin Strikes Plea Deal (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, January 17, 2007

International narcotics kingpin Ze'ev Rosenstein pleaded guilty Tuesday in federal court to conspiring to import and distribute hundreds of kilos of the popular nightclub drug Ecstasy -- but he will serve his sentence in his native Israel.

U.S. District Judge William Dimitrouleas of Fort Lauderdale sentenced Rosenstein to 12 years in prison. But under an extradition agreement with Israel, he will be allowed to return home to serve the sentence -- and could qualify for parole in five years and four months with time off for good behavior.

Under federal sentencing guidelines, he faced 11 to 14 years in prison.

Rosenstein, 52, listed among the top 50 traffickers worldwide by the Justice Department, agreed to the plea deal on conspiracy charges of peddling and smuggling about 850,000 pills of MDMA, a synthetic drug commonly known as Ecstasy.

The notorious Israeli criminal, who had initially pleaded not guilty, was scheduled for trial next week. He has been in custody in Israel and Miami since late 2004, so at the minimum he would end up serving a total of about 7 ½ years.

His plea agreement Tuesday is bound by conditions in Rosenstein's extradition agreement between the United States and Israel, which initially paved the way for him to be prosecuted in South Florida.

Those conditions, approved by the Israeli Supreme Court, allow Rosenstein to serve his prison sentence in his homeland, where there is a provision for early release for good behavior. There is no parole of any kind today in the federal criminal justice system.

"To the extent that system differs from ours, I cannot comment," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta in Miami. ``He would be serving [his prison sentence] under the Israeli rules."

Acosta said Rosenstein's conviction marks the end of his worldwide organization -- ``his organization is no more."

When Rosenstein returns to Israel, he will plead guilty to a separate charge of conspiring to commit murder, which carries a three-year sentence in that country. But it will run concurrent with his U.S. sentence, defense lawyers said.

Attorney Roy Black, who represented Rosenstein with partner Howard Srebnick, said that both sides had worked diligently on the complicated plea agreement.

Rosenstein is being held in solitary confinement at the Miami Federal Detention Center. He is considered one of Israel's most powerful crime figures -- a household name whose exploits reportedly rivaled those of the infamous Chicago gangster Al Capone.

"If you were to walk down the street in Israel and ask anyone if they knew Ze'ev Rosenstein, they would say yes," Black said.

"He's a household name," added Srebnick.

According to several stories in the Jerusalem Post, Rosenstein allegedly headed one of the six main crime groups operating in Israel and was sometimes described as ``Public Enemy No. 1."

He survived at least four assassination attempts by rival gangs -- including one in December 2003, when a bomb detonated as he left a Tel Aviv money-changer's shop. Three bystanders were killed, but Rosenstein escaped with minor injuries.

Rosenstein was arrested by Israeli National Police in Tel Aviv in November 2004, which marks the beginning of his prison sentence under the plea deal.

He was charged under U.S. law in connection with the seizure of a stash of Ecstasy as well as $187,000 in cash in a New York apartment in the summer of 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0117566

But it wasn't until last March -- because of months involved in hammering out the extradition agreement -- that Rosenstein was extradited to South Florida to face conspiracy charges of distributing and smuggling Ecstasy through a narcotics network extending from the Middle East to New York and Miami.

The Miami link: Authorities said they learned about the Israeli network after an informant for the Miami-Dade police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration was approached by a Rosenstein associate, who offered to sell the informant part of the New York stash on consignment.

Seven co-defendants have been convicted and sentenced in the DEA case, handled by prosecutors Benjamin Greenberg and Michael "Pat" Sullivan.

Israeli Mob Suspect Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges, Will Face Prison At Home (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 17, 2007

After his March extradition to the United States, alleged Israeli crime boss Ze'ev Rosenstein had a few words for his supporters: "This year a prisoner in Miami; next year a free man in Israel."

He got his fate half right. On Tuesday, the reputed godfather of the Israeli mob pleaded guilty to two drug smuggling charges as part of an unusual deal that could have him back in his native country within a week, although not as a free man.

Lawyers on both sides agreed Rosenstein, 52, would receive a 12-year prison term with credit for time spent in jail since his November 2004 arrest. U.S. District Judge William Dimitrouleas imposed the sentence immediately.

The government's extradition agreement with Israel ensures Rosenstein will serve his sentence in Israel. Under Israeli law, Rosenstein becomes eligible for parole in 2012, his lawyer Roy Black said after the hearing in Fort Lauderdale federal court.

As part of a separate arrangement with the Israeli government, Rosenstein agreed to plead guilty and accept a three-year sentence for his role in an aborted plot to assassinate a rival, Black said.

Several area lawyers said the terms of his plea agreement seemed unusual for such a high-profile criminal defendant.

As part of the deal, prosecutors agreed to a sentence reduction under a provision designed for nonviolent offenders and minor players with no criminal history. The terms of the plea agreement also bound Dimitrouleas to adopt all provisions and the recommended sentence or reject the deal entirely.

Miami attorney Michael Tein, who is not affiliated with the case, called such agreements "as rare as four-leaf clovers."

"It shows both sides are extremely happy with this result," Tein said.

Prosecuting the case grew more complicated for government lawyers in November after Dimitrouleas refused to permit Israeli undercover agents to testify using false names. Israeli courts allow the use of pseudonyms to prevent the exposure of undercover agents, prosecutors said.

Defense lawyers opposed the request, saying it would prevent them from thoroughly investigating the agents' backgrounds.

Defense lawyer David O. Markus said negotiations with Israel could have put pressure on the U.S. government to reach an agreement, rather than go to trial.

"When there's an extradition agreement, the government can't just worry about the prosecution. There are a lot of other things to consider," he said.

Rosenstein admitted he took part in a plot to import 850,000 Ecstasy pills into the United States in 2001 to be sold in Miami and New York. Law enforcement agents learned of the shipment from an undercover informant who had been approached about purchasing some pills.

In July 2001, the agents executed a search warrant on a New York apartment where the Ecstasy was held, seizing approximately 700,000 pills. Rosenstein's arrest in Tel Aviv was touted at news conferences in Israel and the United States, where law enforcement officials said they had caught one of the most wanted drug traffickers in the world.

While Rosenstein's alleged crimes went beyond the one Ecstasy shipment, the plea agreement and 12-year sentence reflect only those charges.Rosenstein's lawyer said the father of six was motivated to reach a deal so he could return to Israel more quickly.

Miami Court Approves Rosenstein Plea Bargain (HAARETZ)

By Roni Singer-Heruti

Haaretz, January 17, 2007

A Miami court approved yesterday a plea deal between reputed crime boss Ze'ev Rosenstein and U.S. prosecutors. Rosenstein plead guilty to conspiring to smuggle 700,000 Ecstasy pills from Europe into the United States, and was sentenced to 12 years in prison. He will serve his sentence in Israel, and his property will not be confiscated.

DOJ_NMG_0117567

"Now we must return him to Israel as soon as possible," Rosenstein's attorney, Keren Nahari, said yesterday. "I believe it will happen within two weeks."

Once in Israel, Rosenstein will admit in court here to hiring Colombian mercenaries to target members of the Alperon family, also seen as crime kingpins.

For that crime, Rosenstein will be sentenced to three years in prison, to be served concurrently with his 12-year sentence.

The plea agreement was signed and approved after a month of intensive negotiations between Rosenstein's attorneys, American prosecutors and the Justice Ministry here. The deal was struck roughly a week before his trial was scheduled to begin.

Rosenstein is expected to serve six to nine years, and not 12, with expected time off for good behavior.

10 Arrested In Heroin Trafficking Ring (AP)

AP, January 17, 2007

The federal government continued its attack on a large Colombiabased heroin trafficking organization yesterday by announcing that 10 more people were charged in Manhattan and 20 others face charges in Colombia.

The charges bring to 110 the number of people charged internationally in an investigation nicknamed Operation Death Merchant. The operation has resulted in arrests in Manhattan, Baltimore, Detroit, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, and Curacao.

Of the 10 people charged in new cases brought in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, six were arrested in Colombia yesterday and two were arrested in New York. Two remained at large.

30 Busted In Heroin-smuggle Cruise Ruse (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar, Daily News Police Bureau Chief

New York Daily News, January 17, 2007

Federal agents dismantled a Colombian heroin ring by arresting several couriers who stitched packets of drugs into their britches and then took cruise ships to the United States, authorities said yesterday.

"Drug traffickers have never lacked creativity in trying to smuggle in their drugs," said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York office.

"But smuggling drugs aboard cruise ships is a new twist, as traffickers try to do an end run around airport security."

The investigation, dubbed "Operation Death Merchant," charged 10 people in Manhattan and 20 others in Colombia with smuggling more than $7.5 million worth of heroin into the U.S.

Several couriers hid the drugs inside running shorts and the soles of their shoes. Others carried suitcases and purses packed with smack.

Agents seized 55 kilos of heroin in all, enough to flood the streets with more than a million glassine bags of smack. Seventy-six kilos of coke also were seized off a "go-fast" boat that had departed from Venezuela.

The drugs made their way from Pereira, Colombia, to New York, Baltimore and Detroit, authorities said.

The probe was a joint venture between the DEA, NYPD, New York state police and Department of Homeland Security's U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency.

Yesterday's charges bring to 110 the number of people charged internationally during the three-year probe.

10 Accused Of Smuggling Heroin In 'Death Merchant' Probe (WNBC)

WNBC-TV, January 17, 2007

Joseph Valiquette Reports For The Investigative Team

NEW YORK -- Charges were unsealed Tuesday naming 10 members of an alleged heroin and cocaine trafficking organization accused of smuggling more than $7.5 million worth of heroin into the United States from Colombia.

Earlier Tuesday, two arrests were made in New York City. Twenty arrests were made in Colombia, five of which were based upon the New York charges.

These charges are the latest to result from Operation Death Merchant, a 3-year international investigation by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies in the United States working with Colombian police agencies.

The probe targeted a drug distribution organization based in Pereira, Colombia, allegedly responsible for transporting heroin and cocaine through South America and the Caribbean into the United States.

Describing the overall results of Operation Death Merchant, DEA Special Agent in Charge John Gilbride said, "Over 117 members have been arrested. Over 170 kilograms of cocaine and 55 kilograms of heroin seized and destroyed."

The smuggled drugs were destined for the eastern part of the United States and distributed throughout New York, Baltimore and Detroit, authorities said.

Authorities said the smuggling methods used by the drug traffickers included couriers who would swallow the heroin pellets and then fly into Kennedy Airport; smugglers who would arrive in the United States aboard cruise ships, taking with them double-sided suitcases filled with heroin; and couriers who carried heroin in the lining of handbags or in the soles of their shoes.

Colombia Nabs Alleged Drug Kingpin (UPI)

UPI, January 16, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia (UPI) -- An alleged Colombian drug kingpin wanted on charges of smuggling tons of cocaine into the United States has been captured, Caracol Radio reported Monday.

Eugenio Montoya was arrested after a prolonged police shootout in which no one was injured, police said.

Montoya`s Norte del Valle cartel is believed to be one of the largest in Colombia and responsible for smuggling a large portion of the cocaine that reached U.S. shores.

The reputed drug boss is sought for extradition to face smuggling charges in a Miami court.

Eugenio Montoya rejects the accusations Police have captured a suspected top member of Colombia's biggest drug cartel, following a shoot-out.

Eugenio Montoya, who also is known as Don Hugo, is alleged to be a leader of the Norte del Valle group. He denies being a drug trafficker.

The FBI lists the group as the most powerful and violent drug-trafficking organisation in Colombia.

Mr Montoya's capture has ended a lengthy manhunt in which the US had offered a $5m reward for his arrest.

He was captured in one of the Norte del Valle's strongholds, the town of El Dovio, 200km (125 miles) west of the capital Bogota. Police say no-one was injured in the shoot-out.

In a news conference, Mr Montoya was presented to journalists, surrounded by heavily-armed police.

He denied being a drug trafficker and said he was there to resolve his situation.

Most-wanted

Officials in Colombia say the Norte del Valle cartel became the country's most powerful after the dismantling of the Medellin and Cali cartels in the 1980s and early 90s.

It is believed to be responsible for as much as 30% of the more than 500 metric tons of Colombian cocaine smuggled each year to the US.

The cartel is accused of having worked with right-wing death squads to protect its valuable drug routes.

Norte del Valle is alleged to be jointly run by Eugenio's brother Diego, who sits alongside Osama Bin Laden on the FBI's most-wanted list.

Ex-city Worker In Water Dept. Drug Ring Gets 5 Years (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 17, 2007

A former city laborer was sentenced to 5 years in federal prison Tuesday for dealing heroin as part of a drug ring run by a former city hoisting engineer.

Michael Hart, who worked for the city's Water Management Department, was hooked on heroin when he turned to dealing to support his habit, said his attorney Eugene O'Malley.

Hart, 41, of Chicago, pleaded guilty in August to dealing large quantities of heroin through the drug ring run by George Prado, a veteran water management employee.

Prado has also pleaded guilty in the case but has not been sentenced.

So severe was Hart's addiction that when federal agents seized him for drug conspiracy they found him sitting over a "breakfast" of heroin, said Assistant U.S. Atty. Michael Gurland.

As he was arrested, Hart requested that he be allowed to get his fix, Gurland said.

Since his arrest in June 2005, Hart has stayed clean through drug treatment, O'Malley said.

His mother, Betty Hart, asked U.S. District Judge Harry Leinenweber to show her son mercy.

"Some of us fall from grace, and Mark is sorry he ever started using," she said.

Hart spoke only briefly, quietly apologizing for the pain he caused his family.

O'Malley requested that Hart serve 1 to 2 years in prison, far less than the 7 years he faced under sentencing guidelines.

Leinenweber gave Hart 5 years because he had no criminal history and was working on beating his drug addiction.

"Being caught was probably the best thing that happened to you. You're a good person who got off on the bad side," Leinenweber said.

Moratorium Sought On New Pot Clinics (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

Bratton cites opening of 94 medical marijuana dispensaries in L.A. in a year and calls for rules to regulate the facilities.

Concerned by a 2,350% increase in the number of medical marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles in a one-year period, Police Chief William J. Bratton is calling for a moratorium on new facilities until strict rules can be adopted governing them.

In a report to the Police Commission, Bratton said he wants to ban existing dispensaries within 1,000 feet of schools, churches, parks and places designated exclusively for the care of children. He also advocates limiting their hours to 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

The establishments are allowed under a 1996 state ballot measure and a more recent state law making marijuana available to patients by prescription to relieve pain or nausea.

Bratton said the number of dispensaries increased from four in November 2005 to 98 a year later.

"This has fostered an increase in … crime problems and caused quality-of-life issues for families and communities, as evidenced by the 110 complaints received from neighbors, business owners and concerned citizens concerning these dispensaries," Bratton's report states.

The Police Commission will consider his recommendations today.

Los Angeles Police Department officers have been called to clinics because of problems including robberies, burglaries and drug use in front of the clinics, Lt. Paul Vernon said. Without regulations, he said, officers are hamstrung.

In the absence of specific zoning rules, 12 of the medical marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles have opened within 1,000 feet of schools, Bratton said.

"One clinic blatantly resorted to placing fliers on the windshields of vehicles parked in and around Grant High School in an obvious effort to entice children," Bratton said.

The chief did not identify the clinic, but said its flier stated that it is legal to own, grow and smoke medical marijuana and that "qualification is simple and our experienced physicians are more than happy to help you," adding that the visit is free if the applicant does not qualify.

"This was not the intent of the voters when they passed Proposition 215," the chief said.

The clinics have proliferated elsewhere as well, although Los Angeles, as the state's largest city, has the most, said Joseph Elford of Americans for Safe Access, a group in support of the clinics. But San Francisco, with about 30 clinics, has more per capita, or about one per 25,400 residents, while Los Angeles has one dispensary for every 39,200 people.

On Monday, advocates for medical marijuana disputed that the dispensaries are magnets for crime, and expressed concerns that Los Angeles officials may reduce patients' access to the drug.

"A blanket ruling saying you can't be within a number of feet within a school or park is entirely unnecessary and overbroad," said Bruce Mirken, a spokesman for the Marijuana Policy Project, another advocacy group.

He said a lengthy moratorium on new dispensaries would have an adverse effect on medical patients who rely on marijuana in their battles with disease.

The proliferation of dispensaries followed passage of Proposition 215, called the Compassionate Use Act, and Senate Bill 420, which took effect in 2004; together, they legalized possession and cultivation of marijuana for qualified medical patients.

Marijuana is used for medical purposes by thousands of people suffering from painful and appetite-killing diseases, including cancer, AIDS, anorexia and arthritis.

"However, the spirit and intent of this act has been exploited and abused for both profit and recreational drug use by many of the medical marijuana dispensaries in the city of Los Angeles," Bratton said. "Absent stringent regulations and enforcement actions, these dispensaries have flourished throughout the city."

The chief's recommendations were welcomed Monday by Councilman Dennis Zine, who already has asked the Planning Department to draft a moratorium ordinance, banning any new outlets for six months, with an option to extend it for another six months while new rules are being formulated. "There is no regulation as far as zoning and hours of operation," Zine said. "What I want to do is bring a semblance of order and not go against the public's will in favor of these clinics."

Steve Leon, owner of the medical marijuana outlet Highland Park Patient Collective, disagreed with the allegation that the clinics spur criminal activity.

DOJ_NMG_0117570

"I think it's quite the opposite," he said. "I'm in an area that is gang-infested, but there is no graffiti on my building. It is very clean. And other businesses have moved in. We have created quite a nice little artistic community."

Leon said his building is more than 1,000 feet from schools and parks, and that the LAPD has been "very gracious."

The proposed moratorium found favor with at least some owners of current dispensaries.

"The moratorium is kind of a good idea. It's getting out of control, with a new one opening every week," said Billy Astorga, manager of the Eagle Rock Herbal Collective, adding that his business already has strict operating rules.

Police Commission Votes To Delay New Pot Clinics (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

The Police Commission voted Tuesday to support a moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries and tougher regulations of existing enterprises, even as Police Chief William J. Bratton promised to work with federal authorities to prosecute businesses found to be violating the law.

"It's my intent to get rid of these places," Bratton said after the commission voted to ask the City Council to impose a moratorium and adopt new restrictions.

The distribution of marijuana for medical purposes is allowed under state law, but Bratton said he believed the majority of people using the dispensaries were recreational drug users.

Bratton Wants City To Examine Medical Marijuana Dispensaries (NBC4)

NBC4, January 17, 2007

Police Commission Agrees To Moratorium

LOS ANGELES -- The Los Angeles Police Commission agreed Tuesday to a moratorium on the issuance of permits for new medical marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles.

Without discussion, the commission agreed with police Chief William Bratton's report that new dispensaries cannot be opened until new rules are adopted in governing where and when they can operate.

"There's a lot of money to be made," Bratton said. "There's nobody minding the store, if you will. They're hiding behind the guise that there's this incredible medical need out there. I'm sorry. The vast majority of people who use these premises are using them for recreational drug use."

In his report, Bratton said he wants to ban existing marijuana dispensaries within 1,000 feet from schools, churches, parks and other areas used by children. He also recommended that the businesses operate between 10 a.m. and 6 p.m.

In October, the City Council's Public Safety Committee agreed to a one-year moratorium on granted permits for new dispensaries as city official seek out stricter operating regulations.

Councilman Dennis Zine proposed the moratorium in September, saying that too many of the dispensaries were operating in the city, oftentimes illegally selling pot to those without prescriptions.

Nearly 100 medical marijuana dispensaries currently operate in Los Angeles, according to Bratton's report.

Calvin Frye runs a medical marijuana clinic in Studio City. He said federal agents raided a nearby clinic after residents complained.

"Guys came in acting like stoned drug dealers -- smoking pot outside in the parking lot, kids coming out and opening their bags, exchanging medicines because there are not regulations," Frye said. "If there were regulations like the board of supervisors did for unincorporated L.A., they wouldn't be able to do that."

Frye said that he supports Bratton's call for more regulations.

Medical marijuana dispensaries are defined as "facilities that provide marijuana for medical purposes to patients or primary caregivers who have a related recommendation from a physician."

Ten years ago, 56 percent of California's voters approved proposition 215, which says marijuana should be made available to people with medical problems, including nausea from cancer and AIDS treatments.

Federal law still bans marijuana use in all cases.

In May, the county Board of Supervisors approved an ordinance regulating medical marijuana dispensaries in unincorporated areas of Los Angeles County, including provisions on where the drug can be consumed.

Bratton said he supports the use of marijuana for medicinal purposes.

Cops: Undercover Agent Infiltrates Robbery Ring (DEN)

By Iveory Perkins, The Detroit News

LINCOLN PARK -- Authorities announced today that an undercover federal officer infiltrated an alleged robbery conspiracy, leading to the arrest of a man and teenager charged with plotting a series of heists Downriver.

The Lincoln Park Police and federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives learned of the plan when a federal agent working another case was informed about the alleged conspiracy.

Authorities claim 19-year-old William Musser of Lincoln Park, and a 16-year-old Dearborn Heights male conspired to rob businesses by targeting employees at gunpoint. They were arrested Friday.

"So often law enforcement is successful at solving crimes after the fact," ATF Special Agent in Charge Valerie Goddard said in a statement. "However in this instance, we prevented this violent crime from ever occurring."

The duo was arrested in a parking lot in Lincoln Park the morning they allegedly planned to commit armed robbery of a tavern in that city, followed by a second robbery of a Taylor restaurant, said Vera Fedorak, public information officer for the ATF.

Musser was charged with conspiracy to commit robbery armed and attempted robbery armed. He remains jailed on a $30,000 bond. The juvenile is in the Wayne County Youth Home until prosecutors determine whether he will be charged as an adult.

"I'm proud of the flawless and cooperative effort of our detectives and agents of the ATF and their special response team members," Police Chief Thomas Karnes said in a written statement.

IMMIGRATION:

Gonzales: 148 Immigrants Indicted In Swift Raids (AP)

AP, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says 148 illegal immigrants have been indicted for allegedly acquiring other peoples' Social Security numbers and other information to get jobs at Swift meat packing plants.The indictments, issued in Iowa and five other states, follow federal raids on the plants last month in the largest-ever workplace crackdown on illegal immigration. The raids led to the arrests of nearly 13 hundred employees and temporarily halted operations for the meat processor.Gonzales says the Bush administration is studying ways to curb identity theft, including better ways for police to report the crime, and to reduce the access that thieves have to Social Security numbers.The federal indictments include: 53 in Texas, 30 in Iowa, 26 in Nebraska, 20 in Minnesota, 18 in Utah and one in Colorado.

Fence Advocate Calls Estimates Exaggerated (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

Rep. Duncan Hunter has a name for people like the congressional researchers who recently determined that the fence he proposes to build along the southern border could cost about 25 times the roughly $2 billion he estimated.

"I call them the 'Mission Impossible' crowd," the California Republican said, referring to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service and others who predict that the fence will cost nearly $50 billion.

As chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Mr. Hunter authored legislation in the last Congress to build 850 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

He might lump into that crowd Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, who yesterday expressed his own skepticism about the fence.

"I think the fence will be revisited," he told reporters gathered in his office for a weekly briefing. "The appropriators will look at whether or not this is an expenditure that continues to make sense."

Like Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and most other members of the Democratic House leadership, Mr. Hoyer opposed the legislation to build the fence.

President Bush might fall into that group as well. The administration, Mr. Hoyer noted yesterday, "has not been enthusiastic" about implementing the Secure Fence Act of 2006.

When Mr. Hunter first floated the bill, it was widely attacked as hateful and un-American. Democrats and liberals tarred him and its supporters as "anti-immigrant."

But by last fall, as members of both parties began to grasp the depth of outrage among voters about illegal entry, the proposal sailed through both chambers.

DOJ_NMG_0117572

The House voted 283-138 to build the fence, and the Senate, which has been much more lenient toward illegal aliens, approved it by a vote of 80-19.

"The American people want this fence," said Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican. "They want us to secure our borders."

Mr. Hoyer agreed with that ultimate goal.

"The objective would be, as we move forward, to secure the border," he said, but "there has not been agreement that the fence is the best way to do it."

Supporters point to the success of the fence that runs through San Diego and hope that by extending it through other high-traffic areas they will curb illegal entry as well as halt the drug trade across the border.

Mr. Hunter said government analysts and outside interest groups have grossly inflated estimates for a fence that he said will cost between $2 billion and $3 billion. He and Mr. King produced three estimates provided by a trade group and two construction companies vying for the job.

Douglas E. Barnhart Inc., a California-based construction firm, estimated $2.6 million per mile, or roughly $2.3 billion. Alabama Metal Industries Corp. estimated the work would cost $2.5 million per mile, or about $2.1 billion.

The fence consists of two security fences with a road in between for Border Patrol vehicles. The Chain Link Fence Manufacturers Institute provided an estimate of $1.3 million per mile of heavy industrial chain-link fence that is 12 feet high with an 11-foot overhang, much like the backstop on a baseball diamond.

"If we had a secure border, you could pay for the entire border fence in one year with the money you save by not having to incarcerate these criminal aliens," Mr. Hunter said.

Added Mr. King, who was in the construction business before serving in Congress: "We are now paying $8 billion a year on the southern border as it is. That's $4 million per mile and we're not stopping anybody."

Immigrants Mistreated, Report Says (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

U.S. authorities mistreated suspected illegal immigrants at five prisons and jails nationwide, violating federal standards meant to ensure safe and humane custody, according to a government report released yesterday.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials and contractors denied timely medical treatment to some of the immigrants, failed to disclose and justify disciplinary actions against them, and improperly limited access to relatives, lawyers and immigration authorities, according to the Department of Homeland Security inspector general.

Detention officers failed to establish a system to report abuse and violated health and safety rules by neglecting to monitor prisoners on hunger strikes or suicide watches and by serving undercooked food, the report said.

The report comes amid a sharp increase in illegal immigrants in U.S. detention as Congress and the Bush administration debate an overhaul of immigration laws and promise tougher enforcement of existing laws. Civil liberties and immigrant advocacy groups are stepping up scrutiny of conditions. Jorge Bustamante, the U.N. special rapporteur on human rights of immigrants, has asked to visit U.S. detention centers next month.

Critics of the agency called the report disappointing, contending that it watered down recommendations and ignored the most serious allegations of abuse collected since June 2004, which they said included physical beatings, medical neglect, food shortages and mixing of illegal immigrants in administrative custody with criminals.

"It took two years for them to come out with this? It's incredibly disappointing," said Judy Rabinovitz, a lawyer with the ACLU immigrants rights project.

Eric Lerner, a spokesman for the New Jersey Civil Rights Defense Committee, called the report a "whitewash" that was delayed to suppress controversy. Bryan Lonegan, a lawyer with the Legal Aid Society in New York City, said that DHS has not designated 38 detention standards implemented since 2000 as federal regulations, making them unenforceable.

A spokeswoman for Richard L. Skinner, the DHS inspector general, said the report was delayed because its scope was reduced.

In a written response to the report, DHS Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers concurred at least partly with nine of 13 findings and promised changes. But she said they "do not indicate any systemic failure" at nearly 400 facilities where ICE is authorized to house as many as 27,500 people a night, because they were based on individual allegations at a small sample of sites.

ICE operations are "generally in compliance with its National Detention Standards," Myers said.

The audit examined the U.S.-owned and operated Krome Service Processing Center in Miami, a contract Corrections Corporation of American facility in San Diego, and local jails and prisons in Berks County, Pa., and Hudson and Passaic counties, N.J.

DOJ_NMG_0117573

In December 2005, ICE ordered all suspected illegal immigrants removed from the Passaic jail in Paterson, N.J., after a string of critical news accounts, including the disclosure that guards used police dogs against prisoners. DHS has since barred that practice.

Although illegal immigrants are held on administrative grounds and are supposed to be segregated by high, medium and low risk, authorities often house them together with criminals, the report said.

Many contract and state and local correction officers were unaware of separate U.S. standards for detained immigrants, the 54-page report noted. ICE itself overlooks violations in annual inspections, the report said. "A final rating of Acceptable was given to all five detention facilities," the report said. "However, our review of the five facilities identified instances of non-compliance . . . that were not identified during the ICE annual inspection."

Immigrant Centers Inspected (NYT)

By Rachel Swarns

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

A federal inspection of 5 of the nation's 325 immigrant detention centers found that most did not provide timely and responsive health care and sometimes failed to comply with the government's standards of disciplining, classifying and housing detainees. The audit by the Department of Homeland Security also found a rape of a detainee in one center and a failure to provide access to legal services in another. Three centers did not translate handbooks into Spanish and other languages. Homeland security officials said the study was too small to be representative of the country's detention centers.

REVERSAL OF FORTUNE An Immigration Raid Aids Blacks -- For A Time (WSJ)

By Evan Pérez And Corey Dade

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

STILLMORE, Ga. -- After a wave of raids by federal immigration agents on Labor Day weekend, a local chicken-processing company called Crider Inc. lost 75% of its mostly Hispanic 900-member work force. The crackdown threatened to cripple the economic anchor of this fading rural town.

But for local African-Americans, the dramatic appearance of federal agents presented an unexpected opportunity. Crider suddenly raised pay at the plant. An advertisement in the weekly Forest-Blade newspaper blared "Increased Wages" at Crider, starting at $7 to $9 an hour -- more than a dollar above what the company had paid many immigrant workers. The company began offering free transportation from nearby towns and free rooms in a company-owned dormitory near to the plant. For the first time in years, local officials say, Crider aggressively sought workers from the area's state-funded employment office -- a key avenue for low-skilled workers to find jobs. Of 400 candidates sent to Crider -- most of them black -- the plant hired about 200.

A customer at a convenience store in Douglas, Ga., told April Paulk, a part-time clerk, that a recruiter was in town looking for workers. Ms. Paulk passed the word to her husband, 32-year-old Germaine Royals, who had just been laid off from the latest in a series of temporary jobs. Both are African-American.

Less than a month after the raids on illegal immigrants, Mr. Royals and three other workers met at a gas station parking lot and piled into a van sent by Peacock Poultry Inc., one of several contractors hired to fill the ranks of Crider's production lines. Two hours later they pulled into an austere complex of brown dormitories owned by Crider that three weeks earlier had teemed with Hispanics. Mr. Royals stashed two small bags of belongings and a boom box in a dingy room and took his place the next morning on a production line at the chicken plant.

For the first time since significant numbers of Latinos began arriving in Stillmore in the late 1990s, the plant's processing lines were made up predominantly of African-Americans.

The sudden reversal of economic fortunes in Stillmore underscores some of the most complex aspects of the pitched debate over immigration: Do illegal immigrants take jobs from low-skilled American workers? The answer in Stillmore initially appeared to be yes.

But in the months since Crider began hiring hundreds of African-Americans, the answer has become more complex. The plant has struggled with high turnover among black workers, lower productivity and pay disputes between the new employees and labor contractors. The allure of compliant Latino workers willing to accept grueling conditions despite rock-bottom pay has proved a difficult habit for Crider to shake, particularly because the local, native-born workers who replaced them are more likely to complain about working conditions and aggressively assert what they believe to be legal pay and workplace rights.

Americans avoid such labor because "they can't live on those wages, and refuse to," says Debra Sabia, a professor at nearby Georgia Southern University who founded a social-service organization for the area's Latino immigrants. "If you gave a survey to Americans and asked them where they'd want to work, a slaughterhouse would not be on the list. These are not jobs we aspire for our children to take."

The impact of immigration on low-wage workers is likely to come under increasing scrutiny as the new Congress prepares to tackle immigration reform. Last month, federal officials raided facilities owned by meat processor Swift & Co. in six states, which resulted in the arrests of about 1,200 people on alleged identity theft and immigration violations.

Georgia, and particularly the Atlanta region in the north of the state, is home to a large concentration of wealthy and middle-class African-Americans. But in struggling rural towns, the scarcity of work is particularly felt by low-skilled African-Americans who by virtue of poor education, lack of transportation or choice have been unable to follow jobs as they moved away.

Stillmore began the 20th century as a timber and cotton town, sitting at the intersection of three rail lines connecting the busy port town of Savannah to the center of Georgia's cotton kingdom. For decades, anyone willing to grasp a hoe could find at least minimal work every spring and fall, when cotton was planted and harvested. But by the 1950s, cotton was fading, the rail lines were abandoned and a chicken-processing plant -- later acquired by Crider in 1977 -- had become the hub of the local economy.

Until the late 1990s, the plant employed a majority black production line, with whites and some blacks as supervisors, according to current and former employees. By 2000, Latino migrant workers who had long come and gone with the cotton and onion seasons were putting down roots, part of a national trend. The NAFTA free trade agreement hurt many Mexican farmers, prompting a surge of illegal immigration. At the same time U.S. immigration crackdowns made crossing the border more treacherous, prompting workers to settle in the U.S. The South became home to more than a third of the nation's Hispanics. Georgia's share tripled during the 1990s to 435,227, according to U.S. Census estimates. In 2005, the number of Hispanics topped 625,000 in Georgia, making up 7% of the population.

The influx of Hispanics meant Crider could maintain its Stillmore roots while drawing on a pool of low-skilled foreign workers to do jobs that held little appeal for native-born Americans. A 2005 Government Accountability Office report on working conditions in the meat and poultry industry found injury rates among the highest of any U.S. industry and cited slippery floors and cold temperatures among the harsh conditions workers endure. Federal workplace-safety inspectors cited Crider in 1997 for a forklift accident in which a worker was run over and killed. Other plants in Georgia have even higher incidences of violations, according to federal records.

With the arrival of so many immigrants willing to toil for rock-bottom wages on brutal round-the-clock shifts, the number of black workers at Crider declined steadily to 14% in early 2006 from as high as 70% a decade ago, the company says. Wages stagnated at about $6 an hour, just above the U.S. minimum wage of $5.15 an hour, current and former workers say. Crider says it also paid incentives and bonuses not accounted for in hourly wages. As African-Americans left, seeking better pay or to escape the difficult and often bloody work, most were replaced by Latinos, employees say.

Crider officials say the transformation to majority Hispanic work force happened gradually over most of a decade, without any encouragement by the company. David Purtle, Crider's president, says any impression that the company didn't want to hire African-Americans then was "concocted in people's minds who don't know what's going on. The first people you see in our employment office are African-Americans.... We've never skewed our hiring toward any ethnic group."

But he says Crider faces the same problems that employers in many small towns grapple with. "We have to find a source of employees, and Stillmore will not provide that source. It's not big enough," he says. "We want people who want to work and are willing to work every day."

The presence of so many illegal workers became routine at Crider too. José Sauceda first came to the U.S. as an illegal immigrant in 1979 but qualified for legal status under a Reagan administration amnesty program and became a U.S. citizen in 2002. He arrived at Crider in 2004. His wife, Socorro, whom Mr. Sauceda had paid smugglers to sneak across the border, followed him to the poultry plant. As she filled out a job application at the plant, she tried to use for a Social Security number a taxpayer identification number starting with the number "9." According to Ms. Sauceda, a Crider clerk stopped her and said valid Social Security numbers never begin with a nine. "She was very helpful," Ms. Sauceda says. "She kept saying, 'Perhaps you meant to put down a four, or a six?' And I was nervous, so I just chose a six. And that worked." Her application was accepted. Ms. Sauceda went to work on the production line.

Crider officials said recently they doubted Ms. Sauceda's account of her hiring, and that the company wasn't "aiding and abetting" illegal Hispanic workers. Mr. Purtle, the company president, said in an interview that Crider never knowingly violated U.S. immigration laws and wasn't aware that so many of its Latino workers were illegally in the U.S. "Our personnel people have always complied with the hiring laws," Mr. Purtle said.

The company was "taken aback" when federal agents showed up in May asserting that about 700 of its workers were suspected of having false work documents, Mr. Purtle says. Two Crider employees were among four men arrested for allegedly running a document mill, churning out fake green cards and other fake documents. Immigration officials initially worked with Crider over several months to gradually weed out those workers who couldn't prove legal worker status. Then, federal officials became much more aggressive, launching the raid over Labor Day weekend. Agents hauled away about 120 mostly Mexican immigrants, according to immigration officials.

The rest fled Stillmore or went into hiding nearby. Some women and children hid for days in the scrubland and pine woods outside of town without food or shelter while they waited for immigration agents to leave. In the week after the raids, dozens of Latinos crowded a vacant lot beside a bodega, across from Stillmore's city hall, to get on buses operated by a Mexican bus line leaving for other cities in the U.S. or back to Mexico.

For African-Americans, the departure of the Hispanics was a boon. Lisa Shinhoster, 45, and Chris Butler, 22, heard about Crider when an acquaintance of a Crider recruiter walked into an after-hours bar where they were playing cards and announced to the patrons: "Anybody want a job?" The two were soon working at the plant gutting chickens.

For Mr. Royals, the new opportunities at Crider amounted to a windfall after months of erratic work through a temporary labor agency. A high-school dropout who earned his General Education Diploma two years ago, Mr. Royals previously worked nights at a succession of factory jobs. He had just been laid off for the second time in a month when Ms. Paulk came home with word of the Crider recruiter.

Mr. Royals went to Crider with a plan to work as many hours as possible -- he sometimes worked 17 hours a day -- and earn enough to save for a new home and pay off bills. His wife recently took a full-time job as a private nurse for an elderly woman and attends classes at a technical college to earn a license as a practical nurse.

Mr. Royals rose daily before dawn, often eating a breakfast of grits, eggs and sausage served shortly after 5 a.m. at the Crider cafeteria. Mr. Royals was assigned to the plant's packing department, where his squat burly frame and muscular arms made him a natural fit, lifting crates of processed chicken. He says he enjoyed the physical nature of the work and the quick pace made the hours go by quickly.

But for some of the African-American workers who surged into the plant, the unexpected chance to work at Crider didn't turn out well. They described long, arduous schedules, alleged health and safety hazards, and unrelenting supervisors. A Crider spokeswoman says the allegations are the sentiment of "people who are not intent on working."

On Oct. 10, Barbara Smiley, a gregarious and tall 42-year-old from Mount Vernon, about two hours away, was reaching for a chicken that had fallen off a conveyor belt when she smacked her head into a solid steel pole. She went to the nurse's station for an ice pack and then the bathroom to wash down a pain reliever. She says her supervisor reprimanded her for leaving her post, igniting an argument. Ms. Smiley was fired.

"They cussed at me," Mrs. Smiley said after the incident, a lump visible in center of her forehead in the shape of a half-dollar coin. "I'm 42 years old. If you cuss at me, I'm going to cuss you back."

The company spokeswoman said Ms. Smiley suffered a mild injury and quit but couldn't confirm other details of the incident.

Legal Hispanic workers who remained at Crider after the raid complain that the new black production line workers are getting higher pay but don't work as hard as their Latino cohorts did. When the plant operated with majority Latino laborers, says Mr. Sauceda, his six-person assembly line produced 80 pallets of poultry daily, with each pallet holding 48 32-pound boxes of chicken. Now, with 15 workers on the line, most of them black, only 45 pallets a day are completed, he says. "The blacks sit in the cafeteria and don't come to the line until the chickens are brought in, but the Hispanics, we spend the time cleaning and doing things that need to be done," says Mr. Sauceda, who has subsequently left the company. Mr. Royals counters that blacks work just as hard as Latinos. He says he sees groups of Hispanics taking extra rests on overnight shifts. "I'm thinking to myself, man, I don't get that many breaks," he says.

Several African-American workers found themselves in pay disputes. Since the illegal immigrants were run out of the plant, Crider no longer directly employs many entry-level workers. Instead, Mr. Royals and many others are classified as independent contractors, working under an agreement between Crider and Allen Peacock, an African-American owner of a recruiting business. Crider paid Mr. Peacock a set rate for the hours his employees work, and he paid the workers. Using Mr. Peacock allowed Crider to quickly hire workers, since the contractor has provided laborers to the poultry industry for years.

Every Friday, Mr. Peacock pulled into the parking lot of the dormitory complex and handed out checks, most of which he cashed on the spot -- leaving his employees with no documentation of how much they received in wages or paid in taxes, according to several workers.

After a few weeks on the job, Mr. Royals and other black workers claimed Mr. Peacock was short changing them on hours worked. They said taxes were being deducted even though workers never filled out federal and state tax forms. At one point, Ms. Paulk, Mr. Royals's wife, telephoned Mr. Peacock and demanded an explanation about the paychecks.

Mr. Peacock denied mishandling their wages. "Everybody has to pay taxes," he said in an interview. Mr. Peacock said his workers were all being fully paid and that their taxes were properly collected.

Despite his frustrations, Mr. Royals vowed to keep working. But one morning, Mr. Peacock arrived at the Crider dormitory complex and several workers gathered to register their complaints about wages. In front of the other employees, Mr. Royals says, Mr. Peacock fired him.

Mr. Royals says Mr. Peacock seemed upset that Ms. Paulk had called him on his cellphone on her husband's behalf. "He said I couldn't put my wife in her place," Mr. Royals says. Mr. Peacock didn't respond to subsequent calls seeking comment.

Mr. Royals moved to Augusta, Ga. where he began doing landscaping work.

Since the raids, African-Americans have made up about 65% of Crider's work force, while whites are 30% and Hispanics 5%, according to the company. Turnover has been high. The population of workers hired since last September's immigration raids has turned over three times, according to Crider.

Still struggling to fill its ranks, Crider began busing in felons on probation from a state prison and residents of a homeless mission from nearby Macon. Crider also hired another labor contractor who specializes in Hispanic workers. In recent weeks, dozens of mostly Hispanic workers have appeared at the plant, largely on the overnight sanitation shift. A Hispanic worker at the plant said he recognized some of the new workers as among those who had been dismissed prior to the federal raids for having false immigration documents. A few weeks later, immigration agents returned to Stillmore, and were seen questioning Hispanics at a grocery store.

Crider says it has ended its relationship with the temporary labor provider that rehired some former illegal Crider workers. It says it has also ended its relationship with Mr. Peacock, saying it was a financial decision based on the additional fees they had to pay to the staffing company.

But Crider is still about 300 people short of its work force before the immigration raids. It is now bringing Laotian Hmong immigrant workers and their families from Minnesota and Wisconsin, with hopes that they'll stay on the job and build new roots in Stillmore.

Judge Takes Plea To Court Over Ancillary Proceeding (WSJ)

By Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

New York federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan, a former litigator, is getting to play lawyer again. Judge Kaplan recently filed a brief with the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals -- on behalf of himself.

The filing came as part of a high-profile case the judge is overseeing, the indictment of 16 former partners of accounting firm KPMG LLP and two others on criminal tax-fraud charges. Judge Kaplan got the bar buzzing when he ruled in June that prosecutors violated the constitutional rights of the KPMG defendants by pressuring the firm not to pay their legal fees.

The ground-breaking decision was followed by another unusual one: Judge Kaplan created a separate civil proceeding, under his watch, about the legal-fee dispute between the firm and the defendants.

When KPMG appealed, the appeals court wanted to know what Judge Kaplan was thinking when he ordered a side proceeding, and did he have the authority to do it? Ralph Winter, one of the appeals judges, called the move "extremely dubious."

Injecting yet another twist in the case, the appeals court invited the judge to defend himself.

In his 47-page response, Judge Kaplan acknowledged his move was unusual but said the complex issues surrounding this case are unlikely to recur again, if ever. "In short, this case is a perfect storm," he wrote. Creating the ancillary proceeding should only be used in "exceptional cases." He added: "This is such a case." The issue is pending.

Wordsmithing

Both Louis Begley and Thomas Evans are retired septuagenarian corporate lawyers from big New York firms. Both also are authors with books out this month and plans hatching for others.

Mr. Evans -- who was a managing partner at the now defunct Mudge Rose Guthrie Alexander & Ferdon, where he worked for 30 years -- has written "The Education of Ronald Reagan," a history focused on the period from 1954 to 1962 when Mr. Reagan worked as a spokesman for General Electric. The book offers new insight into Mr. Reagan's transformation from a liberal actor to a conservative politician, reviewers say.

DOJ_NMG_0117577

Though Mr. Evans worked as an adviser to the Reagan White House, he had closer ties to another president, Richard Nixon. Mr. Evans worked with Mr. Nixon at the Mudge Rose firm in the 1960s after Mr. Nixon's failed bids for the presidency and governor of California. Mr. Evans hints that his next book may examine the impact Mr. Nixon's years at Mudge Rose had on his political career.

"People came to have greater respect for Mr. Nixon after his stint as a Wall Street lawyer," he says.

Mr. Begley, who spent more than four decades at Debevoise & Plimpton before retiring in 2004, isn't a newcomer to the literary world. His eighth novel -- "Matters of Honor" -- will be published at the end of the month.

Mr. Begley says he is working on a short biography of another lawyer/writer, Franz Kafka, who holds a curious appeal for him: "I think he was wretched...and fascinating."

Benched

Last Wednesday was supposed to be a highlight of Milton Chappell's 30-year legal career. For the first time, he was going to argue a case before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Events didn't unfold exactly the way Mr. Chappell might have liked. Since Mr. Chappell joined the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation fresh out of law school in 1976, he has pursued cases aiming to rein in organized labor. He was thrilled when the justices took his appeal of a Washington state decision throwing out a statute making it tougher for unions to use fees from nonmembers for political campaign purposes.

Mr. Chappell had high-powered legal help, with Washington Attorney General Robert McKenna arguing alongside him. Under Supreme Court rules, each side gets 30 minutes, so Mr. Chappell and the attorney general divvied up their time -- 20 minutes for Mr. McKenna, 10 for Mr. Chappell.

Then Mr. Chappell got a call from the office of the government's Supreme Court lawyer, U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement, saying he wanted to argue for 10 minutes -- on Mr. Chappell's side. The hitch: "They take the time the solicitor wants out of the side the solicitor is supporting," Mr. Chappell says, and "I couldn't find a situation where the court had allowed three attorneys to argue for 10 minutes each."

That meant he and Mr. McKenna had to decide who would make the argument. "The [Supreme Court] marshal's office consoled us and tried to get us to be adults and work something out." In the end, Mr. Chappell agreed to cede his time -- and watch the two government lawyers make his case.

Cutting Your Capital-Gains Tax Bill To Zero (WSJ)

By Tom Herman And Rachel Emma Silverman

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

A tax break that could benefit many investors is scheduled to arrive next January, and it's not too soon to start planning ahead.

At first glance, the provision appears relevant only to lower-income taxpayers: Beginning in 2008, the tax rate on long-term capital gains from sales of stocks, mutual funds and other securities is scheduled to drop to zero -- yes, zero -- for people in the two lowest ordinary income brackets. (For higher-income taxpayers, the top long-term capital-gains rate is scheduled to remain at 15%.)

But financial planners say many people with higher income also may be able to take advantage of the zero tax rate if they can reduce their taxable income through deductions, such as mortgage interest and charitable donations, or by socking away money in tax-advantaged accounts, such as 401(k) plans.

"A lot of middle-income people will qualify for this," says Tony DeChellis, senior manager of product development at Thomson Corp.'s PPC/Quickfinder, a Fort Worth, Texas, publisher of tax information.

Families in an upper tax bracket may benefit, too, by making gifts of stock, mutual-fund shares and other securities that have increased in value over the years to low-income family members, such as their young-adult kids, grandchildren or parents, who may then be able to turn around and sell the securities tax free next year.

But use caution: Such gifts may cause problems for students applying for college financial aid, or to seniors seeking Medicaid eligibility, including for nursing-home care. They could make a senior's Social Security benefits subject to tax, or increase the tax on those benefits. Also, because of the recently expanded reach of the so-called kiddie tax, investment income above $1,700 for a child younger than 18 typically is charged at the parents' higher tax rates. It's always smart to check with a financial adviser before making a large transfer of shares.

Nadine Gordon Lee, president of Prosper Advisors LLC, an Armonk, N.Y., wealth-management firm, says she is already planning to take advantage of the upcoming 0% rate. She and her husband have begun transferring shares of equity-based mutual funds, purchased at a lower cost, to one of their sons, now 16. The plan is that he will begin selling them in 2008, when he turns 18, Ms. Lee says. The Lees also are giving highly appreciated stock to their other son, who is 19, and those shares are being sold this year at the current capital-gains-tax rate of 5% for lower-income brackets.

Giving appreciated stock "works nicely for funding the lifestyle of your college and graduate students who are not eligible for financial aid," Ms. Lee says.

Before making any such gifts, be sure to check with a tax adviser on any possible gift-tax or estate-tax consequences, or other possible hitches, Ms. Lee says. However, a gift of this type may be an efficient way to use the annual gift-tax exclusion, she says. That means you can give away as much as $12,000 this year to anyone else -- and to as many other people as you wish -- without any federal gift-tax consequences. (Gifts that exceed that amount typically must be reported to the Internal Revenue Service. Generally, there's a lifetime gift-tax exclusion of $1 million per donor. Gifts above that limit typically are subject to gift tax, and the top rate now is 45%. Gifts don't count as taxable income to the recipient. They also aren't deductible on the giver's income tax returns.)

Investors should never sell securities solely because of tax considerations. But if you're thinking of selling anyway, understanding the tax considerations can help you and your family keep more of the gains.

The 0% rate for lower-income taxpayers was part of the 2003 tax act passed by Congress that, among other things, set the maximum long-term capital-gains rate at 15%. But these rates are set to expire after 2010 unless Congress extends them. Many members of Congress are concerned that an extension could exacerbate the budget deficit.

How low must someone's income be to qualify for the 0% capital-gains-tax rate? Nobody knows for sure because income brackets are adjusted annually for inflation, and the IRS won't release the numbers for 2008 until late this year. But for 2007, a single person falls into the 15% bracket with taxable income of not more than $31,850. For joint filers, this figure is $63,700.

A few pointers: Favorable capital-gains rates apply only to "long-term" gains, or gains on shares held for more than a year. Short-term gains (on shares held a year or less) typically are taxed at regular federal income-tax rates, which can be as high as 35%. What's more, the low capital-gains-tax rates apply only to shares in taxable accounts. They also don't apply to sales of appreciated art and other collectibles; there, the top capital-gains rate typically is 28%.

If you do decide to sell, make sure to unload the shares that will result in the best tax result. This can get tricky. For example, suppose you own 300 shares of a stock purchased many years ago. You bought 100 shares at $5 a share, another 100 shares at $10, and another 100 shares at $50. Now you decide to sell 100 shares. Unless you specify otherwise, the shares of a stock that you bought first are considered to be the ones sold first. If you prefer to sell more-recent shares, make sure to notify your broker at the time of sale and get a confirmation. With mutual funds, you can use the average cost of the shares purchased. There are two averaging methods. See IRS Publication 564 for details.

If you still have confidence in your investment, but you want to take advantage of the zero rate next year, here's a strategy to consider: Sell some of the investment at a gain in 2008, and then immediately buy back shares of the same investment. That means you can still enjoy that zero rate, maintain your position in the security but have a higher basis when you eventually sell the new shares. (The strategy doesn't run afoul of so-called wash-sale rules, because these only apply when selling an investment at a loss, not for gains.) * * *

THE IRS OPENS its doors to electronic filing this year -- for most people.

Opening day for e-filing your federal income-tax return for 2006 generally was this past Friday, the IRS said. But you can't e-file until Feb. 3 if you're claiming key tax provisions enacted last month. Both e-filed returns and paper returns claiming these provisions -- deductions for state and local sales taxes, higher education tuition and fees, and educator expenses for classroom supplies -- won't be processed if submitted before Feb. 3.

Tax returns filed on paper will be accepted but won't be processed until after IRS systems are updated Feb. 3, the IRS said.

IRS officials strongly urge taxpayers to file electronically. E-filing is "the fastest, safest and most accurate way" to file, said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson. He said people will get their refunds more quickly that way than filing the old-fashioned paper way. E-filing also "greatly reduces the chances for making an error."

Last year the IRS received more than 73 million returns electronically, up 7% from the prior year. A spokesman said almost 54% of all returns were filed electronically. * * *

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Pulls Back Court Nomination (AP)

AP, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117579

President Bush on Tuesday withdrew a controversial federal appeals court nominee, a nod to the Senate's new Democratic leadership.

Bush had just resubmitted Norman Randy Smith of Idaho to the Senate last week for a seat on the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. At the time, Bush also withdrew four nominees.

The president sent Smith's name to the Senate in December 2005, again last August, before his original nomination expired, and again in November, as required after Congress goes on an extended break.

Smith has been part of a group that Democrats, then in the minority but with the ability to block nominations, branded too conservative for the federal bench.

Last February, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., blocked a vote on Smith, saying the nomination would give Idaho undue weight on the West's top appellate court. California has 36 million people, compared with 1.5 million in Idaho.

Democrats Go On Offensive (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, January 17, 2007

Democratic leaders are launching a broad counteroffensive on issues ranging from Iraq to energy policy in advance of President Bush's State of the Union address next week, hoping to separate the president from the typical popularity boost that comes with the nationally televised speech.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) are still putting in place the specifics of their plan, but senior Democratic sources say the new leaders are orchestrating a "strong push-back" beginning today on some of Bush's major proposals.

The Democrats will hold numerous events on both sides of the Capitol to try to ensure they go into Tuesday night's speech with an upper hand on the issues they believe Bush is set to address, including the Iraq War, balancing the budget, global warming and energy independence. Democrats already are fanning out to the rank-and-file Members, urging them to set expectations high, so that the onus is on Bush to measure up.

"Democrats are not going to let the president come here and have a clean slate for where he thinks the country should be going and force Democrats into looking like he's already sitting at the table ready to work with us," said a senior House Democratic aide. "We want to make it clear that we are ready to work with him, but he needs to be realistic and honest in his proposals."

A second Democratic leadership source said the atmosphere is much different for Bush, given that for the first time in his tenure he will go before more Democratic faces than Republican. Democrats, for the first time, have the opportunity to walk into the State of the Union address with the advantage.

"Because we control both houses of Congress and the president is trying to defend an unpopular war, we have a chance to set the agenda and say what needs to be done," said the leadership aide.

While Senators are expected to keep the heat on Bush over his expected call to address global warming and energy independence, House Democrats will spend the balance of the week touting their "100 hours" package of accomplishments from ethics reform to an increase in the minimum wage.

Reid and Pelosi will close out the week with their take on the State of the Union in an address at the National Press Club. Formerly known as the "prebuttal" and now dubbed the "Report to the American People on the State of Our Union," Reid will focus his remarks on U.S. foreign policy in Iraq and Afghanistan, while Pelosi largely will stick to domestic themes such as energy reform, climate change and innovation.

The two leaders are expected to try to put Bush on the defensive heading into next week, questioning his policies and demanding explanations from the president. Reid, in particular, is likely to make clear in his address Friday that Bush won't get a blank check from Congress to fund the Iraq War and will hold the president accountable for his plan, sources say.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said that while the Democratic leaders will not abandon their call for bipartisanship, they also plan to make clear that Democrats will not negotiate on Bush's terms.

"Democrats are prepared to work with the president where we can, but he needs to move toward us more than he has in the past," Manley said.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said the new Speaker will remind the public that Democrats — in power for a few short weeks — already have laid down "a down payment" on their promises and will pledge to do more in the majority.

"We will talk about what we think needs to be done to make the future better for America's working families," Daly said. "We delivered exactly what we said we would."

DOJ_NMG_0117580

Democratic leaders have tapped freshman Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) to deliver the party's official response to the State of the Union. Democrats believe Webb, a former Navy secretary and Vietnam War veteran whose son is serving in Iraq, represents their broader Democratic platform of change and a new direction in the country.

Webb was elected from conservative-leaning Virginia and serves as symbol of Democratic inroads in Republican-leaning states.

"Sen. Webb represents the sweeping demand for leaders who will put aside gridlock in Washington to deliver change at home and abroad," Reid and Pelosi said of Webb.

Speeches aside, Democratic leaders also will spend the coming days holding press events and working with key committee chairmen and other leaders to advance their message. Democrats already are urging Members to come up with a set of specific questions to pose to the president in advance of his speech.

Today, Reid will join leading Senators on energy matters to outline their expectations for Bush's expected policy proposals. Later in the week, Reid will hold a similar event with outside energy experts and a pen-and-pad session with fellow Senate leaders to try to set the tone for the upcoming State of the Union. Senators likely will hold a similar pen-and-pad meeting the day of the address.

Democratic leaders didn't waste any time warming up on Tuesday. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) scoffed at news reports that signaled Bush would try to use the State of the Union to put the burden on Democrats to balance the federal books and take on key issues such as energy and global warming.

Hoyer said Democrats "are prepared to work with him in a constructive and positive way," but the president will have to prove his credibility.

The Second 100 Hours (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

As the 100 Hours clock ticks, or digitally elapses, to a close, the newly installed House Democratic majority may start wishing it could slow the hands of legislative time. In hindsight, this is quickly going to look like the easy part, and the Democrats are going to find themselves suffering from a case of delayed Redfordism.

"What do we do now?" Robert Redford, playing newly elected Sen. Bill McKay, famously asks at the end of the 1972 movie "The Candidate." The first 100 hours agenda gave Democrats the framework to avoid that befuddlement at the start of the 110th Congress. But when the clock runs out, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) may start to wonder whether Newt Gingrich had a point in pacing his Contract With America agenda over days, not hours.

? The first 100 hours agenda will quickly collide with Senate and White House reality.

However gratifying it may feel to check items off the to-do list, House Democrats -- and the folks to whom they made their promises -- are about to discover the limits of their ability to deliver. On some proposals (Medicare prescription drug negotiations), the cooling saucer of the Senate could be a deep freeze. Others that pass the Senate (stem cell research) will still confront President Bush's veto.

? Having picked the low-hanging legislative fruit, Democrats have far more back-breaking work ahead.

Now come issues, from climate change to health care to immigration to farm subsidies, on which there is less agreement, inside and outside the party. Democrats may choose to punt on some, but unavoidably unpleasant budget choices begin next month. An already tight spending situation will be exacerbated by the pent-up demand resulting from the decision to freeze this year's spending at 2006 levels. But there are countervailing pressures from budget hawks within the Democratic caucus and from a president eager to veto appropriations bills and cast Democrats as the same old spendthrifts.

? The fissures, internal and external, in the Democratic Party, will start to emerge, like cracks in the Arctic ice shelf.

Internally, Pelosi presides over a motley caucus that agreed to agree on her Six for '06. Don't bet on similar unanimity over Seven for '07. She's got some Grumpy Old Chairmen miffed at being elbowed aside during the first 100 hours and put out by the GOP term limits that the new leadership left in place. She's got Blue Dogs vs. the Black Caucus, urban liberals vs. Western and Southern moderates, all with their own conflicting agendas and electoral pressures.

Externally, the party's natives -- the liberal blogosphere, labor, gays, trial lawyers, environmentalists -- will begin to get restless, like a carful of cranky children on a long trip. If you don't toss them snacks every so often, they're going to have a meltdown. But the snack supply is limited, and there's going to be back-seat bickering over who gets theirs first.

? The consequences of promises will come home to roost.

DOJ_NMG_0117581

First, the strictures of self-imposed pay-as-you-go budgeting, in which the Democrats have bound themselves not to increase entitlement spending without finding offsetting savings, have already started to pinch. The Democrats quietly but dramatically scaled back the scope of their promise to cut interest rates on student loans in half.

It's going to be a lot harder for them to comply with pay-as-you-go while shielding growing numbers of middle-class families from the alternative minimum tax -- a $50 billion a year cost. You'll hear lots of talk about collecting unpaid taxes to finance the fix, but the Congressional Budget Office isn't likely to score savings from the tax gap any more than it will visits from the Tooth Fairy.

Second, as the decision to dump the promise of an open process to muscle through the first 100 hours agenda shows, it's a lot easier to vow fairness to the oppressed minority when you are it. Giving Republicans a real opportunity to offer alternatives and amendments is like handing them a loaded gun to aim at vulnerable Democratic freshmen. (Not that Democrats are anti-gun!)

? Iraq is the elephant in the chamber.

Democrats don't agree among themselves about what should be done. Even if they did, they are trapped between their fear of looking like micromanaging undercutters of the troops and the clamor of their base for cut-off and withdrawal. It's not clear that tut-tutting their disapproval will prove to be a successful strategy for exiting from this bind.

For the second 100 hours, and the third, and beyond, Iraq is likely to eclipse everything else on the Democrats' agenda -- whatever that turns out to be.

Democrats Drying Up Oil Industry Tax Breaks (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON — When oil company executives came before the Republican-controlled Congress in 2005 to defend their record profits amid high gasoline prices, they were spared the indignity of being sworn in under bright TV lights, as the tobacco chiefs had been a decade earlier.

But with Democrats in charge, perhaps no industry will find the new Congress less hospitable than the oil industry.

That will be underscored Thursday when the House is expected to approve a bill that would repeal billions of dollars in oil industry tax breaks passed by the GOP-controlled Congress.

The measure would raise about $14 billion over 10 years by repealing the tax breaks and by closing a loophole that allowed royalty-free offshore oil leases. The money would be used to promote energy conservation and develop alternative fuels.

Currently, the government spends about $1.2 billion a year on projects to promote energy efficiency and renewable fuels.

"It looks like Congress is looking to rebalance the equation," said Bill Prindle, acting executive director of the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy, an energy think tank based in Washington.

Repealing the tax breaks will be the last of a spate of measures, including today's vote to cut interest rates for student loans, that House Democrats pledged to pass in their first 100 legislative hours.

Gasoline prices have eased from the record high of more than $3 per gallon set in 2005 after Hurricane Katrina damaged Gulf Coast energy facilities; the average price nationally Tuesday was $2.23 per gallon for regular unleaded, according to the Auto Club. But energy remains a potent political issue, as evidenced by the nearly 200 lawmakers who have signed up as co-sponsors of the House bill.

President Bush is expected to propose energy initiatives in his State of the Union speech next week, and Democrats are spotlighting the tax repeal bill as a down payment on their plans to pursue a new energy policy.

The tax breaks were aimed at reducing U.S. dependence on foreign oil by encouraging domestic production of oil and natural gas. But even usually industry-friendly Republicans have found it hard to defend the oil companies after they recorded record profits.

One Republican who supports the House measure says it is smart to move the country away from fossil fuels. "Oil and natural gas are not forever," said Rep. Roscoe G. Bartlett of Maryland.

The measure is expected to easily pass the House but is likely to face a tougher time in the Senate. And it could run into trouble at the White House. Bush opposed the tax breaks for the oil and gas industry that were included in the 2005 energy bill. But the administration has been cool to the idea of forcing oil companies to renegotiate drilling leases.

A number of energy companies were permitted to drill royalty-free in the Gulf of Mexico in the 1990s, when energy prices were lower, to spur domestic production. But, in an apparent clerical error, a standard stipulation was left out of the leases that would have required the companies to pay royalties if oil prices rose. That oversight has shortchanged the Treasury by billions of dollars.

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said the administration recently moved to increase the royalty rate on new deepwater leases in the Gulf, but he said the faulty leases need to be honored. "The government should be a reliable partner with private industry and should not change the rules in the middle of the game," he said.

Some companies have voluntarily renegotiated leases. Under the House measure, the others would be required to renegotiate or pay a $9-per-barrel "conservation" fee. If they refuse, they would be barred from bidding on new offshore drilling leases.

The big oil companies have stayed in the background, largely leaving it to their trade groups to attack the bill.

"This measure is purely political with the goal of punishing an industry that has low favorability on Capitol Hill," said Barry Russell, president of the Independent Petroleum Assn. of America. "This is a time to encourage American investment in energy projects here at home, not discourage it."

The House bill would roll back a tax break included in the 2005 energy bill for only the five largest integrated oil companies.

And it would create a special exemption to exclude only oil and gas companies from a tax break included in a 2004 corporate tax bill aimed at encouraging domestic production.

Don Duncan, vice president of federal and international affairs for ConocoPhillips, criticized that provision, saying it was discriminatory.

The House bill doesn't go after all of the $32 billion in tax breaks and subsidies that Friends of the Earth, an environmental group, has estimated the oil and gas industries receive, including a $500-million research program put into the energy bill at the urging of then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

That program, designed to fund research into "ultra deepwater" drilling, has been assailed as a "giveaway" to the oil industry by some Democrats. But other Democrats support it.

Environmentalists on Capitol Hill lobbying for the House measure said they hope it is just the first step toward eliminating all tax breaks and subsidies for the oil and gas industries.

Industry allies are worried about the new Congress.

"Those of us who want a pro-production energy policy are going to have our hands full in this Congress preventing too many bad things [from] happening," said Rep. Joe L. Barton of Texas, the top Republican on the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the top Republican on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, said, "If you're interested in trying to lower the cost of energy, raising taxes is not the way to do that."

Unlike some other initiatives on the 100-hour agenda that have drawn unanimous support from Democrats, such as increasing the minimum wage, repealing the tax breaks may draw opposition from Democrats from energy-producing states.

"There will probably be Democrats who vote no," said Rep. Gene Green (D-Texas). He plans to vote for measure, however. "We've tried to make the best of what we consider bad legislation."

No decision has been made on how the nearly $14 billion that the bill would generate over a 10-year period would be divvied up. Possible uses could include expanding funding or tax breaks for development and use of fuel-efficient vehicles and alternative energy sources, such as solar and wind power.

The measure's supporters hope the prospect of additional funds for home-state energy projects, such as increased ethanol production, will help generate bipartisan support for it in the Senate.

"It's long overdue, but Congress is finally ready to strip big oil of unjustified taxpayer subsidies and kick-start the nation's clean, renewable energy industry," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), a leading critic of subsidies to the oil and gas industries.

Utilities Endorse Climate-change Bill (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 17, 2007

Six electric companies plan to support a Senate bill to cut greenhouse-gas emissions to curb global warming.

The bill, cosponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Tom Carper (D-Del.), would establish a national “cap and trade” program to limit power-plant carbon-dioxide emissions by 25 percent by 2020 from current projections.

The companies are members of the Clean Energy Group, which has advocated for a carbon cap in the past. The Carper-Feinstein bill is the “most aggressive emission reduction bill supported by industry to date,” according to a news release.

The companies supporting the bill are Calpine, Entergy, Exelon, Florida Power & Light, PG&E Corp. and Public Service Enterprise Group.

A Low-Watt Bill (WP)

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

THE HOUSE Democrats plan to pass an energy bill Thursday that combines the good, the bad and a large dose of missed opportunity. Thankfully, it faces an uncertain future in the Senate. Energy policy deserves more serious treatment.

The good part of the bill revokes tax breaks for oil and gas production in the United States that should never have been granted. In 2004, Congress reduced the tax rate on U.S. manufacturers and extended the definition of manufacturing to include oil and gas projects. This had the effect of subsidizing energy sources that contribute to global warming; Congress ought to be raising the carbon tax, not cutting it. The House bill would correct this error and use the proceeds to finance climate-friendly energy technology.

The bad part of the bill would effectively revoke lease contracts granted in 1998 and 1999 for offshore drilling. The leases mistakenly omitted a standard clause requiring energy companies to pay royalties to the Treasury if the price of oil rose above $34 per barrel. Now this omission is costing the budget an estimated $10 billion over the life of the leases. The administration, rightly, has tried to renegotiate the terms, and some leaseholders have cooperated. But Chevron and ExxonMobil, the companies with the most money at stake, feel that their responsibility to shareholders compels them to get something back if they are to give up large expected profits.

The House bill would break this deadlock by imposing heavy penalties on firms that do not renegotiate on terms imposed by the government. This heavy-handed attack on the stability of contracts would be welcomed in Russia, Bolivia and other countries that have been criticized for tearing up revenue-sharing agreements with private energy companies. Legitimizing that sort of behavior might be justified if it were the only way of fixing the leases. But Chevron, for example, says it would be willing to yield on the royalty payments if the duration of its leases could be extended.

The main problem with the House bill is that hitting up oil companies is a poor substitute for a real energy policy. The nation needs to accelerate the development of less-carbon-intensive fuels by capping or taxing carbon consumption. Members of Congress sometimes present half-measures such as the House bill as the most that can be achieved, given political constraints. But the oft-cited defeat of the BTU tax in Congress occurred more than a decade ago. The evidence on global warming has changed radically since then, and so, too, has the politics. Even ExxonMobil, traditionally the fiercest opponent of climate action, has cut funding to "research" groups that question global warming and is starting to engage in the debate about which sorts of carbon restrictions should be adopted.

Judges Look To Clerks With Experience (LAW)

By Anna Palmer, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 17, 2007

Julia Kiraly doesn't fit the profile of a judicial clerk, the Ivy Leaguer who jumps directly from law school to a judge's chambers. After hopscotching from Venable to Hogan & Hartson and back to Venable in her first four years of practice as a litigator in Washington, D.C., Kiraly did the unthinkable for many young lawyers looking to scale the law firm ladder: She passed up a growing six-figure salary to clerk for Chief Judge Thomas Hogan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

However unconventional, Kiraly, now entering her second year clerking for Hogan, is emblematic of a growing number of lawyers leaving private practice to clerk on one of the most competitive circuit courts.

Though the graying of Supreme Court clerks has been well documented (think Justice Samuel Alito Jr.'s first-term pick of Adam Ciongoli, former senior vice president and general counsel of Time Warner Europe, as his clerk), the increasingly older talent pool applying for federal circuit court clerkships has risen over the past couple of years as lawyers seek to boost their résumés. The trend also reflects the growing number of federal judges who have done an about-face by requiring, or strongly preferring, law clerks who draft opinions and research questions of the law to obtain some real-world experience beyond school.

"I think I'm clearly in the growing minority," says Judge Richard Leon, of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, about requiring his clerks to work at least a year prior to their clerkships. "Each clerk is monitoring as part of his or her job 125 to 150 cases across the entire spectrum of the law. I just find that the law clerks are much more confident, able, and their writing skills have been perfected after working for a couple of years."

A HUGE ADVANTAGE

Applying for a clerkship after entering the marketplace hasn't always been in vogue. For decades, judges relied on the nation's top law schools to fill clerk positions. Even five years ago it was almost unheard of at most Washington firms to clerk after becoming an associate. But in-house recruiters and hiring partners say they have seen a distinct change in the number of associates exiting for clerkships.

DOJ_NMG_0117584

"We have at least three and we may have four first-year associates who are leaving to clerk next fall," says Brian Brooks, a partner in O'Melveny & Myers' Washington office. "Three years ago it would have been zero."

Brooks, who is hiring partner in the firm's D.C. office, was the firm's first nontraditional clerk in 1997 when he left after working for two years to clerk for Judge Danny Boggs on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Since then, he's used his experience to help mentor associates applying for clerkships.

"There's a huge advantage once you've practiced for a year in deciding what kind of [clerk] experience you want," says Brooks. "It's very tough to choose which judges are right; you have much more of a sense of what areas of law interest you, geography and things you might have in common with the judge."

O'Melveny isn't alone. Firms such as Kirkland & Ellis, Arnold & Porter and Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher all say they've noticed the increase in judges picking associates from inside their law firms.

Instead of viewing associates departing for clerkships as a negative trend, law firms have framed it as a recruiting tool to lure clerks back to firms with incentive packages.

Latham & Watkins, for example, typically offers federal judicial clerks hoping to join the firm a one-year credit and a $35,000 signing bonus. Arnold & Porter's Deborah Feinstein, who is on the firm's management committee and is a former hiring partner, says the firm usually allows associates to hold an offer with the firm if the judge allows or otherwise tries to recruit them back after their service.

The Code of Conduct for Judicial Employees leaves the decision of whether a clerk can hold an offer at a firm up to the individual judge.

Although the reasons vary among lawyers looking to exit private practice, many current and former clerks point to paying off student loans and starting at a high government salary as incentives to wait at least a year before applying for a clerkship.

"I actually didn't apply as a third-year, mainly, because I just couldn't afford the application process," says Kiraly, who graduated from William & Mary's Marshall-Wythe School of Law in 2001 during the associate salary boom.

Lawrence VanDyke, a former Gibson Dunn associate who clerks for Judge Janice Rogers Brown of the D.C. Circuit, says the financial pressures of being married with three kids also played into his waiting a year before applying.

Associates also use clerkships as an easy transition to leave a firm or to get expertise in a different practice area.

Although Schan Duff, now a fifth-year associate at O'Melveny, returned to the firm after a one-year clerkship with Chief Judge Anthony Scirica on the 3rd Circuit, he says he was able to transition away from litigation and antitrust work into the firm's financial services and regulatory practice.

A COMMON BACKGROUND

Judges with prior law firm experience appear more apt to choose associates as clerks. D.C. District Judge Leon, a former partner at Baker & Hostetler and Vorys, Sater, Seymour and Pease, still hires clerks during their third year of law school but requires them to work a year or two post-law school before coming on board. Judge Rosemary Collyer of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, formerly a partner at Crowell & Moring, also requires at least one year of experience.

"I have clerks that come from the courts of appeals, but mostly, I have clerks who have spent anywhere from about 18 to 35 months in a law firm environment, and then they decide they want to be a clerk," says Collyer.

Weil, Gotshal & Manges partner Gregory Coleman sees the practical experience as a bonus for judges. Coleman, who clerked for both Judge Edith Hollan Jones of the 5th Circuit and Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas, accepted a position with Weil Gotshal before clerking for Jones and then returned to Weil before departing again to clerk for Thomas.

"I think I brought a more practical perspective, so when you read things and petitions and other things, I tended to be a little more skeptical of certain types of claims, and also you can kind of see how the procedural aspects build up better," Coleman says.

Collyer agrees.

"I spent many years in law firms hiring people right out of law schools, which is what law firms do mostly, and I think that the first year out of law school [they] have a lot of settling in to do," says Collyer. "If a judge who has been used to hiring out of law school happens to hire somebody with a little more experience, [the judge] discovers what a difference it makes."

Gradual Rate Cuts Trim Cost Of House Student Loan Bill (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

Democrats, trying to deliver on expensive campaign promises, are offering a slimmer version of legislation to cut interest rates on student loans.

The House today is expected to approve the College Student Relief Act of 2007, with some Republican votes, which would cut interest rates gradually on need-based federal loans for college undergraduates from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent by 2011.

It ultimately would save the average student borrower about $4,400 over the life of a loan.

"This legislation will be a vital first step towards helping lower college costs for millions of low- and middle-income students, while keeping our promises to taxpayers to maintain responsible spending," said Rep. George Miller, California Democrat and chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee.

Mr. Miller is a sponsor of the bill, a signature item on the Democrats' first 100 hours agenda. The version is trimmer than legislation crafted last year, which would have cut interest rates on student loans immediately rather than gradually.

"They're running into reality," said Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon of California, the top Republican on the education panel.

Democrats estimate that the legislation will cost $5.85 billion over five years. The National Taxpayers Union said the original version from last year would have cost $37 billion.

The Bush administration opposes the bill. The Office of Management and Budget said the legislation won't help current students or their families and that encouraging more student debt can fuel higher tuition costs. Colleges must join the effort to make education affordable, an OMB memo said.

"The Administration will continue to work with Congress on a comprehensive approach to improve college access for the neediest students, in a fiscally responsible manner," the memo said.

Democrats call the bill a first step in addressing higher education costs, which have risen 41 percent since 2001 and leave the average graduate with $17,500 in federal loan debt. Similar legislation will move in the Senate as well.

Democrats also have pledged other measures to ease the load of student loans, such as increasing the maximum Pell Grant award.

The Young America's Foundation suggested that increased federal funding would create "a perverse market incentive" for schools to inflate costs.

More federal dollars to higher education "will only expand the problem of affordability while allowing schools to amass even larger fortunes on the backs of beleaguered American taxpayers," a foundation memo said.

Mr. McKeon called the House bill "well-intentioned" but said Congress should address the root of tuition increases, in part by asking education institutions to account for big-ticket spending items that help drive up costs. He will offer his own legislation today as an amendment to the Democrats' bill.

House To Vote Student Loan Interest Bill (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON — Continuing its march through an agenda of popular legislative initiatives, the Democratic-led House is considering cutting interest rates on some college student loans in half.

The House was scheduled to vote Wednesday on the measure, which would help an estimated 5.5 million students who get need-based federal loans.

The government pays the interest that accrues on those loans while students are in college. Students pick up the payments after they leave school.

The rates would drop from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent in stages over a five-year period under the House proposal. That would cost nearly $6 billion, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

To avoid increasing the deficit, the bill's cost would be offset by reducing the yield on college loans the government guarantees to lenders and cutting the guaranteed return banks get when students default. Banks also would have to pay more in fees.

The House was expected to approve the bill, though its future is uncertain beyond that. The Bush administration and some top Republican lawmakers oppose it. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., head of the Senate's education committee, plans to pursue broader education legislation that addresses the proposed interest rate cut.

Democrats, who took over Congress this year, are trying to make good on a campaign pledge. However, the plan has been scaled back.

During last year's campaign season, Democrats did not spell out that the cut they were talking about passing in the first 100 hours of the new Congress would only affect need-based loans. They also pledged to lower interest rates for parents who take out college loans for their children, and said they wanted to increase the maximum Pell grant award from $4,050 to $5,100. Pell grants go only to the neediest students and do not have to be paid back.

DOJ_NMG_0117586

California Democratic Rep. George Miller, chairman of the House committee on education, said lawmakers plan to address those issues later.

California Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon, the highest-ranking Republican on the education committee, criticized Democrats for considering the legislation without hearings. He also said he worried the cuts could lessen the services and benefits students receive.

McKeon noted Congress cut $12 billion from the student loan program last year as part of a budget bill.

"If we make it so unattractive to be in the student loan business, they'll go into the car business," McKeon said of lenders.

Luke Swarthout, who lobbies on higher education issues for the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, said the industry is highly profitable and can sustain this round of cuts.

"This is one of the most heavily subsidized and lucrative industries," he said. "These lenders receive guaranteed profits with virtually no risk."

The House bill is H.R. 5.

House Democrats Scale Back Plan To Cut Rates On Student Loans (MCT)

By Barbara Barrett

McClatchy Newspapers, January 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - The plan House Democrats will push Wednesday to slash rates on some student loans falls short of a proposal they pitched nearly a year ago when the Republicans controlled Congress.

The House Democrats' plan doesn't cover all student loans - only federally subsidized Stafford loans targeting some middle-income families - and it will take five years to phase in. And though education advocates praise the effort as a nice start, they say it won't do much to boost college access at a time of soaring tuition increases.

Many would rather see Congress focus its efforts on increasing Pell Grants, which focus primarily on low-income families and don't have to be repaid.

"It's a great way to communicate that you support students and their families," Kimrey Rhinehardt, vice president for government affairs at the 16-campus University of North Carolina system, said of Wednesday's vote. "But this is not the panacea for the problem. It's a much bigger problem."

The rate cut would be unlikely to encourage more students to go to college, some advocates say, and it doesn't affect students while they're in school. Instead, it would lower monthly payments for college graduates, saving the average borrower more than $4,200 over the life of the loan.

Democrats say the rate cut begins to tackle the affordability issue. Since 2001, tuition has jumped 41 percent at the nation's public colleges and universities and 17 percent at private schools.

In December 2005, Republicans cut $12 billion from the federal student loan program in the budget reconciliation bill. Pell Grants, which go to the neediest students, have been flat for five years.

In March, Democrats wanted to halve the interest rate to 3.4 percent on all student loans. Their effort in the House failed, but it became a campaign issue for the party.

"We should support (students) with a real federal investment in their education - not a sham that does not help American students and families pay for college," said then-Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi.

After doing the numbers, Democrats announced this month that they hope to cut rates on just federally subsidized Stafford loans, used now by about 5.5 million students.

Even then, the reductions would be phased in over five years and would cost nearly $6 billion to implement.

"This is a down payment on addressing the college affordability crisis," said Tom Kiley, Democratic spokesman for the House Education Committee. "It is a first step we can take."

Some Republicans labeled the plan "hypocrisy."

"It's a sham and a lie," said Rep. Virginia Foxx of North Carolina, a member of the Education Committee and former community college president. "It wouldn't guarantee that one more student would go to college because of this."

Educators hope Democrats will do more in coming months. The Senate version of the bill comes as part of a larger higher education package and would increase Pell Grants.

DOJ_NMG_0117587

The subsidized loans target mostly middle-income families, with about half of the loans going to students in families earning between $26,000 and $68,000 a year, said Bill Parsons, associate director of government affairs at the American Council for Education in Washington. Those students leave college with an average debt of $13,800.

Democrats plan to offset the costs by increasing the money they get from lenders who administer the program. Some lenders warn the interest rate cuts could actually penalize students as lenders pass on fee increases to students.

"A lot of lenders say they won't be able to offer as high-quality services to students," said Joe Cronin, president of The Student Loan Network, a lender in Quincy, Mass. He, too, favors increasing Pell Grants, but said few would outright oppose cutting student interest rates.

"I think the Democrats in Congress are in favor of it because it sounds really nice," Cronin said. "Overall, there's definitely better ways that money could be spent."

Bush Rejects Democrats' Plan To Cut Student-Loan Rate (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, January 16, 2007

Jan. 16 (Bloomberg) -- The Bush administration rejected a Democratic plan to cut interest rates on federally backed student loans, saying it instead preferred that Congress concentrate on funding direct-aid programs.

``Student debt loads have soared in recent years, and it is not clear that encouraging more loans is a wise course," the White House's Office of Management and Budget said in a written statement. The administration instead favors increasing grant aid to low-income students, the OMB said.

The U.S. House of Representatives, as part of a legislative package it has promised to enact in its ``first 100 hours" after taking control this year from Republicans, plans to cut in half over five years the 6.8 percent rate on federally backed college loans.

The plan also has drawn criticism from banks, which oppose provisions that would make them pay the estimated $6 billion cost of the lower rates, and congressional Republicans, who want more pressure on colleges to reduce costs.

The legislation, drafted by Representative George Miller of California, the new Democratic chairman of the House education committee, is scheduled for debate and a vote tomorrow on the House floor.

Miller's plan would pay for the interest rate cut through steps that include reducing the return on federal loans by 0.1 percentage points. That cut only would apply to the largest 32 lenders, defined as those holding 90 percent of all student loans.

Affected Lenders

Affected student lenders include SLM Corp., Bank of America Corp., Citigroup Inc. and Wells Fargo Bank. They aren't opposed to cutting the rate, since the federally backed loans provide a guaranteed return, though they have criticized Democrats for proposing that they bear the cost.

The size of the cuts proposed by Miller could force some banks out of the student lending business, said Moshe Orenbuch, a banking industry analyst at Credit Suisse AG in New York. Orenbuch, in a note last week to investors, predicted Bush wouldn't sign such a measure into law.

The American Council on Education, the major Washington- based university association, supports Miller's plan even though it agrees Congress might be able to spend the same money in ways that benefit more needy students, said Becky Timmons, the group's director of government relations.

Pell Grants

Bush and the Republican-led Congress had six years to increase Pell Grants, the main federal grant program for low-income students, if they wanted to do it, said Timmons, whose group represents about 1,800 colleges and educational organizations.

The only increase in the program during that period, however, was due to gains in the number of participating students, Timmons said.

The previous chairman of the House education committee, Republican Representative Buck McKeon of California, today wrote to Miller saying his plan was ``well-intentioned." McKeon said he would argue instead, however, for legislation giving colleges incentives to hold down costs.

McKeon's plan proposes government-organized studies to evaluate college costs and rate schools on their financial performance.

The Bush administration, in its statement, said it too believes that increasing affordability is a job that ``must be shared with colleges."

DOJ_NMG_0117588

U.S. colleges are willing to discuss such ideas, though they're wary of McKeon's proposals in such areas as suggesting that small businesses give advice on holding down costs, Timmons said. ``It's got some very odd aspects to it that we would oppose,'' she said of McKeon's plan.

Educating Democrats (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

House Democrats have scheduled a vote for today on a proposal that would reduce the interest rate on student loans. The ostensible goal is to make college more affordable, but such a move could well wind up having the opposite effect.

Democrats campaigned last fall on a pledge to lower the interest rate on subsidized student loans to 3.4% from the current 6.8%. "We will broaden college opportunity," says Nancy Pelosi, the new House Speaker, "and we will begin by cutting interest rates for student loans in half." It makes for a good sound bite, but on closer inspection the connection between lower interest rates and "college opportunity" is far from clear.

The interest rate doesn't affect whether a student can pay his or her tuition bill, which means that no one unable to afford college today will suddenly be able to do so because of a reduction in the rate. Rather, lowering the rate will simply boost the federal subsidy for loan repayments after graduation. That's because the financial institutions that handle these loans are guaranteed a rate of return, regardless of the interest rate. Halving the rate that lenders can charge borrowers means larger government (read: taxpayer) subsidies for the banks.

In other words, the Democratic loan proposal isn't really about making college more affordable for low-income families. It's about expanding federal subsidies for college grads, including millions of middle-class men and women who will go on to do very well in life and hardly need such a government handout.

"The average college graduate leaves school with a debt of $17,500, which after consolidation and tax breaks comes to about $102 a month," says Brian Riedl of the Heritage Foundation. "If a college degree adds about a million dollars to your lifetime income, 102 bucks a month is manageable." Democrats know that subsidizing college graduates doesn't sound all that great as a political theme, so instead they pretend that cutting student-loan interest rates will somehow make higher education more "accessible."

The Democrat proposal also has the potential to exacerbate perverse incentives already associated with the government student loan programs. Since 1992, tuition at public and private colleges has risen 86% and 52%, respectively. The only other segment of the economy where costs have outpaced inflation by similar leaps and bounds is health care. And it's no coincidence that third parties foot the bill for big chunks of both higher ed and health care spending; this has predictably increased demand relative to supply and resulted in prices rising faster than they would otherwise.

Like any business, colleges will charge as much as their customers are willing to pay. And you can be sure that, as quickly as student aid increases, colleges will raise tuition to capture the additional funds. In the absence of all this subsidization, colleges would have to be more cautious about raising tuition because their customers would be affected more directly. So the biggest winners from this latest subsidy will be the relatively well off professors and administrators who run higher education.

Rather than scaling back these interest rate subsidies, Democrats want to make them more generous. This can only have the effect of further distorting the true cost of a college education by pushing more and more of that cost on to taxpayers. Ultimately, increasing the government's role is a recipe for making college less affordable.

Boehner: New Ideas Wanted (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, January 17, 2007

For all the hurdles House Republican leaders face in the minority, the biggest one simply may be getting their rank-and-file Members to accept the realities of their new deflated status.

“I had a Member one night last week moaning and groaning about the schedule,” House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said in an interview Tuesday. “And I just had to look at him and say, ‘Why don’t you go talk to Mr. Hoyer?’ It is what it is.”

While House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) now holds Boehner’s old job, Boehner makes no excuses for the electoral losses of the party he now leads.

“You could say that our reservoir of new ideas is low ... to some extent, you could argue that we got lazy. We’ve been the party of ideas and the American people, by and large, agreed with us for a long time,” he said.

Boehner defined the challenges of the GOP in the minority: “We’ve got to work harder, we’ve got to work smarter, and probably the biggest thing we need to do is energize our Members to create new ideas for solving the problems the American people sent us here to solve.”

DOJ_NMG_0117589

While Democrats continue to tick off a list of early legislative accomplishments, most with considerable Republican support, Boehner is quick to dismiss speculation that there are rifts in the GOP ranks.

"I think we have to remember that we're in the midst of a honeymoon. I find it interesting the stories that are being written about disunity among Republicans," he said, "I've told our Members, 'Smile, we'll deal with it, let's not get too excited.'"

But looking beyond the popular measures included in the Democrats' "100 hours" agenda, House Republicans now face a much more divisive issue as a Democratic-led Congress takes on President Bush's plan to commit an additional 20,000 troops to the Iraq War as a means to bolster chances of success in the region.

"We have a case here in regard to Iraq where many of our Members are skeptical about the president's plan, and this is going to be a difficult moment for our Conference as a whole," Boehner acknowledged.

House leaders, including Boehner, GOP Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) and Republican Policy Committee Chairman Thaddeus McCotter (Mich.) recently have begun a series of informal listening sessions to gauge Member support. Another was scheduled for Tuesday evening, according to Putnam.

"We're still in that listening mode, and we're going to have to come to some decision on how to proceed here soon," Boehner said.

Hoyer told reporters Tuesday that Democrats in both chambers would bring a nonbinding resolution to the floor in the coming weeks to serve as a referendum on the "surge" plan. Hoyer said he anticipated a "very significant bipartisan vote" against Bush's proposal.

Boehner said Tuesday that he generally does not support making such votes a question of party loyalty, noting that one of his first votes as a Member of Congress related to the first Persian Gulf War.

"The Congress has a responsibility to provide proper oversight of the administration whether you're a Democrat or a Republican, [and] especially when it comes to war I think it's incumbent upon us to do our constitutional duty," he said, "I'm a bit sensitive about Members' ability to do what their conscience tells them."

House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Putnam told reporters Tuesday that it remains to be seen if the GOP will whip against the resolution. "Let's see what they come up with," Blunt said. "We'll have to see what the resolution says to see how much conscience is involved or whether it is just a partisan ploy to embarrass the president."

Putnam echoed the sentiment, calling a nonbinding resolution a "legislative fig leaf," and said Democrats have yet to put forward their own plan for success in Iraq.

"Let's put this resolution into the correct category of just more political rhetoric," added Boehner. "It's a nonbinding resolution that means nothing. If Democrats were serious about this, they'd offer their own plan. If they were really serious the would decide, 'We disagree, we're going to shut down all funds for this.'"

Individually, Boehner, Blunt and Putnam have all said they support what the president has put forth — a position that heightens pressure on the new leadership team to balance the views of a number of their Members who believe that they lost the majority largely due to the war — and that House Republicans need to operate more independently from the White House in the 110th Congress.

"There is a sense that we've been carrying the water for the White House for too long," said one senior Republican late last week.

Boehner said the GOP would not give the White House a free pass on Iraq.

"My role and House Republicans' role is twofold," he said. "While the president is of our party, and there's an inclination to be supportive, we're also Members of Congress, a different branch of the government, with the responsibility to look closely at what the administration is doing."

With Democrats in the driver's seat, Bush will now have to negotiate with Congress in a way he never had to face in his first six years in office. Boehner expressed confidence that the new power structure would not mean that Congressional Republicans could be side-lined in the process.

"I have absolutely no fears that we won't be in full communication with each other," he said, adding that the president has given him personal assurances on that front.

Boehner said he shares a "close" relationship with Bush. "I don't expect that to change at all," he said.

Boehner likewise expressed confidence in his new leadership team and said his relationship with Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has been "nice" so far.

Boehner said he believed he could work with Pelosi particularly on matters of institutional importance. "I think it's important we have conversations and work together for the good of the institution," he said.

Despite his personal opposition, Boehner has agreed to work with Pelosi to set up a bipartisan ethics task force, tentatively made up of four Members on each side, to examine the creation of an independent ethics body to police Members.

DOJ_NMG_0117590

"I've had grave concerns about us abdicating our responsibility as outlined in the Constitution," he said. "The Constitution makes it very clear that Congress is to decide its rules and enforce them, so I have concerns."

And while House Democrats led by Pelosi and Hoyer in the minority largely employed a strategy of party-line opposition to major GOP policy initiatives to forge renewed party unity, Boehner said he has three options as Minority Leader on a daily basis: work with Democrats, work against Democrats or get out of their way.

"I think the key to my job and the key to success of our Conference is making the right decision every day," he said. "It's not in our interest to make our Members march in lock step every day in total opposition to what the majority wants. I don't think that's constructive, I don't think that's helpful."

Flaking Out (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

NOW THAT THE time has arrived for congressional Republicans to show what they've learned from November's elections, they seem more concerned with the party line than with the party's performance. Consider House Minority Leader John A. Boehner's decision to remove Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona from his seat on the House Judiciary Committee.

Flake has made a name for himself with his long-standing effort to eliminate excessive congressional "earmarks" — not through any complex new ethics legislation but by publicly fighting individual earmarks on the House floor. It's not certain that this was the reason he lost his Judiciary Committee job. Flake believes that he's being punished for supporting comprehensive immigration reform. Other D.C. observers say Boehner (R-Ohio) is making good on his promise last year to punish "bad behavior" by Republicans who vote against the party's leadership. What is clear is that Flake, the kind of fiscal conservative who has the potential to reverse the GOP's woes, is being held back not for his behavior but for his beliefs.

So is Rep. Walter B. Jones (R-N.C.), who has been passed over for a leadership position on the House Subcommittee on Readiness . Though Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), the ranking Republican on the House Armed Services Committee, did not characterize his decision to promote a lawmaker with less seniority, Jones has called for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Party discipline is not without value, and it's worth noting that the charismatic Flake has been more effective at building his own reputation than at reining in pork. Still, Flake is a skilled advocate for his party's core fiscal beliefs. And Jones is one of a growing number of Republicans who are disenchanted with the war. If Boehner and company want to restore the GOP as a party of ideas, rigor and credibility, they'll stop expecting all its members to march in lock step.

Senate GOP Begins Repair Of Messaging (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 17, 2007

Senior aides to Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Senate Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) met with Senate Republican press secretaries yesterday to address last year's communications shortcomings under former Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

McConnell and Kyl have decided that more members of their conference must actively voice the GOP's vision both in the national media and to constituents. Senate Republicans have felt increasing pressure to reform their communications strategy following the success of Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) war room, which is part of a 20-person Democratic communications team that specializes in rapid response.

"We learned that our policies are best communicated when we're working as a team," Kyl told The Hill. "All our Republican Senators are leaders, and it's our mission to help highlight the contributions they're making to our policy agenda."

"This week alone we're already seeing progress in the effort to promote small business growth, restrain wasteful spending, and prevent government from price-fixing prescription drugs."

"It's long overdue," Senate Republican Conference Vice Chairman John Cornyn (R-Texas) said of McConnell's plans. "We have been on the short end of the stick when it comes to defining ourselves to the American public."

Frist attempted to implement a coordinated communications program such as McConnell and Kyl now envision, but it was widely viewed as an ineffective effort. Some Republicans attribute Frist's failure to push the initiative to the former majority leader's presidential ambitions. They argue that Frist's concern over voters in presidential primary states constrained his ability to speak effectively on behalf of the GOP conference.

"I thought it left something to be desired," Cornyn said of last year's communications strategy. "You can't serve two masters. When you have divided allegiances, something has to suffer. No one now in leadership is running for president."

DOJ_NMG_0117591

One of Frist's famous communications gaffes came in the summer of 2005 when he unexpectedly announced his support for federal funding of stem-cell research. The pronouncement came as a "bolt out of the blue," according to Republican aides, and obscured a message with which Republicans carefully had planned to kick off the August recess. Another stumble came last year when Frist told reporters that Republicans would consider a compromise on repealing the estate tax. Conservatives were angered that Frist's statement came in the middle of a floor debate on full repeal that they felt they had been winning.

Cornyn's former spokesman, Don Stewart, who now serves as communications director for McConnell and Kyl aid Ryan Loskarn are arranging meetings with the offices of all 49 Republican senators to craft a coordinated communications plan.

Stewart outlined his proposal during Tuesday's meeting with GOP aides. Senate Republican Conference aides also attended the session, during which they also presented Kyl's ideas for integrating more rank-and-file lawmakers in party message-shaping.

Rank-and-file GOP aides have criticized what they perceived as Frist's hierarchical approach to coordinating the Republican line. Frist, they say, tended to concentrate more on issuing talking points than soliciting feedback.

"There are two ways of initiating a communications strategy," a GOP Senate aide said. "One is to go to offices and ask what the offices are working on and the second way is to say, 'Here are the talking points, if you want to be on the team you have to use these.' Most offices don't find [the latter] very effective."

When McConnell brought Stewart onboard last year, GOP aides and lobbyists interpreted the move as a signal that the incoming Republican leader would take an aggressive approach to communications because of Stewart's outspoken work on Cornyn's behalf. Kyl's hiring of Ron Bonjean to serve as conference staff director is being viewed in the same way. Bonjean previously handled communications for former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and former House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.)

The new Republican leadership has told fellow Republicans that it intends to spread the party's message in a more collaborative way. In meetings with rank-and-file Republican aides, McConnell's and Kyl's staff have asked lawmakers on which issues they are most focused and would be willing to serve as party spokesmen. The communications team would also like Republican senators to appear more frequently on television and radio and better use Internet platforms.

With an eye toward meeting those targets, the Senate Republican conference is advertising to members the services they provide, such as a satellite feed through which lawmakers can conduct television interviews in their home states from Washington. Senators can also use a studio located on the fourth floor of the Hart office building to record video greetings and public service announcements for play at home. The conference also has told lawmakers it will provide camera crews to cover them at press conferences, hearings and meetings with constituents.

The conference is the communications arm of the Senate Republican leadership, but last year it was hampered because then-chairman Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) was preoccupied by a difficult reelection race, one he ultimately lost. Republican leaders last year tapped Cornyn and Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) to help Santorum, but the solution came too late, say Republicans.

"This year will be more focused," said DeMint, whom colleagues recently elected to head the Republican Steering Committee. "I know the idea of trying to set up a coordinated approach was one we tried to work with that last year but, frankly, I don't think we did it in time."

Asked about Frist's divided attentions, DeMint said, "I don't know if it was a presidential thing or whatever but we never got a coordinated communication package. Mitch McConnell is trying to do that right out of the box and I think [the] focus is on doing what we need to do here completely."

DeMint endorsed the plan to get more lawmakers involved in the communications effort, which he took up last year — albeit too late in the election cycle to pay political dividends. DeMint said in his new leadership role, however, he will focus more on crafting policy.

"The media tends to go to a few high-profile members and want to hear from them, but I think it's important to get members with particular expertise and push them out front," he said. "My priority will be to work with the steering committee to communicate conservative principles and try to steer our whole conference and the Congress in a more constructive conservative way."

Cornyn still is developing his plans as conference vice chairman. But he will meet with Republican senators who are facing reelection in 2008 to understand their political and policy priorities and to weave them into an overarching message for the conference.

Lawmakers' Lobbying Spouses Avoid Hill Reforms (WP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117592

When Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) rose to the Senate floor last summer and passionately argued for keeping the federal estate tax, he left one person with an interest in retaining the tax unmentioned.

The multibillion-dollar life-insurance industry, which was fighting to preserve the tax because life insurers have a lucrative business selling policies and annuities to Americans for estate planning, has employed Dorgan's wife as a lobbyist since 1999.

A few months earlier, Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) had pleaded for restraint as she urged colleagues to avoid overreacting to the news that the Bush administration had let a United Arab Emirates company take over operations at six U.S. ports. At the same time, her husband, Robert J. Dole, a former senator and presidential nominee, was registered to lobby for that company and was advising it on how to save the deal from the political firestorm.

At least half a dozen congressional spouses have jobs as registered lobbyists and several more are connected with lobbying firms, but reining in the practice to prevent potential conflicts or the appearance of them has not been a priority among congressional leaders. Even modest proposals such as banning wives and husbands from lobbying their spouses or using their spouses' floor privileges for lobbying have gone nowhere.

Democrats made ethics reform a major issue in last fall's congressional elections, but the ethics package the House approved earlier this month didn't address the issue and neither did the one proposed by Senate Democrats. Last week, however, Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) proposed banning spouses of senators from lobbying any part of the chamber. The lone exception is for spouses who were lobbying at least one year before their husband or wife was elected.

The Senate is scheduled to vote on the legislation as soon as today. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) called Vitter and said he would support the proposal with one caveat: It should exempt spouses who are already lobbyists.

"As long as it is not retroactive, Senator Reid supports efforts to ban spouses of sitting members from lobbying in the future," spokesman Jim Manley said. Vitter said he will not support Reid's proposal. "I think this goes to one of the fundamental issues in this whole debate and that is officeholders using their office to increase their personal and family income. It doesn't get any more basic than that," Vitter said.

Massie Ritsch of the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan group that studies political donations and ethics in Washington, said that if senators decide that a lobbying ban is necessary, it makes no sense to exempt current spouses.

"If there is a problem here, it is that family members can get access to lawmakers that other people don't. And if they exempt the current spouses, then they are making it all the more exclusive. Those family members will seem all the more special."

Vitter's legislation does not apply to the House. It also does not address lawmakers' siblings and children, another growth area in lobbying. Vitter said he wanted to make the plan broader but was not assured of a vote, so he scaled it back to Senate spouses.

Elected to the Senate in 2004, Vitter took an initial foray into ethics reform more than a year ago, proposing the spousal lobbying ban as well as the end of large tribal donations like those seen in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. But his plans went nowhere when his own party was in charge.

Vitter had garnered scrutiny during the scandal when it was learned that, as a House member in 2002, he had written a letter opposing a casino for an Indian tribe that rivaled Abramoff's clients. Vitter had taken donations from Abramoff's tribal clients but had refunded the money. He said he always has opposed gambling.

With Democrats in control of Congress and promising broad ethics reform, Vitter tried again. Last week the Senate rejected another of his proposals -- one to end the practice of lawmakers hiring relatives and paying them with Senate office, campaign or political action committee money.

Typically, according to their offices, those senators with lobbyist-spouses do not let their spouses lobby them or their staff personally. The rest of the Senate and Congress, however, is usually fair game.

Robert Dole's office said that while he registered to lobby for DP World, he never contacted the Senate and instead focused on giving advice. Nonetheless, his work during the political firestorm over port security helped earn his firm $320,000 in the first half of 2006, records show.

Kimberly Olson Dorgan is registered as a lobbyist for the American Council of Life Insurers and worked on several issues, including the estate tax. She now has moved into an executive job. Barry Piatt, a spokesman for Byron Dorgan, said that the senator long opposed repealing the estate tax, that his position was consistent with that of most Democrats and that his wife's job had no bearing.

Piatt noted that Dorgan once was at odds with his wife's lobby when he supported exempting income under $10 million from the estate tax.

DOJ_NMG_0117593

Though the Dorgans built a voluntary wall between them, it doesn't extend to the senator's reelection campaign. His wife's lobbying group gave the senator's campaign $2,000 from its political action committee in 2004. And other life insurers have donated tens of thousands of dollars to Dorgan's campaign, Federal Election Commission records show.

Among the other senators with lobbyist wives are Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and Kent Conrad (D-N.D.).

Catherine A. Stevens has been a registered lobbyist for the Washington firm of Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw, whose past clients include media giant Bertelsmann AG and the famed King Ranch in Texas, lobbying records show. She did not return calls to her office seeking comment.

Lucy Calautti, Conrad's wife and a former chief of staff to Dorgan, is registered to lobby for Major League Baseball's commissioner's office, which paid her firm at least $360,000 in the first half of 2006, according to the most recent lobbying reports on record with the Senate. She did not return calls to her office seeking comment. Conrad spokesman Chris Thorne said that the senator and his wife have a firm rule prohibiting her from lobbying his Senate office and staff.

On the House side, Abigail Blunt, the wife of House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), has lobbied for years for Altria Group, the parent company for Kraft Foods and tobacco firm Philip Morris. The couple were married in 2003 and decided about a year ago that Abigail would no longer lobby any part of the House, Blunt's office said yesterday. And Jennifer LaTourette, the wife of Rep. Steven C. LaTourette (R-Ohio), has been registered in recent years to lobby for several interests, including health-care companies and Cleveland's port authority.

Other congressional spouses have ties to lobbying even though they aren't formally registered in Washington. Ray Hutchison, the husband of Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.), works at the Vinson & Elkins firm, whose lobbying clients have included corporate giants such as 7-Eleven, Goldman Sachs and Halliburton.

Senate Democratic Whip Richard J. Durbin's wife, Loretta Durbin, runs a lobbying firm called Government Affairs Specialists. But Durbin's office said she limits her lobbying to their home state of Illinois and recuses herself from any federal matters that could affect her husband's work in the Senate.

Senate Votes To Disclose Pet Projects (AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

The Senate voted Tuesday to shine more light on thousands of expensive pet projects buried in legislation every year after the new Democratic majority bowed to a successful push by Republicans to make new disclosure rules even tougher than originally planned.

The vote was 98-0 to require senators to reveal the water projects, hiking trails, defense contracts or tax breaks for specific industries they insert in legislation. That unanimity came five days after Democrats, holding a slim majority, were thwarted by a GOP-led rebellion in advancing their own version of "earmark" reform.

Bringing transparency to earmarks is a major objective of the ethics and lobbying reform legislation that the Senate has been debating since the new congressional session began.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., who last week led opposition to the Republican approach, lauded the final product, saying it "combined the best ideas from both sides of the aisle."

Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., the author of the amendment to the ethics bill, said the ability of the two sides to come together on the issue was "a good signal for the new Congress."

DeMint last Thursday proposed that the Senate adapt for its bill the more expansive definition of an earmark previously approved by the House. Under that definition, an earmark subject to public disclosure would include special projects tucked in federal agency budgets, such as a Pentagon contract, as well as nonfederal projects such as state parks and municipal museums. The definition in the original Senate bill would have applied only to nonfederal entities.

"Specifically, federal earmarks will be disclosed as well as those earmarks contained in committee reports that are not written in the text of a bill," DeMint said.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., DeMint's ally on the issue, said the Democratic approach would catch less than 5 percent of the almost 13,000 earmarks that made it into legislation last year.

Democrats countered that making public disclosures of every project designated by federal agencies was unworkable. But after Democratic leaders failed in an attempt to kill the DeMint provision, Reid on Friday acknowledged moving too quickly on the issue and pledged to work with DeMint to strengthen his amendment.

The Senate first voted 98-0 to accept changes to the DeMint amendment offered by Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin, D-Ill., that would make it more difficult for legislators to slip in tax breaks that help a single company or a limited number of people.

Lawmakers would also be required to post their earmarks on the Internet 48 hours before a vote.

The Senate on Tuesday also approved, by voice vote, an amendment that would bar lawmakers from including earmarks in the classified parts of a bill or a conference report without language in unclassified terms describing the project, funding levels and the sponsor.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., sponsor of the amendment with Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., said former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., now serving an eight-year prison term for accepting bribes from defense contractors, over a five-year period used classified reports to gain some $70 to $80 million in earmarks that helped his friends.

The Senate is trying to finish work on the ethics and lobbying bill, which seeks to restrict the ability of lobbyists to shower meals, gifts and travel on lawmakers, by the end of this week.

Senate Adopts Limits On Pork (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

The Senate voted unanimously yesterday to adopt a Republican-backed measure to limit pork-barrel spending despite initial opposition by Democratic leaders.

Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, changed course and embraced the bill last week after delaying a final vote when the proposal unexpectedly survived a procedural vote to kill it.

Mr. Reid praised the amendment, which was tweaked by Democratic leaders, for requiring "full and timely disclosure" of earmarks, which are spending projects and tax breaks buried in complex legislation.

"We have combined the best ideas from both sides of the aisle to establish the strongest possible disclosure rules," Mr. Reid said. "Once we are done, the Senate earmark rules will be even stronger than the recently adopted House rules."

The Senate voted 98-0 to adopt the measure as an amendment to ethics legislation.

The amendment would mandate public disclosure of all earmarks for federal projects and require members of Congress seeking earmarks to provide written information -- which also must be made available on an Internet database -- 48 hours before the legislation is considered.

Sen. Jim DeMint, the South Carolina Republican who introduced the original amendment, commended the Democratic leadership for working in a bipartisan fashion.

"This is a very important first step in earmark reform, and it is a victory for American taxpayers," he said. "The outcome we achieved on earmark disclosure demonstrates that we can work together to achieve meaningful results, and I hope we can continue this progress by considering several important reform amendments that are currently pending."

Mr. DeMint's amendment was approved narrowly in a 51-48 procedural vote Thursday. Mr. Reid delayed a final vote on the amendment, which is similar to ethics rules adopted with fanfare as one of the first acts of the Democrat-led House.

All but two of eight freshmen Democrats voted Thursday to kill the DeMint amendment. Sens. James H. Webb Jr. of Virginia and Jon Tester of Montana supported the measure and helped keep it alive.

Mr. Tester said that opposing Washington corruption was a top campaign pledge, and he applauded his colleagues for backing the amendment. "They are doing the right thing," he said.

Some freshmen Democrats who switched their votes -- Sens. Sherrod Brown of Ohio, Claire McCaskill of Missouri and Benjamin L. Cardin of Maryland -- said they had been holding out for a stronger reform package.

"There was stronger language being negotiated," Brown spokeswoman Joanna Kuebler said. "Senator Brown is very much in favor of taking a prudent look at how [pork projects] are handed out."

McCaskill spokeswoman Adrianne Marsh said that supporting the DeMint amendment would have precluded stronger action in the future.

"The overall goal is to continue the discussion and come up with the hardest bill in the end," she said. "By passing [the DeMint amendment], it might have limited that discussion."

Mr. DeMint's staff said Democrats did not begin negotiating earmark reform until Mr. Reid delayed the final vote on the Republican amendment. "There was no effort to modify the amendment until after the whole shenanigans on the floor,"DeMint spokesman Wesley Denton said.

The other freshmen Democrats who originally opposed the measure were Sens. Robert P. Casey of Pennsylvania, Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota and Sheldon Whitehouse of Rhode Island.

Health Care Galvanizes Key Groups (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117595

An unlikely coalition of business, labor and consumer interests plans to prod lawmakers to tackle health-care overhaul, but agreement among the group so far extends only to a consensus that the lack of affordable health care is a critical problem.

Rather than coalesce around a single idea for how to overhaul health care, leaders of the Business Roundtable, AARP and the Service Employees International Union said yesterday that they plan to force lawmakers to address the issue of health-care overhaul through a mix of advertising, lobbying and public outreach.

"We want to work together to create the political environment and the political will, where leaders believe that it's to their advantage to solve these problems, instead of running away from them," said John Castellani, president of the Business Roundtable, which represents top chief executives. "If we don't do it, we believe that our ability to compete in a world-wide market will be jeopardized."

The likelihood of these three groups -- which have vastly different constituencies and political leanings -- agreeing on a single approach is unlikely. But the fact that they're looking to coordinate their efforts shows how dominant the issue of overhauling health care is becoming.

Later this week, another group of 16 disparate organizations, including health insurers, physician associations, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and health advocacy groups, plans to introduce its own bipartisan approach to address the plight of uninsured Americans. The group, which has been meeting since October 2004 and engaged two conflict-management organizations to coordinate the process, plans to unveil a phased-in approach to help cover those who are uninsured.

"These are groups who have disagreed with each other on a host of different health-care issues, but we've decided to come together to achieve a consensus and to work together," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a liberal advocacy group that is part of the coalition.

Separately, several lawmakers on Capitol Hill are announcing their own ideas for how to help make health care more affordable and accessible, including a bill that will be introduced today by Sens. Jeff Bingaman (D., N.M.) and George Voinovich (R., Ohio). President Bush is expected to discuss health care in his State of the Union address next week, and is considering calling for changes that would make it easier for individuals to buy health coverage.

The push to discuss health care comes as health-insurance costs and the number of uninsured Americans continue to rise. About 47 million Americans are uninsured, including more than eight million children, according to the Census Bureau.

"Health-care costs are out of control for employers and employees," said AARP CEO William Novelli. He added that by joining together, "we've got the ability through this coalition to reach out into boardrooms, into policy makers' offices, as well as to the public."

Andrew Stern, who heads the SEIU, cited a report from consultants McKinsey & Co. saying that by 2008, major U.S. employers will spend as much in health-care costs as they earn in profits. "The winds of change are blowing. I think it's now time for our Congress to step up to the plate," he said.

Some companies have been seeking new ways to handle the rising health-care costs of unionized workers. In a recent contract with the United Steelworkers union, Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. agreed to transfer all retiree medical obligations to a trust, to reduce legacy costs while preserving benefits for current and retired unionized workers.

While many unions feel that the issue of rising health-care costs can't be resolved through bargaining, the SEIU has sought to take a progressive approach to providing health care to workers. The union, which has 1.8 million members, represents more health-care industry workers than any other union.

A New Consensus On Universal Health Care (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

On the surface, it looked to be just another Washington news conference, part of the white noise of the political and policy process.

But this one was different. There, at the National Press Club, stood the president of the Business Roundtable, representing the country's largest corporations; the president of the Service Employees International Union, the country's most vibrant union and one of its fastest-growing; and the president of AARP, the formidable seniors lobby. They put aside their usual differences to deliver a clear, simple message to President Bush and congressional leaders of both parties:

We stand ready to give you the political cover you need for a centrist, bipartisan fix for a broken health-care system.

Or, if you refuse, we stand ready to embarrass you and run you out of office.

"Washington is behind where the rest of the country is," said Andy Stern, a labor leader. "Democratic leaders in Congress say this is not the time. The White House has said now is not the time. And we are saying, 'Now is the time.' "

Stern and his new friends are right about one thing: Something's going on.

DOJ_NMG_0117596

A Republican governor of Massachusetts, working with Sen. Ted Kennedy and a Democratic legislature, hammered out a comprehensive reform plan last year. And last week, another Republican governor proposed a similarly bold plan for California.

Not coincidentally, both state plans conform roughly to a consensus that has been taking shape in Washington over the past two years, in behind-the-scenes negotiations among health insurers, hospitals, physicians, business and labor groups, drug companies and consumer groups such as Families USA. The first draft of their effort will be unveiled tomorrow. And while the "consensus" will fudge some of the most difficult issues in an effort to keep the coalition together, the outlines of a genuinely comprehensive reform plan are coming into focus.

What does that consensus look like?

It starts with universal coverage, accomplished either through a mandate on everyone to purchase basic health insurance or a mandate on all employers to offer it.

It includes subsidies for families with incomes up to 300 percent of the poverty level to help defray the cost of that insurance and the deductibles and co-payments that go with it.

It involves changes in tax law so that individuals who purchase health insurance enjoy the same tax benefits as those who get it as a fringe benefit at work.

It sets up a pooling arrangement in every state to allow individuals and small businesses to buy health insurance at the same price as large corporations.

Finally, it sets a deadline for physicians and hospitals to switch to computerized health records, along with a program to provide no-interest loans to buy the necessary hardware and software.

Of course, in health care, the details are always tricky. To get a plan that hangs together, all of the major interest groups would have to make important concessions.

Doctors would have to agree to have their compensation from insurers tied, in part, to how well they conform to treatment protocols established by the various medical specialties.

Hospitals and insurers would have to agree that 85 percent of their revenue would go to providing direct care, capping profit and administrative expenses at 15 percent.

Health insurers would have to accept the obligation to sell insurance to everyone, with only modest variation in rates for age and health status.

And to raise some money and hold down the growth in insurance premiums, union members and high-income workers would have to accept a cap on the amount of health benefits they receive tax-free.

To avoid government "negotiated" prices, drug companies would have to submit new drugs to a rigorous cost-benefit test by an independent agency, such as the Institute of Medicine, as a condition for being included on the Medicare and Medicaid formularies.

Conservatives and their small-business allies would have to swallow some form of "pay or play" -- either providing employer-paid health insurance or paying a tax to the state subsidy pool.

And liberals would have to accept a "basic" insurance package that provides full coverage for preventive care and catastrophic illness but requires patient cost-sharing for routine care.

These concessions won't come easy, which is why there has been no significant progress on health-care reform in the decade since the Clinton debacle. But the current system has become such a problem for so many providers and consumers that many are now willing to compromise on long-held positions.

Unfortunately, pulling it all together will require the active engagement of Congress and the White House, who, so far, have been missing in action.

It remains unclear whether Democrats would prefer to make progress now or have an issue to run on in the 2008 presidential election. If they're interested in a deal, the go-to guys will be Kennedy, who played a crucial role in negotiating the Massachusetts plan, and Rep. George Miller, a Californian and confidant of Speaker Nancy Pelosi who chairs the House Education and Labor Committee.

It is also unclear whether the Bush administration is prepared to move beyond its narrow ideological fixation on "consumer-driven health care" and become an honest broker. As head of Medicare and Medicaid, economist-physician Mark McClellan might have played that role, but he has resigned. And the obvious candidate to replace him -- Mike Leavitt, the secretary of Health and Human Services and former governor of Utah -- has yet to be given the same broad mandate and authority from the White House that Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson got to tackle budget balancing and entitlement reform.

All of which explains why the SEIU's Andy Stern, the Roundtable's John Castellani and AARP's Bill Novelli decided to put aside their differences and put it to the politicians. As Stern said yesterday, "The answer to the health-care problem is not one of policy but one of politics."

Senators Try Again To Fund And Reform Amtrak (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Sens. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) and Trent Lott (R-Miss.) introduced legislation yesterday that would authorize $3.2 billion a year for Amtrak over six years in exchange for greater efficiency and increased investments by states.

Supporters said the plan would place Amtrak on a firm financial footing after years of instability.

A similar bill was passed by the Senate in November, 93 to 6, but was not taken up by the House of Representatives. Lautenberg said prospects were much improved with Democrats now in control of both houses of Congress.

"It's not going to be that difficult this year," Lautenberg said yesterday at a news conference at Union Station, where he was joined by Lott and Alexander K. Kummant, Amtrak's chief executive.

Amtrak, the main operator of passenger trains in the country, has been beset with money-losing routes, hobbled by technical troubles, criticized for mismanagement and crippled by a lack of capital investment. Conservatives especially have questioned whether large operating subsidies for Amtrak are a wise investment.

Amtrak received $1.3 billion in federal funding last fiscal year.

Jim Berard, spokesman for U.S. Rep. James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.), chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, agreed that Democratic control of the House will help place Amtrak funding on an express track this year.

"Given the change in management and the new management's more favorable view of Amtrak, we expect it to get through the committee and to the floor," Berard said.

Lautenberg and Lott said that having a viable passenger rail option is vital to the nation's economy and environment.

"We cannot depend entirely on airplanes and roads," Lautenberg said.

In addition to all the carrots, the bill offers several sticks, such as expecting Amtrak to reduce operating costs by 40 percent over six years.

"This is about reform and accountability," Lott said. "It's not just a big chunk of money."

Kummant declined to specify how he would reduce operating costs, but he said that encouraging passenger growth is just as important as cutting services to achieve efficiencies.

The bill would authorize $1.7 billion in debt repayment, $7.8 billion in new bonding authority and $300 million a year in grants that would have to be matched by states.

Lautenberg and Lott said that local matching grants would encourage overall investment in the system as well as states' sharing in the cost of providing services to less popular destinations, which generally require the largest subsidies.

Kummant said the bill fits his vision of the rail network of the future, which would be a series of state rail networks threaded into national corridors.

Hurdles remain, such as the House's new pay-as-you-go budget rules and the Bush administration's skepticism on Amtrak funding.

Lautenberg was asked how he would find the money to pay for the bill.

"The same way we find money to pay for other things," he said.

FEDERAL DIARY: Thrift Savings Plan Could Use More Options, Workers Say (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 17, 2007

TIPS. Bonds. Roth 401(k) accounts.

These are among the investment options that government employees would support adding to the Thrift Savings Plan, according to a survey released yesterday.

The survey was the first since 1991 to query civil service employees, postal workers, military personnel and others in government about their satisfaction with the TSP, a 401(k)-type retirement program that has $206.6 billion in assets.

The survey, released at a meeting of the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, found that thrift plan participants are generally more satisfied with the plan than private-sector employees are with their 401(k) plans. But could it be better? The survey included questions on potential changes to the TSP to gauge employee interest in changing the plan's design and options.

The TSP offers four primary stock and bond index funds and a government securities fund. It also includes five life-cycle funds, where participants select an investment mix of the primary funds that are weighted to minimize market risks as they move closer to when they expect to draw down their savings.

The thrift board has been considering new rules and investment options for the TSP for much of the past year, in part because of recent changes to pension law and because some members of Congress and the National Association of Real Estate Investment Trusts have pushed for adding a real estate fund as a way of helping government employees diversify their portfolios.

The board is interested in modifying the TSP, which operates as an opt-in system, so that new federal employees and military personnel are automatically enrolled, in hopes that it will encourage employees to get in the habit of saving for retirement. Sixty-six percent of survey respondents were in favor of that change to the TSP.

Employees surveyed also supported adding new investment options. Sixty percent said providing a Roth 401(k) account would make the TSP a better program, and 46 percent said offering a wide selection of investment options would improve the plan.

With a Roth option, participants would make contributions with money that had been taxed, but the contributions would grow tax-free and account balances could be withdrawn tax-free. Employees investing in the current TSP funds contribute pretax dollars and pay taxes when they withdraw their savings.

The strongest supporters for adding a Roth option came from the military and other uniformed services, the survey found. For many in the military, current incomes and tax rates may be as low or lower than their expected incomes and tax rates.

The survey also found support for several other investment options, including a Treasury Inflation-Protected Securities (or TIPS) fund, an emerging-markets bond fund and an international bond fund.

Gregory Long, who headed up the survey project as the thrift board's director of product development, suggested that the cost of new funds should be considered in any debate on whether to expand the TSP.

The TSP funds cost participants about $4 a year for every $10,000 they have in their accounts. "If new funds are added to the TSP, they might have expenses that are significantly higher than this," the survey report said.

In the survey, 19 percent disagreed that adding options would make the program better, and most in this group signaled that they were not interested in expanding TSP options if it increased administrative and other overhead costs.

Despite concerns about costs, many survey respondents appear interested in adding investment options. For example, of those who believe expanding the TSP will make it a better program, 59 percent support adding a TIPS fund "if costs are the same" and 35 percent favor adding TIPS "even if costs are higher." TIPS are tied to the consumer price index, eliminating the risk of inflation eroding the investment.

Of the respondents favoring an expanded TSP, 53 percent supported adding a real estate investment trust fund if costs stay the same and 35 percent favored the real estate option even if costs were higher.

The survey was conducted by mail in November, and 3,467 TSP participants completed it, a response rate of 20 percent. While the rate was lower than TSP officials expected, Long said the results were "representative of what people think." The survey's margin of error was 1.7 percentage points.

Bush Lauds Series Champion Cardinals (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 17, 2007

President Bush said Tuesday that even in a losing streak, it is possible to win by sticking with your goal and showing character no matter what the doubters say about you.

He was talking, of course, about baseball.

Bush, a lifelong fan of the sport, honored the World Series champion St. Louis Cardinals by commending them for winning the hard way.

To be sure, the Cardinals were not a powerhouse on their way to the White House.

The team limped into the playoffs with the worst record of any World Series champion in a non-strike season. The Cardinals played with castoffs in key positions and a sense of being slighted by people other than their fans.

"When you overcome the odds this team overcame, you've got to play as a team," Bush said. "And they did."

In beating the Detroit Tigers last fall, the team was led by a little guy: David Eckstein, a sparkplug of a shortstop who stands 5-foot-7.

"They said he can't hit. They said he can't throw," Bush said of Eckstein, who stood smiling behind the president with his teammates.

"Listen, David. I've made a career out of people underestimating me," Bush said, drawing laughs from a packed East Room audience.

DOJ_NMG_0117599

Bush lauded the team's entire operation — its management, coaches, players and fans. He had plenty of nice words for his old business partner, Cardinals Chairman Bill DeWitt Jr., who worked with Bush when the president was managing partner of the Texas Rangers.

"The Cardinals now have won 10 World Series. That's 10 more than the Texas Rangers," Bush said.

The biggest applause, though, came when Bush introduced an injured Marine, Lance Cpl. Chad Watson. Bush met him at Walter Reed Army Medical Center recently and noticed the soldier was wearing a Cardinals hat. So he invited him to the ceremony.

"You never know where you're going to find a St. Louis Cardinal fan," Bush said.

A few notable players, chiefly slugger Albert Pujols, did not attend because of schedule conflicts. Pitcher Jeff Suppan led the team into the room even though he is with another team now, the Milwaukee Brewers, after signing a $42 million contract in the off-season.

For this event, the business attire typically required in the Bush White House gave way to some Cardinal red. A few fans wore baseball caps. Others wore Cardinal jerseys. A little girl came with a bright red bow, while a young boy sported a sharp red tie.

More than a few players, despite being used to a spotlight, seemed a bit overwhelmed around the president.

Said Eckstein after the event: "It's just an honor to have him even mention you, to have him even know your name."

Surging Revenues (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

The myth persists in some media circles that the federal budget deficit is "surging" or ballooning or something terrible -- all of which is served up as ammunition for those in Congress who want a tax increase. At the risk of being drummed out of the guild, we thought you'd rather have the real story.

The deficit has in fact declined by some $165 billion over the past two fiscal years, and according to the most recent data has continued to fall in the first quarter of fiscal 2007. The latest Treasury estimates for January show that tax receipts in December were $18 billion higher than a year earlier, helping to boost the budget surplus for the month to $40 billion, up from $11 billion a year ago. December is typically a good month for revenues due to year-end tax payments.

Meanwhile, for the first three months of fiscal 2007 through December, revenues climbed 8.1%, building on double-digit revenue increases in the previous two years. Corporate income taxes were up a remarkable 22.2% in the first fiscal quarter, showing that the government continues to grab a nice chunk of the rising business profits that so many of our politicians like to deplore. Individual income taxes rose 8.8%, thanks to strong wage and salary growth. Much of this revenue comes from "the rich," believe it or not.

In the most surprising budget news, federal spending was nearly flat in the first fiscal quarter. This was despite a 22.1% increase in Medicare spending due largely to the new prescription drug benefit, and a 10.7% increase in defense. Those increases were offset by lower spending for flood insurance and disaster assistance compared with the peak of post-Katrina payments a year ago. So the first quarter deficit was $85 billion, down sharply from $119 billion a year earlier.

All in all, despite huge outlays for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the nation's fiscal picture is brightening. We hate to ruin the press corps's day with such cheerful news, but there it is.

Ending The Prison Windfall (NYT)

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

The Census Bureau typically uses the decennial census to test data-collection methods that become routine later on. The 2010 census should include a test run at counting the nation's 1.4 million prison inmates at their permanent addresses instead of in prisons. That would help bring an end to a corrosive but little known practice that distorts the political process in virtually every corner of the country.

Inmates are denied the right to vote in all but two states. But state lawmakers treat them as residents of the prisons when drawing legislative maps, to inflate the head count in lightly populated rural areas where prisons are typically built. This creates legislative districts where none would ordinarily be, shifting political influence from the heavily populated urban districts where inmates live.

Once inflated, these towns and counties siphon an outsized portion of state and federal aid. Politicians in districts with prisons sometimes brag openly about the windfall, as they mock "constituents" who are powerless to remove them from office and are packed onto buses and driven hundreds of miles to their real homes the minute they leave the prison walls.

The Census Bureau was made pointedly aware of this problem last fall. A report it commissioned noted that counting inmates at prisons distorted the political process and raised legitimate concerns about the fairness of the census itself. That report, by the National Research Council, recognized that the methods would not be simple to change, but urged the bureau to seeks ways to do it.

Collecting and verifying residential information for prison inmates is a complicated job. But the report suggested a perfectly reasonable interim solution. The bureau could publish detailed counts of the prison populations, so that the inmates could be subtracted at redistricting time. These figures would illuminate corrupt redistricting committees that use prison counts to pad districts that fall short of federal population requirements.

The Census Bureau has a crucial role to play in putting and end to this despicable practice. The 2010 census is as good a time as any to get started.

OTHER NEWS:

No Need For More Opec Cuts, Says Naimi (FT)

By Carola Hoyos In London

Financial Times, January 17, 2007

Ali Naimi, Saudi Arabia's energy minister, on Tuesday said Opec, the oil cartel, did not need to further reduce its production. The oil price fell sharply following the remarks.

The news from the most influential member of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries dimmed the prospect of an imminent emergency meeting of the group and prompted international oil prices to fall $1 to $52 a barrel, a 19-month low.

Mr Naimi said: "Do not panic. Actually there is no reason for a meeting."

He added: "The market is in a healthy condition and moving in the right direction."

Edmund Daukoru, Nigeria's energy minister, was less sanguine about the market, believing it to be oversupplied. But he said: "I think we have to take a wait-and-see [approach]. After we implement 500,000 barrels a day [cut], we have to see how the market responds."

The two men were speaking on the sidelines of an oil conference in New Delhi.

Their positions contradict the view expressed by other Opec members, including Iran and Venezuela, who have recently publicly backed further action.

Rafael Ramirez, Venezuela's energy minister, has warned that prices have dropped "too much" and has spent the past week trying to gain support among Opec members for an immediate emergency meeting.

He said on Tuesday, despite Saudi Arabia's announcement, that he expected Opec to hold such a meeting soon.

But people who watch Opec closely warned on Tuesday not to assume that Saudi Arabia would stick to its position that Opec should sit tight. Mr Naimi has a track record of reducing market expectations for robust action only to quickly reverse his position and advocate production curtailments, thereby achieving a maximum jump in the oil price.

Oil prices have fallen about 15 per cent since the start of the year and are well below the record $78.40 a barrel they hit in July.

Rodrigo Rato, managing director of the International Monetary Fund, on Tuesday indicated just how important the lower oil price had been to the US and world economy.

"Although the US economy has slowed down, in large part because of a continued weaker housing market, what I can say now is that a soft landing seems more assured, as lower energy prices have supported employment growth and consumption," he said.

But for Opec, which supplies more than a third of the world's oil, the goal until recently was to keep oil prices at about $60 a barrel. In October the group agreed to reduce its production by 1.2m barrels a day, but have so far only achieved half that amount. In December the 11-nation group met again and decided to further reduce output by 500,000 barrels a day from February 1. "I believe these measures are working well. Inventories in the fourth quarter have come down...which puts the market closer to balance," Mr Naimi said, adding: "I think we have succeeded very well."

Part of Opec's conundrum is that the most recent price drop cannot be fully explained by changes in demand and supply. Though mild weather in Europe and the north-eastern US has reduced demand for heating oil, financial movements of institutional investors active in energy futures markets have also played a significant role.

Dow Hits Another Record As Oil Drops (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0117601

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, January 17, 2007

Investors returned from the long weekend Tuesday in the mood to buy blue-chip stocks and pushed the Dow Jones industrial average to another high.

Cheered by another fall in the price of crude oil and encouraging corporate earnings reports, the Dow added 26.51 points to 12,582.59, its third-consecutive record close. The Dow is up 1.0% this year.

The broader stock market, measured by the Standard & Poor's 500, gained 1.17 points to 1431.90, thanks largely to stocks in the fertilizer, railroads and retail real estate investment trust industries. The S&P 500 is up 1.0% this year.

Tech stocks, which have been leading markets in 2007, were left behind. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 5.04 points to 2497.78. The index is still up 3.4% this year, though.

Declining oil prices have been a theme all year. Tuesday, the price of a barrel of crude for next-month delivery fell $1.78 to $51.21, touching its lowest level in 19 months, after Saudi Arabia said it wasn't planning production cuts.

While investors have worried about how falling oil prices would affect energy company stocks, many are hopeful the lower energy costs will help consumers, says Scott Pape, portfolio manager at CastleArk Management. He's also hopeful lower crude prices will help corporate earnings come in strong. "Earnings are above average and above trend," he says.

Strong profit reports from financial firms Wells Fargo and TD Ameritrade Tuesday built the case for earnings. But those were countered by weaker-than-expected results from software maker Symantec and home-builder Centex.

Many investors basing their bets on earnings were waiting to see what computer chip giant Intel reported after the market closed, says Joe Saluzzi, trader at Themis Trading. "The talk of the day was the anticipation of Intel earnings. It's the first big test of earnings season." (Intel revenue slips, 1B.)

Highlights:

Wells Fargo gained 72 cents to $36.23 after the bank posted 12.3% higher quarterly earnings of $2.2 billion, or 64 cents a share.

•Brokerage TD Ameritrade rose 65 cents to $18 when it reported 14% higher earnings per share of 24 cents. The results were 27% higher than analysts expected.

•Software maker Symantec fell $2.69 to $17.79 after saying profit this year would miss estimates.

Dow Clears Another Record As Oil Prices Continue To Fall (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

A plunge in crude-oil prices to their lowest level in nearly 20 months helped the stock market finish higher, but technology shares were a notable laggard.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 26.51 points, or 0.2%, to 12582.59, up 1% this year and its 25th record close since Oct. 3. Energy company Exxon Mobil was the blue-chip average's weakest component in percentage terms, off 1.4%.

Except for energy producers, most companies are helped by cheaper fuel costs, which free up money in consumers' wallets to spend on products other than gasoline at their local filling station. Yesterday's trading was driven by investors' faith in that dynamic, which has been on stark display in 2007's early going.

"The oil selloff has definitely helped to unlock the rally," in stocks this month, said Wendell Perkins, chief investment officer at the mutual-fund firm Johnson Asset Management. "Energy has been a momentum-driven market, which isn't surprising if you look at the way it traded back when it was on the way up."

Oil's decline extended the contract's year-to-date decline to 16.1%.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index nudged up 0.1%, or 1.17 points, to 1431.90, up 1% on the year.

The technology-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index, however, slipped 0.2%, or 5.04 points, to 2497.78. Many Wall Street analysts remain confident tech stocks will be among the market's strongest performers this year.

Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader, a unit of Charles Schwab, said that shifting expectations about if and when the Federal Reserve might cut its interest-rate target could curb the market's gains in the short term.

He added: "I don't think there's any way you can get away from how powerful the market was in the fourth quarter last year. The bears can't really get traction for long."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1; bond prices rose2. The 10-year note increased 5/32 point, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.751%. The 30-year bond rose 8/32 to yield 4.844%.

DOJ_NMG_0117602

The dollar strengthened3. It rose to 120.63 yen, compared with 120.45. The euro fell against the dollar to $1.2915, compared with $1.2937.

Weak Forecasts Mount In Housing Industry (WSJ)

By Lingling Wei And James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Mortgage lender IndyMac Bancorp Inc. slashed its forecast for fourth-quarter earnings and home builder Centex Corp. projected a loss from continuing operations for its latest quarter as the U.S. housing industry struggles with slow sales and rising loan defaults.

Though some economists say the worst of the housing slump is over, the latest developments show that bad news from lenders and builders can still jolt the market. Steeper discounts from builders desperate to unload excess homes could add further downward pressure on prices, as could rising foreclosures, which dump more properties on the market.

"There are going to be more negative surprises," said Ivy Zelman, a Cleveland-based housing analyst for Credit Suisse who has long had a bearish view on the industry. "I think it's just getting started."

Residential Capital LLC, a real-estate financing company owned by GMAC Financial Services, said it will eliminate 1,000 positions by October to reduce costs as the mortgage lender grapples with "the continued deterioration" in the subprime mortgage sector. The company now has 14,000 employees world-wide. In a filing with the Securities & Exchange Commission, ResCap estimated that it would incur about $10 million in severance and related costs associated with the work-force reduction.

Meanwhile, in a sign of bargain hunting, shares of builder WCI Communities Inc. were up $1.45, or 6.9%, at $22.47, in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading after financier Carl Icahn said in a regulatory filing that he has raised his stake in the company to about 14.6% of the company's outstanding shares.

IndyMac, Pasadena, Calif., one of the top 10 U.S. mortgage lenders, said it now expects to earn about 97 cents a share for the fourth quarter, down from the range of $1.30 to $1.40 it previously projected. That compares with $1.06 a year earlier. IndyMac shares slumped $3.05, or 7%, to $40.50 in 4 p.m. Big Board composite trading.

IndyMac blamed higher provisions for loan losses, repurchases of soured loans earlier sold to investors and declines in the value of loans and mortgage securities retained by the company. Among other factors, the lender also cited a squeeze on the margin between its funding costs and the interest it earns from borrowers.

IndyMac promised to present an "action plan" for dealing with the tougher market when it reports quarterly earnings Jan. 25.

Dallas-based Centex said it expects to record a loss from continuing operations of about $2 per share for the fiscal third quarter ended Dec. 31, compared with earnings of $2.37 a share a year earlier. The company, which is due to report quarterly results Tuesday, said it plans to write down the value of land by about $300 million and to record costs of $150 million on deposits paid for options to buy land that are being abandoned.

Centex is the latest in a series of home builders to write down the value of land and options to buy land. As home builders have reduced construction, the value of undeveloped land has fallen sharply in parts of the country over the past year.

Centex shares were off $1.55, or 2.9%, at $51.61 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

The builder said it is dealing with "one of the most challenging housing environments in the past 25 years."

Race And Gender Make Democrats' Field Historic (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Democrats moved a step closer yesterday to what shapes up as one of the most historic and compelling contests ever for their party's presidential nomination, a study in contrasting styles and candidacies in which race and gender play central roles in the competition.

At center stage stand Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who set up his presidential exploratory committee yesterday, and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who is set to make clear her intentions soon. Never has a party begun a nomination contest with its two most celebrated candidates a woman and an African American.

The 2008 nomination contest that will play out over the coming year is far more than a two-person race. Former senator John Edwards of North Carolina has already established himself as a genuine contender for the nomination, and the rest of the prospective Democratic field is among the strongest in years.

But initially, the electricity will be generated by the Clinton and Obama candidacies. The news media will find the story line irresistible, and Democrats around the country are eagerly anticipating the competition. "Senator Obama's got the magic, but Hillary Clinton's got the muscle," said Jamal Simmons, a Democratic strategist who is neutral in the nomination campaign. "This is going to be a titanic fight between energy and charisma on one hand and money and organization on the other."

There are many ways to describe the differences in the two candidacies. Obama will cast the contest as the future vs. the past. Clinton can counter with experience vs. inexperience. Obama opposed the Iraq war from the beginning; Clinton long supported it but has become more critical over time. Clinton begins as the candidate of the party establishment, while Obama will attempt to mount a challenge that draws new voters into the process.

Each will have to overcome perceived liabilities. Many Democrats fear Clinton cannot win a general election because of the baggage she carries from the administration of her husband, former president Bill Clinton. Others see her as so cautious and careful that she cannot convey the warmth and authenticity many voters want in a president.

Obama's readiness to serve as president at a time of such uncertainty and danger in the world will clearly be questioned as he moves into active campaigning. Nor has he faced the competition and scrutiny of a presidential race. Making the transition from political phenomenon to serious aspirant for the presidency could prove to be a significant challenge.

"I think he very much recognizes that if this is just about hoisting the icon, it's an empty exercise and one probably doomed to failure," said David Axelrod, Obama's chief strategist. "But if it is a movement for real political change at the grass roots, it can be very powerful."

Neither will have the luxury of missteps. Unlike other candidates, they will have their every move and every mistake magnified by the media lens that will follow them at every step.

The coming campaign will provide ample opportunity for Democratic voters to decide what they want in their nominee, and in Clinton and Obama they will have strikingly different models to choose from.

"An Obama campaign would bank on an idea that voters are looking for inspirational and motivational leadership, that rises above the traditional political calculations," said Democratic pollster Geoffrey Garin, who is neutral in the race. "The Clinton campaign is hoping that voters put a premium on experience and a long record of fighting the good fight and making a difference."

A few years ago, an Obama-style candidacy would have been seen as implausible, given the fact that the 45-year-old politician has been in the Senate for just two years. Today, with an apparent yearning among the electorate for a break from the divisive politics of the past decade, his freshness may be seen as an asset.

For all the potential history-in-the-making of their candidacies, neither Clinton nor Obama enters the campaign primarily because of race or gender. Obama is the son of a Kenyan father and white American mother, but his candidacy is not comparable to that of Jesse L. Jackson in 1984, when the civil rights leader first sought the presidency. Jackson's candidacy was largely about breaking racial barriers. Although Obama's could become that, his appeal appears not fundamentally based on his race.

Clinton has risen to the top of the Democratic field not principally because she is a woman but because she is part of a power couple that has dominated the party since the early 1990s, as well as by virtue of her long experience as a party activist, first lady and now senator.

Still, there is no way to underestimate the significance of race and gender in the coming campaign. "They certainly have not practiced identity politics, but it is a huge part of who they are when they go out and present themselves as presidential candidates," said Democratic strategist Anita Dunn.

The election of Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) as the nation's first female House speaker underscored to many Democrats the potential power of Clinton's candidacy, and Clinton strategists agree. "I think a serious female candidate for president will generate an awful lot of excitement and enthusiasm, especially among younger voters and among women," Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson said in an e-mail message.

Party strategists say it would be a mistake to cast the Democratic contest as a two-person race, even though Clinton and Obama occupy a significant amount of space and both may be able to raise more money than others in the field.

Obama and Clinton advisers already see Edwards as a formidable candidate, in part because of his strong support in Iowa, whose caucuses will kick off the nominating calendar. The rest of the prospective field includes two of the most senior senators in the party and two governors with notable attributes. Waiting on the sidelines is former vice president Al Gore.

"There is such a compulsion on the part of the political community and political media community to create a steel cage match between Clinton and Obama you can almost see the fight posters," Axelrod said. "That's not the way he views it."

Still, there is no doubting the amount of space Obama and Clinton occupy as the campaign begins -- or the significance if either ends up as the Democratic nominee in 2008.

Obama Move Jolts Democrats (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's decision Tuesday to formally explore a run for president sets the stage for a historic Democratic nomination race dominated by a black man and a first lady-turned-senator.

Obama, 45, said he would spend the next few weeks traveling and listening to voters and would announce his plans Feb. 10 in Illinois. His initial move sent a jolt of electricity through a field that is likely to include New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton as well as New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who is Hispanic. John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee, already is in the race.

Obama "raises the charisma quotient to a new high. He'll really energize the process and probably attract people to the primaries that may not have been involved before," says Doug Hattaway, a Democratic strategist based in Boston.

Hattaway and others said they are excited about the unprecedented diversity of the emerging Democratic field. Gina Glantz, who managed Bill Bradley's 2000 campaign, said it could signal "a glorious transitional moment to leadership that includes all Americans."

In a videotaped statement on his website, Obama said he did not expect to be weighing a presidential race. But he said the country is "in a precarious place" as a result of decisions made in Washington over the past six years. Working people are struggling to pay for health care and college tuition, Obama said, and "we're still mired in a tragic and costly war that should have never been waged."

As a state legislator in 2002, Obama opposed the Iraq invasion before it started. A draft-Obama group launched a website Tuesday called obamawasright.com.

"It highlights Senator Obama's uniquely consistent position in opposition to the war in Iraq" among the three leading Democratic hopefuls, the group said.

Clinton and former North Carolina senator Edwards voted in 2002 to authorize the war. Edwards calls his vote a mistake and wants Congress to deny money for more troops. Clinton says she would not have voted for the war if she had known then what she knows now.

Clinton returned Monday from visiting U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. A news conference set for Tuesday was delayed until today so Rep. John McHugh, R-N.Y., could take part. He fell ill in Germany and had to stay there an extra day.

Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said it was no secret Obama was moving forward. "A good, strong field is a good thing," he said.

Asked Tuesday on CNN if Obama is qualified to be president, Edwards said he wouldn't "pass judgment" on other candidates. He added that "we want good people in the race, because we desperately need new leadership in 2009."

Steve Elmendorf, who was deputy campaign manager for Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's 2004 general election campaign, says the problem for Edwards and others is that Clinton and Obama "are going to take up a lot of the fundraising and political oxygen for this race." Still, he says, "the excitement that they get initially will take them only so far."

Ultimately, Elmendorf says, the pair will have to prove themselves to voters in the diners and living rooms of early primary and caucus states.

They'll also participate in debates that he says will have a leveling effect: "When everybody gets on the stage … they're all equal."

Obama's background sets him apart from the rest of the field. His mother was a white woman from Kansas. His father was a black man from Kenya. In his 1995 book, Dreams from My Father, he writes about identity struggles and adolescent confusion that led him to use cocaine and other drugs in high school and part of college. He later became a community organizer, lawyer and state legislator.

Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., offered a hint of Obama's potential appeal to black voters by declaring his support for a candidacy as yet undeclared. He said Obama would "ignite a feeling of national purpose" and "crystallize this country's movement beyond race and ethnicity as political impediments. That promise is too powerful for me to equivocate, maneuver or sit on the sidelines."

Last year, Massachusetts voters elected Gov. Deval Patrick, the nation's second African-American governor since the Reconstruction era, after a campaign with minimal focus on his race.

"It was not a factor for voters," said Hattaway, a Patrick adviser.

Obama Takes First Step In White House Bid (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Christi Parsons, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117605

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Barack Obama took an important formal step on Tuesday toward a Democratic presidential campaign that would make him the most formidable African-American candidate ever, offering a call to common purpose as a remedy to bitter partisan divisions and marking a potential turning point in the nation's race relations.

By filing papers to form a presidential exploratory committee, the first-term Illinois senator signaled his intent to run for the presidency, a move that he has been publicly considering for months. Advisers said Obama and his family had made the personal commitment to a grueling, two-year presidential bid and the senator now would concentrate on assembling a campaign apparatus and testing support among financial backers and grass-roots activists.

The Democratic lawmaker will make a formal announcement on his candidacy Feb. 10 in Springfield, Ill., where barely two years ago he served as a mere state senator. He will return a cultural phenomenon, a best-selling author coveted as a guest by television talk show hosts and followed by celebrity photographers. He has come to embody the hopes and dreams of many Americans.

His candidacy would create a historic moment, as the American public contemplates a leader of mixed-race heritage, the son of an African father and white Kansan mother. Race would be a spoken and unspoken subtext to a campaign that also would raise grave policy issues on the war in Iraq, with Obama an early and consistent critic of the ongoing U.S. military mission there.

His efforts to reach toward the center with appeals to common ground is a reversal of the recently successful political formula of polarization to drive up turnout among base voters that won President Bush re-election in 2004.

Obama made the official announcement of his exploratory committee on his Web site, in a simple video that featured him seated, wearing a coat and no tie, telling viewers he wanted to be the first to tell them of the development. He sounded a theme of change, saying he was "struck by how hungry we all are for a different kind of politics."

"Our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, common-sense way," Obama said. "Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions."

Right after the spot was placed on the Web, Obama got on the telephone and spoke to dozens and dozens of people throughout the day, including a morning telephone conference call with more than 100 people. He spent the day at the offices of his exploratory committee in Washington

Interviewed on the way to a vote on the Senate floor early in the evening, Obama said the response had been "very positive." American voters, he added, "want honesty and they want bold approaches to some of the problems we're facing."

In a campaign, he would faces challenges to his lack of experience in high government office. He has only two years in the U.S. Senate and no major accomplishments in that body, although his limited time in office is counted as a virtue by some who seek a break with the political past.

Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster and political strategist, said, "He is a political phenomenon. But being a political phenomenon does not make you a credible candidate to be commander in chief of the armed forces and leader of the free world in a time of war. Normally, qualifications are the first consideration when you're thinking about a candidate for president in a time of war."

But Obama brings to a presidential bid eloquence, the political power of celebrity, a hopeful vision and a sense that his candidacy would be a clear break with the established order.

Geoffrey Garin, a Democratic pollster and strategist for the 2004 Wesley Clark campaign, said, "In the next year, Democrats will be weighing those assets against his experience and what it takes in their view to become a capable president. I think we're at a special moment in America where there's a real yearning for change and a different kind of leadership that rises above it all. It's that yearning that is such an asset to his campaign."

Obama's path to victory would be a gauntlet of relentless fundraising, laser-like scrutiny and an exhausting grind of campaigning. Mounting a presidential campaign would present a huge organizational and financial undertaking for a candidate who is relatively new to the national political scene and did not even face a serious Republican opponent in his only prior high-level campaign, for the U.S. Senate in 2004.

In both the Democratic primary and the general election, he would face opponents who have been laying the groundwork for their bids for years. Political opponents and the voting public will watching to see how he stands up to the rigorous testing of a national campaign.

Likely Democratic candidate Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) can rely on a political organization that she and her husband have nurtured for years. And former vice presidential nominee John Edwards, who already has announced his candidacy, began cultivating supporters in early primary states almost immediately after the 2004 election.

Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for Clinton, said, "The field is shaping up as a strong field. It's an exciting time to be a Democrat. We obviously wish Sen. Obama well."

DOJ_NMG_0117606

Edwards' camp sounded a similar note. "The country's going to face some tremendous challenges in 2009 and we need the very best candidates to run," said Edwards adviser Jennifer Palmieri. "He thinks that anyone who has good ideas on how we tackle these problems should get into the race."

In the 2008 campaign, presidential candidates face an unusually compressed schedule of early contests. The Iowa caucuses and primaries in New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada unfold over four weeks about a year from now, allowing candidates little margin for error and little time to raise additional money in between those critical contests. In the early contests Obama must do well—probably first or second—to prove his appeal matches the hype.

An adviser to Obama said fundraising proceeds of $50 million "is a kind of ante to this process." Since most political operatives believe that a serious candidate must be collect at least that much by Dec. 31, that translates in to donations of more than $1 million per week, which must by law come in increments of no more than $2,100 per person. Others believe a successful campaign may require more money.

An Obama adviser said the exploratory committee hopes to raise $7 million by the end of March. Under federal election law, an exploratory committee can transfer its assets directly to a presidential campaign.

Most political professionals involved in presidential politics believe that Obama's celebrity and his ability to reach small donors through the Internet position him well to meet the financial challenges ahead. His advisers also expressed optimism that he will be financially competitive.

"I am highly confident," said John Rogers, a friend of Obama and a prodigious Democratic fundraiser for many years. "People around the country who know that I'm engaged in this process have been calling me, people from coast to coast, Republicans and Democrats. They're experienced fundraisers and people wanting to get involved for the first time. I've never seen anything like it."

Despite his renown, Obama's public persona also is an unfinished canvas and he must work to fill that in before his opponents do. The campaign will force him to take more detailed positions on complex issues.

He already is being pressed in uncomfortable ways on his approach to Iraq. While Obama has opposed Bush's increase in troop levels in Iraq, he has not joined those calling for a congressional cut-off of funding for the "surge," while Edwards has demanded just that.

Obama Launches 2008 White House Bid (AP)

By Nedra Pickler
AP, January 17, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama launched a presidential campaign Tuesday that would make him the first black to occupy the White House, and immediately tried to turn his political inexperience into an asset with voters seeking change.

The freshman Illinois senator — and top contender for the Democratic nomination — said the past six years have left the country in a precarious place and he promoted himself as the standard-bearer for a new kind of politics.

"Our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, commonsense way," Obama said in a video posted on his Web site. "Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions. And that's what we have to change first."

Obama filed paperwork forming a presidential exploratory committee that allows him to raise money and put together a campaign structure. He is expected to announce a full-fledged candidacy on Feb. 10 in Springfield, Ill., where he can tout his experience in the state legislature and tap into the legacy of hometown hero Abraham Lincoln.

In a brief interview on Capitol Hill, Obama said the reaction has been positive and added, "we wouldn't have gone forward this far if it hadn't been this positive."

Obama's soft-spoken appeal on the stump, his unique background, his opposition to the Iraq war and his fresh face set him apart in a competitive race that also is expected to include front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Obama has uncommon political talents, drawing adoring crowds even among the studious voters in New Hampshire during a much-hyped visit there last month. His star has risen on the force of his personality and message of hope — helped along by celebrity endorsements from the likes of Oprah Winfrey, billionaire investor Warren Buffett and actors Matt Damon and Edward Norton.

"I certainly didn't expect to find myself in this position a year ago," said Obama, who added that as he talked to Americans about a possible presidential campaign, "I've been struck by how hungry we all are for a different kind of politics."

DOJ_NMG_0117607

The 45-year-old has few accomplishments on the national stage after serving little more than two years in the Senate. But at a time when many voters say they are unhappy with the direction of the country, a lack of experience in the nation's capital may not be a liability.

"The decisions that have been made in Washington these past six years, and the problems that have been ignored, have put our country in a precarious place," Obama said.

He said people are struggling financially, dependence on foreign oil threatens the environment and national security and "we're still mired in a tragic and costly war that should have never been waged."

Clinton is expected to announce her presidential campaign within days, but her spokesman said there would be no comment on Obama's decision from the Clinton camp. Back from Iraq, she abruptly canceled a Capitol Hill news conference minutes after word of Obama's announcement, citing the unavailability of a New York congressman to participate.

Other Democrats who have announced a campaign or exploratory committee are 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich. Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Joe Biden of Delaware and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson also are considering a run.

Obama's decision was relatively low-key after months of hype, with no speech or media appearance to accompany his online announcement. He said he will discuss a presidential campaign with people around the country before his Feb. 10 event, and he wasted no time calling key activists Tuesday.

New Hampshire lobbyist Jim Demers talked with Obama for about five minutes. "He is extremely pumped and excited that this campaign is coming together," said Demers, who accompanied Obama on his visit to the state last month.

Obama's quick rise to national prominence began with his keynote speech at the 2004 Democratic National Convention and his election to the Senate that year. He's written two best-selling autobiographies — "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream" and "Dreams from My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance."

Obama was born in Honolulu, Hawaii, where his parents met while studying at the University of Hawaii. His father was black and from Kenya; his mother, white and from Wichita, Kan.

Obama's parents divorced when he was two and his father returned to Kenya. His mother later married an Indonesian student and the family moved to Jakarta. Obama returned to Hawaii when he was 10 to live with his maternal grandparents.

He graduated from Columbia University and Harvard Law School, where he was the first African-American elected editor of the Harvard Law Review. Obama settled in Chicago, where he joined a law firm, helped local churches establish job training programs and met his future wife, Michelle Robinson. They have two daughters, Malia and Sasha.

In 1996, he was elected to the Illinois state Senate, where he earned a reputation as a consensus-building Democrat who was strongly liberal on social and economic issues, backing gay rights, abortion rights, gun control, universal health care and tax breaks for the poor.

The retirement of Republican Sen. Peter Fitzgerald of Illinois in 2004 drew a raft of candidates to the Democratic primary, but Obama easily outdistanced his competitors. He was virtually assured of victory in the general election when the designated Republican candidate was forced from the race by scandal late in the election.

Obama insisted during the 2004 campaign and through his first year in the Senate that he had no intention of running for president, but by late 2006 his public statements had begun to leave open that possibility.

Obama's Youth Stands As His Greatest Asset And Greatest Weakness (MERCN/MCT)

By Steven Thomma

The San Jose Mercury News, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON - Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's preliminary decision Tuesday to seek the presidency propels him into the top tier for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination and puts him in position to test how much his party and his country hunger for change.

Just 45 years old and two years into his first term in the Senate, Obama brings to the campaign the prospect of a new generation and style of leadership, with less experience in Washington and far fewer ties to the political polarization of the past two decades there.

An Obama campaign also would test whether America is ready for a nonwhite president.

Obama filed papers Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission that allow him to form a committee to raise money and hire staff toward a presidential campaign. He's scheduled a formal announcement of his candidacy for Feb. 10.

In a statement, Obama lamented that "our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, commonsense way. Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions."

Obama's youth and lack of experience in Washington are, at once, among his strongest assets and most glaring weaknesses. Yet while many politicians in similar circumstances invoke the youthful John F. Kennedy, watch for Obama to conjure up a bolder comparison: Abraham Lincoln.

Obama's formal declaration of candidacy will come two days before Lincoln's birthday - in the Illinois state capitol of Springfield, where he and Lincoln both served, rather than his hometown of Chicago. The speech could be in the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln served, though details hadn't been worked out Tuesday.

Obama approaches the campaign with polls showing him in the top ranks of a largely open race for his party's nomination, along with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

Obama is competitive in each of the first four states that are scheduled to vote for a Democratic nominee next year - he's running fourth in Iowa, second in Nevada, second in New Hampshire and third in South Carolina - according to recent polls by the American Research Group.

Clinton leads in all four states, but she commands only about a third of total support. She's expected to declare her intentions soon.

Other announced Democratic candidates include Sens. Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph Biden of Delaware, Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio. New Mexico's Gov. Bill Richardson is expected to announce his candidacy later this month. All score lower in early polls than Clinton, Obama and Edwards.

So far, being the new face with the new message of bipartisan cooperation has helped Obama, particularly as many Democrats have soured on Washington politicians who endorsed the Iraq war at the outset and might be portrayed as too ingrained in Washington to change.

Indeed, Obama sought Tuesday to use his short time in Washington to his advantage, distancing himself from the partisan politics that many Americans despise and subtly criticizing fellow Democrats for going along. It also was noteworthy that he didn't criticize President Bush by name, a staple of Democratic politics.

He'd disappointed some Democrats when he appeared Sunday on CBS's "Face the Nation" and sidestepped questions about whether he'd support cutting off money to force an end to the Iraq war.

"He wasn't very good," said an Illinois Democrat who's supporting Obama and asked for anonymity because he was criticizing him. "Too cautious. He's starting to sound too much like a senator."

Obama also faces other challenges and questions, including his race and how he'd flesh out his national agenda.

Traditional politics in America would argue that the son of a white woman from Kansas and a black man from Kenya still faces skepticism, if not hostility.

Yet in an age when Tiger Woods leads pro golf, Oprah Winfrey dominates the airwaves, and Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice take turns as the country's chief diplomat, those barriers might be falling. And Obama could appeal to many Americans eager to show that they and their country have moved beyond racism, especially since he presents himself as a leader determined to move beyond conventional political divisions.

While Obama doesn't shy from his heritage, he doesn't want to be marginalized as a "black candidate" who appeals primarily to black voters.

That's part of the rationale for launching his campaign in Springfield, according to Illinois Democrats who spoke on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to speak for the campaign.

A speech on the South Side of Chicago could draw an overwhelmingly black audience. A Springfield event would draw a more diverse group.

Those pushing for Springfield gave two other reasons:

_It would draw attention to Obama's seven years in the Illinois Senate before his election to the U.S. Senate. His campaign aides have found that focus groups of voters were favorably impressed with his time in the Illinois legislature, a possible counter to complaints that his two years in Congress leave him too inexperienced.

_It could invite comparisons to Lincoln, who served eight years in the Illinois legislature. And Lincoln served only two years in Congress, two less than Obama will have served by Inauguration Day 2009.

Obama May Test Voter Discontent (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

With his first official step toward a run for the presidency, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama now will test just how eager voters are, in the wake of his Democratic Party's recent takeover of Congress, to further shake up Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0117609

Mr. Obama's low-key announcement on his Web site Tuesday that he had formed a presidential exploratory committee followed months of celebrity buzz and crowds at his appearances across the country. For many in his party, and some independents, the freshman senator has come to personify a hopeful prospect of change from the polarizing politics of recent years.

Yet he has vaulted near the top in presidential polls, threatening longtime front-runner Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York, who is expected to enter the race soon; 2004 vice-presidential nominee John Edwards and other Democratic aspirants, without a clear sense of his own policy agenda, and in spite of the question of whether Americans will elect a black candidate to the nation's highest office.

Mr. Obama, raised by his white mother from Kansas but the namesake son of a Kenyan father he hardly knew, seeks to be the first African-American nominee of a major party, let alone president. At 45 years old, he also must overcome doubts whether he is too green to be commander-in-chief of a nation at war, after two years in the U.S. Senate and eight years as a state senator. While his current popularity transcends those questions of race and credentials, they are certain to figure in a presidential campaign.

TESTING THE WATERS

• What's New: Sen. Barack Obama sets up an exploratory committee, first step in possible presidential run.

• The Issue: The Democrat's message of change resonates with many, but will voters elect a president of his race and relative inexperience?

• What's Next: Final decision on running will come Feb. 10.

With the first nominating contests a year away, the senator said he would announce a final decision about his candidacy in Springfield, Ill., on Feb. 10 -- Abraham Lincoln's birthday weekend. Meanwhile, his video announcement on his Web site Tuesday previewed how anti-Washington an Obama campaign would be.

"The decisions that have been made in Washington these past six years, and the problems that have been ignored, have put our country in a precarious place," Mr. Obama said, citing families' struggles with health care, pensions and college costs, the nation's dependence on foreign oil and "a tragic and costly war that should have never been waged." But, he continued, "it's not the magnitude of our problems that concerns me the most. It's the smallness of our politics."

Democratic strategist Stephanie Cutter, a top adviser to Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign and now neutral in Democrats' 2008 contest, said Mr. Obama is "perfectly positioned to run against Washington," and that theme also serves "to defuse the experience argument" against him.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a veteran of Bill Clinton's campaigns who helped engineer Democrats' congressional victories last fall, said the potential candidacy of Mr. Obama, his fellow Chicagoan, reflects the first "truly grass-roots draft" he's ever seen. "It should be a wake-up call to the party establishment in both parties."

WSJ's John Harwood discusses2 Democratic Sen. Barack Obama's initial steps in a presidential bid.

Seeking to explain Mr. Obama's appeal, Mr. Emanuel, who also remains uncommitted, said, "Every president is an answer to their predecessor in some capacity. If you think, as I do, that George Bush is the most divisive president in recent memory, Barack as a force for unity is a perfect antidote to the Bush years."

Republicans have their own take. Todd Harris, who worked on Arizona Sen. John McCain's 2000 presidential campaign, said, "I think what he represents is the fact that the rank-and-file of the Democrats' base is hungry for a fresh face, and has little or no confidence in the current crop of Democratic contenders" -- "Hillary and the Has-beens," he called them.

In his video, Mr. Obama nodded to the "media hype" and political pressures that propelled him toward the 2008 race. "I certainly didn't expect to find myself in this position a year ago," he said.

He first gained national notice as keynote speaker at the 2004 Democratic convention, recounting his father's dreams and his own rise as a tribute to America: "In no other country on Earth is my story even possible." What has come to be called "Obama-mania" really took off this fall, as the senator drew crowds on a national tour promoting his book "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream" and at campaign stops for Democratic congressional candidates.

Scenes of jostling fans were reminiscent of the early days of Republican Sen. McCain's 2000 presidential campaign, when he was running as an anti-Washington maverick. Mr. McCain ultimately was beaten by the money and party-establishment muscle of then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush, as well as by media scrutiny -- the sorts of pressures Mr. Obama faces. "The snows of Iowa and New Hampshire have a way of dulling even the brightest star," Mr. Harris said.

Obama Raises Stakes For Democrats (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Barack Obama's decision to take the first formal step toward running for president marks an extraordinarily rapid rise in politics — and sets up a high-stakes competition for campaign money, staff and supporters with the presumed front-runner for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Obama's announcement Tuesday that he had established a presidential exploratory committee opens the door to a marquee race offering the most serious test yet of whether the nation is ready to elect a black or female president.

Having served barely two years in the Senate, Obama also is testing a sturdy piece of conventional political wisdom after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks: that voters are wary of electing a president who might need on-the-job training in foreign policy.

The Illinois Democrat, 45, is gambling that voters will see his lack of national governing experience as an asset, not a liability, at a time when the electorate is seething with discontent with the Washington establishment.

"I am struck by how hungry we all are for a different kind of politics," Obama said in his announcement Tuesday. "The decisions that have been made in Washington these past six years, and the problems that have been ignored, have put us in a precarious place." In a sign of the importance of the Internet to political campaigning, Obama made his announcement not in a public appearance but in an e-mail statement and a video posted on his website.

A charismatic speaker with an unusual life story, Obama has been enthusiastically received by audiences around the country as he has traveled to promote his latest book and, increasingly, to sound out voters in states with early presidential primaries and caucuses.

His announcement steps up pressure on Clinton to formally launch her own campaign, a move that is expected soon. Howard Wolfson, a senior Clinton advisor, declined to comment on Obama but said, "Sen. Clinton has a strong case to make for her own candidacy, and is going to have to make the best case for herself."

The combined star power and national fame of Clinton and Obama threaten to siphon off vast amounts of money and attention from lesser-known candidates in the crowded Democratic field.

Obama already is competing with Clinton for donors in California, the No. 1 source of money for Democrats. So far, he has been popular among major donors.

San Francisco lawyer Jeffrey L. Bleich, who raises money in the Bay Area for Obama, said contributors "feel like you've done them a favor by inviting them" to a reception for the Illinois senator — far from the norm in fundraising.

That surge of enthusiasm, which could easily fade, has caught the attention of Clinton advisors.

"He's going to have an effect on our fundraising — no question about it," said Sim Farar, a major Clinton fundraiser in Los Angeles. "But at the end of the day, we will raise enough money for Hillary's campaign."

Clinton, who hired Los Angeles fundraiser Diane Hamwi on Sunday to oversee her West Coast effort, has a huge head start.

As of last month, she had $14.4 million in campaign money in the bank; Obama had $756,000. Drawing on her husband's White House fundraising network, the former first lady expects support from many Democratic heavyweights, including supermarket magnate Ron Burkle and Hollywood moguls Haim Saban and Stephen L. Bing.

Despite that "amazing machine," said Margery Tabankin, a top Hollywood political consultant, Clinton faces resistance from some donors over her early support for the war in Iraq, which Obama opposed.

Hollywood donors expect music and film tycoon David Geffen, a major supporter of Bill Clinton when he was president, to play a role in Obama's effort to raise money from the entertainment industry.

Film producer Lawrence Bender, another major fundraiser who often holds receptions for presidential candidates at his Holmby Hills house, said he would raise money for Obama, and possibly for other Democrats running for president.

In Silicon Valley, Obama has sparked interest among venture capitalists and high-tech donors, said Katie Merrill, a Democratic strategist in the Bay Area. "It's something the Clinton campaign should take notice of," she said.

Noah Mamet, a Los Angeles consultant who has raised money for many Democrats, said California's overall importance for the 2008 White House contenders will be heightened by Clinton's automatic edge among donors in New York, where she can largely box out her rivals.

"California — and in particular Los Angeles — is going to be the biggest battle for fundraising on the Democratic side," he said.

Another Democratic candidate challenged by Obama's entry is former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the Democrats' vice presidential nominee in 2004, who has been trying to position himself as the leading alternative to Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0117611

Other announced Democratic candidates include Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. Also considering White House bids are Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

By establishing an exploratory committee, Obama can begin raising money and assembling staff for a formal campaign. He said he would announce his final decision about running on Feb. 10 in Illinois. Sources close to him say it is all but certain he will be a candidate.

The son of a black Kenyan father and a white American mother, Barack Hussein Obama was born in 1961 in Hawaii. He is a graduate of Columbia University and Harvard Law School, where he was the first black president of the Law Review. He settled in Chicago to practice law and also worked as a community organizer. Married since 1992, he and his wife have two daughters.

Obama was elected to the Illinois state Senate in 1996, where he served until he ran for the U.S. Senate in 2004.

The little-known lawmaker was catapulted to national prominence when he gave an acclaimed speech at the 2004 Democratic convention. During the 2006 campaign, he was widely sought by Democratic candidates for appearances on the stump.

Obama lacks the deep roots other candidates have cultivated in states with early primaries and caucuses, such as Iowa — where Edwards has been leading in many polls — and New Hampshire. Still, he drew huge crowds during his first trip to New Hampshire, in December.

Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster who is not allied with any particular candidate, said concern about Obama's inexperience may be eclipsed by a more powerful political force — voters' hunger for change, in evidence in the 2006 midterm election.

"People want something new and different, and there is nobody in this contest who can better lay claim to being new and different than Barack Obama," Mellman said.

Now, Obama will face heightened scrutiny that may spotlight less-flattering aspects of his past. In his first book, Obama acknowledged that he experimented with cocaine and marijuana in his youth.

His record also will get closer scrutiny. He has a traditionally liberal voting history — supporting gay rights, abortion rights and gun control. The only vote in 2006 with which he opposed the liberal Americans for Democratic Action was in supporting a free-trade agreement with Oman.

A Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll in December indicated that Obama's race and Clinton's gender were not major liabilities. Four percent of registered voters polled said they would not vote for a woman for president; 3% said they would not vote for an African American.

Obama has been a harsher critic of the war in Iraq than Clinton has. Although he was not in the U.S. Senate in 2002, when Clinton voted to authorize the invasion of Iraq, Obama at the time spoke out against the war.

Now, both Obama and Clinton are opposing Bush's proposal to increase troop levels in Iraq, but Clinton has been more moderate in her tone. Neither has supported efforts to cut off funding to tie Bush's hands.

Obama Jumps Into Presidential Fray (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, whose best-selling books and political travels generated huge pressure to run for the White House, joined a crowded Democratic field yesterday, vowing to advance "a different kind of politics" in a campaign that could make him the nation's first African American president.

Obama, a state legislator just three years ago, announced that he has formed a presidential exploratory committee, accelerating his already rapid emergence in national politics and establishing him as his party's most formidable rival to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, the Democratic front-runner.

Obama, 45, portrayed his youth and short tenure in Congress as an asset in a statement distributed via Web video and e-mail. "Today, our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, common sense way," the senator declared. "Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions."

But it is Obama's ethnic profile and life story that set him apart. His late father was a black Kenyan, his mother the white daughter of a Kansas farmer. Obama was born in Hawaii, lived in Indonesia in his youth and was the first African American to be elected Harvard Law Review president. His autobiography, "Dreams From My Father," was published in 1995, nine years before his keynote address electrified the Democratic National Convention in Boston. Another book, "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream," has been a bestseller since it was published in October.

"This is an opportunity for a new generation of leaders to step forward to remake America," said Senate Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin, the senior senator from Illinois and a key Obama ally. Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), another up-and-coming black lawmaker, called Obama "the kind of unique transformational candidate who surfaces once in a generation."

Obama and Clinton are considered the leaders of the Democratic field, but they have plenty of company. Former senator John Edwards (N.C.), the party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, has already announced his candidacy. Others who are lining up include Sens. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) and Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack. Former vice president Al Gore could jump in, as could Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), who narrowly lost the presidential election in 2004.

Obama is expected to spend the next several weeks fundraising, with no trips to early primary or caucus states. Unlike the other candidates except Clinton, Obama should have little trouble raising the $50 million to $100 million necessary to compete in the four states -- Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina -- that will vote in January 2008.

During last year's midterm elections, Obama barnstormed the country for Democratic congressional and gubernatorial candidates, collecting more than $4.5 million for his political action committee and building up a national network of donors. He has also built support among the "Net roots" -- the loose affiliation of progressive bloggers and activists who provided much of the financing for former Vermont governor Howard Dean's 2004 presidential campaign.

After he was elected to the Senate, Obama vowed to serve out his term. But he opened the door to a 2008 presidential campaign during an appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press" in October, saying that, "given the response I've been getting," he would consider the possibility after the midterm elections.

Despite all the hype about his potential candidacy, some of Obama's closest associates worry that the senator remains untested. After winning a tough Senate primary in 2004, he sailed through the general election, aided by a Republican nominee with extensive personal travails. "There will be bumps; there always are," said one senior Obama adviser, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "He's going to have to manage expectations and show he has the strength and endurance for the long haul."

In yesterday's statement, Obama said that his campaign will emphasize traditional Democratic goals such as lowering health-care costs, providing college-tuition assistance and developing new energy sources. He only briefly mentioned the Iraq war, the issue that could well drive the 2008 election. "We're still mired in a tragic and costly war that should never have been waged," Obama said.

His Iraq views are complicated and could require some tricky navigation in the months ahead. The Senate authorized the war in the fall of 2002, two years before Obama was elected. But although he opposed the conflict from the beginning, he has not endorsed a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops, a position forcefully advocated by Edwards.

According to his Senate Web site, Obama supports "a phased redeployment of American troops to signal to the government and people of Iraq that ours is not an open-ended commitment." But his unwillingness to set a date has infuriated war opponents, who also fumed last year over Obama's support for the reelection campaign of Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), one of President Bush's strongest allies on Iraq. The Web site Antiwar.com called him "O-bomb-a."

Last week, Obama was quick to criticize Bush's plan to deploy an additional 21,500 troops in Iraq, comparing the move to that of a gambler who increases his bet in a bid to cover his losses. Yet he has refused to back a proposal by some Democrats to require congressional authorization before additional troops are sent to Iraq.

"We need to look at what options do we have available to constrain the president, to hopefully right the course that we are on right now, but to do so in a way that makes sure that the troops that are on the ground have all the equipment and the resources they need to fulfill their mission and come home safely," Obama said Sunday on CBS's "Face the Nation."

In most matters before the Senate, Obama has maintained a relatively low profile, tending to home-state concerns while promoting narrow causes such as congressional ethics reform, an issue now being debated on the Senate floor. Last year, Senate Democratic leaders asked Obama to help lead the reform charge, and he responded with proposals that went further than many of his colleagues had wanted to go.

While Obama paints himself as a reform-minded outsider, the small group of senior advisers who will guide his campaign -- should he pursue it -- are longtime Washington hands.

Nearly two-thirds of the Obama inner circle has political roots in the offices of then-Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) or then-Sen. Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.). His staff's long experience in state and national politics should help Obama to compensate for his lack of campaign experience. He has made only a few cursory stops in Iowa, for example, where the first votes of the presidential race are likely to be cast on Jan. 14, 2008, but he has signed up Steve Hildebrand, who ran the Iowa caucus campaign of then-Vice President Al Gore in 2000, and Paul Tewes, Hildebrand's second-in-command in that campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0117613

In New Hampshire, Obama drew a rock-star reception during a Dec. 9 visit. Jim Demers, a longtime party activist who squired Obama around the state for the day, said that his phone has not stopped ringing since, with people seeking to work for the campaign. "People here are excited to see and hear him," said Demers, who said he may volunteer himself.

Remember Lincoln, Obama Allies Say (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

For all those historians and political naysayers, Sen. Barack Obama's allies like to point out that Abraham Lincoln served just two years in the House before becoming president.

It's a comparison certain to be repeated as Obama, with slightly more than two years in the Senate, continues to align himself with the Civil War president. The senator's expected campaign kickoff is scheduled for Feb. 10 in Lincoln's hometown of Springfield, Ill. — where both men served in the state legislature.

Obama filed paperwork for a presidential exploratory committee Tuesday, which allows him to raise money and organize a campaign structure before his formal announcement. He also talked about his plans in a video on his Web site.

If elected, he would be an obvious subject for the history books — the first black president.

Obama said the past six years have left the country in a precarious place and he promoted himself as the standard-bearer for a new kind of politics.

"Our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, commonsense way," Obama said in a video posted on his Web site. "Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions. And that's what we have to change first."

Obama's soft-spoken appeal on the stump, his unique background, his opposition to the Iraq war and his fresh face set him apart in a competitive race that also is expected to include front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Obama has uncommon political talents, drawing adoring crowds even among the studious voters in New Hampshire during a much-hyped visit there last month. His star has risen on the force of his personality and message of hope — helped along by celebrity endorsements from the likes of Oprah Winfrey, billionaire investor Warren Buffett and actors Matt Damon and Edward Norton.

"I certainly didn't expect to find myself in this position a year ago," said Obama, who added that as he talked to Americans about a possible presidential campaign, "I've been struck by how hungry we all are for a different kind of politics."

The 45-year-old has few accomplishments on the national stage after serving little more than two years in the Senate. But at a time when many voters say they are unhappy with the direction of the country, a lack of experience in the nation's capital may not be a liability.

"The decisions that have been made in Washington these past six years, and the problems that have been ignored, have put our country in a precarious place," Obama said.

He said people are struggling financially, dependence on foreign oil threatens the environment and national security and "we're still mired in a tragic and costly war that should have never been waged."

Clinton is expected to announce her presidential campaign within days, but her spokesman said there would be no comment on Obama's decision from the Clinton camp. Back from Iraq, she abruptly canceled a Capitol Hill news conference minutes after word of Obama's announcement, citing the unavailability of a New York congressman to participate.

Other Democrats who have announced a campaign or exploratory committee are 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich. Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Joe Biden of Delaware and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson also are considering a run.

Obama's decision was relatively low-key after months of hype, with no speech or media appearance to accompany his online announcement. He said he will discuss a presidential campaign with people around the country before his Feb. 10 event, and he wasted no time calling key activists Tuesday.

New Hampshire lobbyist Jim Demers talked with Obama for about five minutes. "He is extremely pumped and excited that this campaign is coming together," said Demers, who accompanied Obama on his visit to the state last month.

Obama's quick rise to national prominence began with his keynote speech at the 2004 Democratic National Convention and his election to the Senate that year. He's written two best-selling autobiographies — "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream" and "Dreams from My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance."

Obama was born in Honolulu where his parents met while studying at the University of Hawaii. His father was black and from Kenya; his mother, white and from Wichita, Kan.

DOJ_NMG_0117614

Obama's parents divorced when he was two and his father returned to Kenya. His mother later married an Indonesian student and the family moved to Jakarta. Obama returned to Hawaii when he was 10 to live with his maternal grandparents.

He graduated from Columbia University and Harvard Law School, where he was the first black elected editor of the Harvard Law Review. Obama settled in Chicago, where he joined a law firm, helped local churches establish job training programs and met his future wife, Michelle Robinson. They have two daughters, Malia and Sasha.

In 1996, he was elected to the Illinois state Senate. He won a seat in the U.S. Senate in 2004.

Obama insisted during the 2004 campaign and through his first year in the Senate that he had no intention of running for president, but by late 2006 his public statements had begun to leave open that possibility.

Much Buzz, Many Questions Over Barack Obama's Bid (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 17, 2007

For the first time in American history, a black man is stepping toward a presidential run with the potential to win his party's nomination – and even the presidency itself.

Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois filed papers Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission, establishing an exploratory committee that allows him to raise funds toward a possible presidential campaign. But the jolt of electricity even this step sent through the political world was enough to light up Chicago for the rest of the day.

Speculation that Senator Obama might run has raged for weeks, and so the announcement comes as little surprise. But the confirmation that the charismatic young senator with the exotic heritage has now entered the "money primary" raises a series of crucial questions: With only two years in the Senate, does he have enough experience to persuade voters that he's ready to be the most powerful person in the world? Can he topple the presumed front-runner for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York? Can he and his young family withstand the intense public scrutiny any top-tier candidate must endure?

And is America ready to elect its first black president?

Obama's new website, BarackObama.com, says the senator will announce his decision on whether to run Feb. 10 in Chicago. In a video statement released Tuesday morning on his site, Obama tried to capture the gravity of the choice he faces.

"Running for the presidency is a profound decision – a decision no one should make on the basis of media hype or personal ambition alone – and so before I committed myself and my family to this race, I wanted to be sure that this was right for us, and more importantly, right for the country," Obama said.

What he's really testing, political analysts say, is the strength of his fundraising ability. To make a serious play for a major-party nomination, a candidate needs to raise tens of millions of dollars in the next few months – a task that Senator Clinton should accomplish easily.

It's hot in the media's glare

But, too, the Illinois Democrat may begin to see the downside of being a media darling. In his latest book, "The Audacity of Hope," he describes President Bush warning him just after he joined the Senate about life in the spotlight – especially for a senator who practically waltzed into his seat (after his competition imploded). The media are notorious for building people up, only to tear them down.

So far, Obama has faced criticism over a questionable deal he made in the purchase of his home in Chicago, a transaction he later called "boneheaded." In his first book, "Dreams From My Father" – published in 1995 after he was elected the first African-American president of the Harvard Law Review – he admits to using marijuana and cocaine in his youth, another point that could diminish his appeal among some donors and voters.

But the more central questions he faces involve his readiness for the presidency and the public's comfort level with his identity. With the nation at war, he will have to convince voters that he is prepared to step into the commander in chief role with a plan that satisfies, first, the vehemently antiwar Democratic base and then, if nominated, the general electorate.

In a way, his limited tenure in the Senate could work to his advantage. Only two Americans have ever made the leap directly from the Senate to the White House: Warren Harding and John Kennedy. More often, senators who try to run for president (and sooner or later, many of them do) get caught up in tangled legislative language that does not play well in a campaign.

But his biggest advantage could be his persona – young, attractive, articulate, a fresh face.

"He's a dynamic speaker; he's got charisma that engages people," says independent pollster Del Ali. "He's similar to [Bill] Clinton, similar to [Ronald] Reagan in that respect, similar to Kennedy."

DOJ_NMG_0117615

As a member of the Illinois state Senate, before his election to the US Senate, he wowed the arena with his keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in 2004. And his personal background provides the classic "log cabin" story on which presidential politics thrives. The son of a white woman from Kansas and a black man from Kenya, Obama was raised mostly in Hawaii. In his first book, he laid out his struggle to come to terms with his mixed-race heritage and absent father, who left the family when Barack was 2 years old.

His name an obstacle?

It may be that his unusual name – including the middle name Hussein – proves trickier than his color in bringing Americans to a comfort level that would win their votes. Unlike past African-American presidential candidates, such as Jesse Jackson, he does not come from the civil rights movement of the 1960s, but rather represents the new face of black politics: pinstriped suits and an Ivy League pedigree.

"He seems to transcend the race issue to a degree," says Bruce Buchanan, a presidential scholar at the University of Texas, Austin. But on policy, he adds, Obama is "going to be under a lot of pressure to come up with lots of answers to lots of questions."

The Big Question About Barack Obama (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, January 17, 2007

CHICAGO — Two years in the U.S. Senate. Seven years in the Illinois Senate. One loss in a primary election for the U.S. House of Representatives. One stirring keynote address at a Democratic National Convention. Two best-selling books.

That's Barack Obama's political résumé. Is it enough to qualify him to be president?

Sure, says Carol Hood, Democratic Party chairman in Calhoun County, Iowa. "Anymore, that might be a good factor," she says. "He doesn't have a lot of people he owes things to."

Probably not, says Matt Pearson, Democratic Party chairman in Buena Vista County, Iowa. "He could use a little more experience," he says. "A lot of the people I know say they really like him, but just don't think it's his time yet."

Obama said Tuesday that this could be his time to run for the Democratic presidential nomination.

"I certainly didn't expect to find myself in this position a year ago," Obama, 45, said in a statement released as he created a presidential exploratory committee. "But as I've spoken to many of you in my travels … I've been struck by how hungry we all are for a different kind of politics."

Obama's personal story, eloquence and hopeful approach to politics have made the only black in the U.S. Senate a top prospective 2008 candidate. When a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll asked Democrats and independents who lean toward Democratic candidates to choose among 15 presidential prospects last weekend, 18% said they would be most likely to support Obama. He ranked second to New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the choice of 29%, and ahead of Al Gore, the 2000 presidential nominee; John Kerry, the 2004 nominee; and Kerry's running mate, John Edwards.

Edwards was a presidential candidate before he became Kerry's running mate in 2004. During his campaign, Edwards, who served one Senate term, also faced the experience issue.

"Of course" Obama will have to answer similar questions, Edwards told USA TODAY in December. "Just as I did and will, and as anybody else who wants to be president of the United States will have to do," Edwards said. "The test applies to all of us."

Obama wouldn't be the youngest presidential nominee or chief executive. William Jennings Bryan was 36 when he first became a Democratic nominee. John F. Kennedy was 43 when he was elected. Theodore Roosevelt was 42 when he was sworn in after the assassination of William McKinley.

Nor would Obama be the least experienced nominee or president. Wendell Wilkie had never been elected to any office before he became the Republican presidential nominee in 1940. Woodrow Wilson had been New Jersey's governor for two years when he was elected in 1912. George W. Bush served six years as Texas governor before being elected president.

Still, some Democrats say they need a more seasoned nominee who's prepared to tackle foreign policy issues such as the war in Iraq and dangerous relationships with Iran and North Korea.

Obama's inexperience is "the big question mark" about his candidacy, says Rep. Beth Arsenault, a Democrat who was just elected to the New Hampshire Legislature.

"It's not a deal-stopper necessarily," she says, "but two years in the Senate? It's not a lot."

The campaign crucible

David Axelrod, Obama's political strategist, says presidential campaigns aren't ultimately about candidates' job histories.

DOJ_NMG_0117616

"Campaigns themselves are a gantlet in which you get tested," he says. "People get to see how you handle pressure and how you react to complicated questions. It's an imperfect and sometimes maddening system, but at the end of the day it works, because you have to be tough and smart and skilled to survive that process."

Some legislators who worked with Obama in the Illinois Senate say he proved he can overcome gaps in experience with his ability to quickly grasp complicated issues.

Republican Sen. Kirk Dillard, who took office in 1993, says he gravitated to Obama when the rookie arrived in Springfield in 1997.

"Sen. Obama was someone who I thought — and I was right — could tackle extremely complex things like ethics reform, the death penalty or racial profiling by law enforcement," Dillard says.

Obama was "a full partner" in drafting and passing the state's first major ethics law in 25 years, Dillard says. Obama also helped pass laws requiring that police interrogations and confessions in capital cases be videotaped and creating a state earned-income tax credit.

Such successes are rare, "especially in a rough-and-tumble place driven by seniority like Illinois is," he says.

State Sen. Donne Trotter, a Democrat, says Obama is "a quick read, a quick study."

Obama's tenure as a constitutional lawyer, he says, "prepares him to learn the intricacies and nuances of what the federal government is all about."

Trotter watched the newcomer research a universal health care system, educate other senators and become the architect of the legislation. Obama "is a reader, a learner of different approaches and philosophies," he says. "He has the brainpower to absorb the facts … and make good decisions."

'Managed to get it right on Iraq'

Obama has proved that, Axelrod says, with one decision that sets him apart from other possible Democratic presidential candidates, including Clinton: His opposition from the start to the war in Iraq. "However many gray hairs he has, he managed to get it right on Iraq," Axelrod told Chicago's WTTW-TV last week.

Experience doesn't guarantee success in the White House, historians and political scientists say.

Lyndon Johnson had a long career in Congress before becoming president, but history considers his White House record mixed because of the Vietnam War, says Dean Spiliotes, a political scientist at St. Anselm College in Manchester, N.H. Phil Gramm was a veteran senator and Lamar Alexander a former governor and Cabinet member when they ran for president in 1996, but neither won the Republican nomination, he notes.

"What really matters is your temperament and your ability to make good decisions," Spiliotes says. Voters, he says, "make their decision at a very intuitive, gut level. … They have a mental checklist of what a president looks like, sounds like and acts like."

Richard Norton Smith, a historian who has run several presidential libraries and museums, says it would be better "for Obama's sake, not to mention for the country's" if he had more experience. It would also be better if the campaign season were long enough for voters to fully gauge his character and aptitude for the presidency, Smith says.

As Obama's supporters often point out, Lincoln was a former member of the Illinois Legislature who had served briefly in Congress before becoming president. But the parallels in the men's careers are no indication of success for Obama, Smith says. Sometimes the election of inexperienced candidates whose charisma is their greatest asset "produced great presidents, and sometimes it produced decidedly mediocre ones," he says.

Nicole Schilling, chairman of the Democratic Party in Greene County, Iowa, says Obama's lack of a long political record will work to his advantage. "Some people are saying he's young, he needs to wait," she says. "I think it's going to work to his advantage here. … He's kind of a blank slate, and people are projecting what they think onto him."

'Not your Mayflower Americans'

Obama's experience is broader than his time in elected office. He was a community organizer in Chicago and led voter-registration drives. He taught constitutional law at the University of Chicago. He lived for a time in Indonesia, a Muslim country. He has traveled to the Middle East, Africa and Iraq.

"He has lived abroad and has relatives who are certainly not your Mayflower Americans and understands different cultures," Dillard says. "Many presidents with foreign-policy experience have not lived firsthand the type of life that Barack has."

None of the Democratic activists interviewed about Obama's chances suggested that his ethnicity matters, and the fact that he is black has not been a dominant factor in his campaigns.

In his 2006 book, The Audacity of Hope, he wrote that "white guilt has largely exhausted itself in America" and said it's not always easy for black politicians "to gauge the right tone to take — Too angry? Not angry enough? — when discussing the enormous hardships facing his or her constituents."

DOJ_NMG_0117617

Obama's rawness has sometimes been evident since he went to Washington.

Last year, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., sent Obama a biting letter accusing the Illinois senator of playing partisan politics in wrangling over an overhaul of ethics rules. "I concluded your professed concern for the institution and the public interest was genuine and admirable. Thank you for disabusing me of such notions," McCain, a likely Republican presidential candidate in 2008, wrote to Obama. The two later reconciled.

At a town meeting last year in Wheeling, Ill., Obama was asked by a youngster what he would do if someone gave him $1 billion. First, Obama said he'd pay off his mortgage and give the rest to his wife. He thought a moment and revised his reply, adding that he'd give "most of it" to charity. Then he said he'd put "several hundred million into buying mosquito nets" to prevent malaria in Africa.

In The Audacity of Hope, Obama wrote about his ambition. He describes his failed 2000 campaign for Congress as a consequence of "restlessness." He described feeling "envy of seeing younger politicians succeed where I had failed, moving into higher offices, getting more things done."

Obama also wrote about his distaste for "the meaner tasks" of politics: "the begging for money, the long drives home after the banquet had run two hours longer than scheduled, the bad food and stale air and clipped phone conversations with a wife … who was pretty fed up with raising our children alone and was beginning to question my priorities."

Last fall, Obama sounded like a man planning to run for president in an interview with Men's Vogue. "My attitude about something like the presidency is that you don't want to just be the president," he said. "You want to change the country. You want to make a unique contribution. You want to be a great president."

Mell Brooks, Democratic chairman in Littleton, N.H., says he thinks Obama can achieve that goal despite his inexperience.

"No doubt 20 years' experience is better than 10," he says." For some individuals, it might well be a drawback, but it depends on the intellect, the knowledge and the ability of the candidate," he says. "For Obama, inexperience is not a big drawback."

Obama's Decision Puts Heat On Kerry (BOSH)

By Emma Ratliff

Boston Herald, January 17, 2007

Barack Obama seized the presidential spotlight yesterday as he announced the creation of a committee to explore a White House run, putting more heat on John Kerry to decide whether he'll stay on the sidelines or step onto the stage.

"Barack is seen as a rock star. People see him as an idol," said Morgan Felchner, editor of Campaigns and Elections magazine. "Kerry needs to get in soon."

The popular U.S. senator from Illinois was in Manchester, N.H., in December for a national Democratic victory tour after the midterm elections, a celebration that drew almost 1,700 people.

"He really impressed everyone in the crowd. Speaking to 1,700 people he was still very personable," said Joan Ashwell, chairman of the Strafford County Democratic Committee in New Hampshire. "Kerry's gotta get in there pretty soon. John Kerry has a lot of support in New Hampshire."

Kerry (D-Mass) has said he will announce in the near future whether he will make another presidential bid next year or opt to run for re-election to the Senate.

Obama, a 45-year-old who is little more than two years into his Senate term, rose rapidly to national prominence when he gave the keynote speech at the 2004 Democratic National Convention in Boston as Kerry was nominated. But his lack of a track record in government and foreign policy makes him little more than a celebrity name to many voters.

"Our leaders in Washington seem incapable of working together in a practical, commonsense way," Obama said in a video posted on his Web site. "Politics has become so bitter and partisan."

Despite Kerry's 2004 New Hampshire primary win, activists say he must lay new groundwork if he wants to wage another campaign. "Right now since there is not any mudslinging, it would help for him to get in sooner rather than later," said Felchner.

With Obama taking a step closer to the race, New Hampshire Democrats are waiting for the next big name to make a move. "Hillary hasn't been here, and rumor has it she will be here before long," Ashwell said.

Other Democrats who have announced a campaign or exploratory committee are Kerry's 2004 running mate and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich.

Obama Signals 2008 Run For President (BSUN)

By Paul West

DOJ_NMG_0117618

The Baltimore Sun, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Barack Obama, bidding to become the first African-American to win a major-party presidential nomination, signaled his entry into the 2008 presidential contest Tuesday.

The Illinois Democrat, who joins the race near the top of a crowded field, made it clear that he would run as an outsider. In a brief online video announcement, he used the word change five times, criticized Washington's bitter partisanship and cast his decision to form an exploratory committee as a response to those "hungry for a different kind of politics."

Obama, who is expected to formally declare his candidacy next month, starts out as a serious contender in a nomination chase so top-heavy with talent that it has relegated a number of well-regarded and more experienced candidates to secondary status -- or forced them to quit altogether -- more than a year before the first primary vote has been cast.

Party strategists said Obama's strength in early polling and his fundraising potential exceed those of most other '08 Democrats. But the liberal senator faces a number of hurdles, including a lack of seasoning as a presidential campaigner and a still-undefined national image.

"His biggest challenge will be to show he has gravitas," said Kenneth Baer, a Democratic strategist, and to avoid being defined in negative terms by his opponents or the news media. "Nobody knows his record. Nobody really knows the Illinois Senate record, and believe me, all of that will be coming out in bucketfuls."

A biographic video, posted Tuesday on Obama's campaign Web site, tried to fill in some of the blanks. It indicated, for example, that Obama plans to emphasize the "results" he achieved during two terms as an state legislator on issues such as the death penalty, racial profiling and welfare reform.

The formal declaration of his candidacy is set for Feb. 10 in Springfield, the Illinois capital -- distancing himself, in geographic terms, from the old-fashioned politics of Chicago, where Obama makes his home; but cozying up to the legend of Abraham Lincoln as well as offering a chance to promote his record as a state senator.

Democrats active in other campaigns, or watching from the sidelines, said Obama's candidacy poses a significant threat to the other leading candidates, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and former Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee from North Carolina.

Clinton, widely regarded as the early front-runner, is counting on support from African-Americans, who strongly backed her husband, Bill, in his two presidential runs and who historically cast about one of every four votes in Democratic primaries.

"Now, all of a sudden, she has a competitor," said Democratic pollster Paul Maslin, an adviser to Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, who abandoned the 2008 race last month shortly after being out shone in New Hampshire by Obama.

Maslin, who advised a Democratic rival in Obama's 2004 Senate primary campaign, said early polls in that contest showed Obama getting only about half the black vote. He wound up taking 85 percent, once it became clear that he had a serious chance to win.

Edwards, a vocal anti-war candidate since renouncing his Senate vote to authorize force against Iraq, is running well in Iowa, which holds the first delegate contest. But Obama, from neighboring Illinois, is the only major candidate in the Democratic field who opposed the war from the start.

"We're still mired in a tragic and costly war that should have never been waged," said Obama, appearing tieless in his video announcement, whose low-key tone and informal setting appeared designed to convey an image of a new and different type of politician.

"It's not the magnitude of our problems that concerns me the most," he said. "It's the smallness of our politics."

He criticized "our leaders in Washington" who "seem incapable of working together in a practical, common-sense way. Politics has become so bitter and partisan, so gummed up by money and influence, that we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions."

Anita Dunn, who has advised Obama's political action committee but is currently neutral in the 2008 contest, noted that he has never had to face tough competition in a campaign before.

A presidential campaign "is like climbing Mount Everest," she said. "People start out with all this enthusiasm, and by the end, they're just trying to survive. It's miserable and you can't breathe the air and you can't eat and your brain cells are dying. That's why those who get to the top tend to be those who have done it before."

Other Democrats said Obama would now have to shift away from "his Kumbaya message," as more than one put it, and start laying out the specifics of what he would do as president.

"He's getting a free ride right now," said one Democratic consultant, who requested anonymity because his firm is representing another potential presidential contender. "But that's about to change, and the hard questions are going to come, including about his lack of experience."

DOJ_NMG_0117619

Obama's dizzying rise has been built, in part, on his personal appeal to voters, his speaking skills and his ability to attract money for fellow Democrats in 2006. He has been widely featured on national television, newspapers and magazines, including a recent Newsweek cover that paired him with Hillary Clinton.

He has played off of the media boom, even as he has nurtured it. In his statement Tuesday, Obama called running for the presidency a "profound decision [that] no one should make on the basis of media hype and personal ambition alone."

"I certainly didn't expect to find myself in this position a year ago," he said, couching his decision in terms of conversations with supporters, and their e-mails and letters. His decision followed a period spent "thinking about how I could best advance the cause of change and progress that we so desperately need."

At least 10 Democrats are expected to seek the '08 nomination, which is likely to be decided in little more than a year. Edwards, Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio are already running. Clinton has yet to say when she will announce her candidacy. New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson is expected to make his intentions known this month. Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 nominee, and retired Gen. Wesley K. Clark are among those who haven't in dicated their plans.

Some Democrats speculated Tuesday that Obama's entry, by further dividing the Democratic vote, might increase the chance that former Vice President Al Gore would decide to get in. Gore has said he has no plans to run.

The first set of appearances by likely contenders is scheduled to take place in just over two weeks, at the winter meeting of the Democratic National Committee in Washington. Democrat ic debates or candidate forums have also been scheduled this spring in early primary or caucus states, including Nevada in March, and New Hampshire and South Carolina in April.

It is still nearly a year until the first primaries and caucuses, but the process has been compressed into the early weeks of 2008, and some Democrats believe the nomination will effectively be decided by Valentine's Day.

NH Democrats Not Surprised By Obama Announcement (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union-Leader, January 17, 2007

During his much-publicized "Obama-mania" visit on Dec. 10, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama looked, acted and sounded like a Presidential candidate when he spoke to a 1,500 people at a state Democratic Party rally in downtown Manchester.

So it was no surprise to New Hampshire yesterday that Obama announced the formation of an exploratory committee to raise money in preparation for a Presidential run.

Officially, he is not a candidate, but his point man in New Hampshire says it's just a formality.

"I think today was the first step toward an official candidacy," said lobbyist Jim Demers, a former state representative, who said he expects to be an unpaid volunteer for Obama in the First-in-the-Nation Primary state.

Obama said he intends to announce whether he will be a full-fledged candidate on Feb. 10.

Demers said he expects Obama to come to New Hampshire "sometime around that time."

For now, Demers said, "I'm in the process of helping them find some staff. I have more than 35 resumes, and they hope to have a campaign manager very soon."

He said he will not do the hiring, but simply make recommendations to exploratory committee officials.

Demers said Obama called him yesterday morning, and "he was extremely pumped. The call came after the announcement at 10 a.m. and I could feel the energy and excitement."

Demers said he expects Obama's next visit to be on a smaller scale than the December rally.

"While that first event was a mammoth event, the plan is for this to be your typical New Hampshire Presidential campaign with living room receptions, coffee shops and discussions directly with the voters," Demers said. "I don't think you're going to see anything like that again."

"The outpouring of support he received in New Hampshire in December was humbling to him," Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs said. "That's one of the things he's going to be spending the next three weeks doing is talking to folks in some of the early primary and caucus states such as New Hampshire, trying to gauge support."

Demers said Obama understands the importance of the New Hampshire primary.

?Obama fever grips NH

?After sold-out appearance, Obama pulls even with Clinton in NH

"He certainly addressed that when he was here the last time," said Demers. "But I did emphasize to him how important I feel it is to have a staff that understands New Hampshire politics and New Hampshire campaigns. And he agreed that the process we're going through right now is aimed at ensuring the staff has New Hampshire experience and understands how things are done here.

"Ideally, I'd like to have everything up and running with a staff within the next month," Demers said.

DOJ_NMG_0117620

State Democratic Chairman Kathy Sullivan also received a call from Obama yesterday.

"I anticipate that Senator Obama, like the rest of the field, is going to visit New Hampshire often and wage an aggressive campaign here if he goes forward," she said. "There are a lot of voters who want to see some real change, and his message of hope and unity has a lot of appeal given the current divisiveness in Washington, especially the (Bush adviser) Karl Rove 'divide-and-conquer' strategy."

A Maryland-based movement to draft Obama to run for President has recently spread to New Hampshire.

Yesterday's exploratory committee filing "is a positive sign," said state draft leader Robert Cushing, a former state representative.

"It means we have another four weeks while he listens to what the response is, and we are going to continue organizing New Hampshire to try to build a network to support a campaign."

Steve Sullivan, the state draft movement spokesman, said, "We're currently trying to figure out what we can do to raise awareness. We're considering putting together some kind of large event in Manchester before he makes his announcement."

Obama Readies '08 Bid (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 17, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) yesterday opened an exploratory committee to pursue a presidential run in 2008.

Obama's announcement was widely anticipated to arrive this month, but more unexpected was his dedication of the next 25 days to continued discussion with voters and associates before revealing his ultimate decision from his Illinois base.

"The decisions that have been made in Washington these past six years, and the problems that have been ignored, have put our country in a precarious place," Obama said in a statement posted on his website, adding: "But challenging as they are, it's not the magnitude of our problems that concerns me the most. It's the smallness of our politics."

Obama is the fifth senator to form an exploratory committee with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) or declare candidacy in recent weeks, following Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.), John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Chris Dodd (D-Conn.). The remaining holdouts seen in the Senate's White House-wannabe caucus are John Kerry (D-Mass.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who cancelled a planned press event yesterday discussing her weekend codel to Iraq and Afghanistan to give Rep. John McHugh (R-N.Y.) time to return to the Capitol.

Of Obama's prospective primary foes, only former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) commented openly yesterday on his exploratory move, which was accompanied by two video presentations but no public appearances. Fellow Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, the Democrats' second-in-command, and Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), like Obama a Congressional Black Caucus member, released statements of support.

"Today's announcement is the first step in a long journey to the White House," Durbin said. "Barack Obama brings to this race a promise of reconciliation and a feeling of hope that America desperately needs."

"I am hopeful and confident that an Obama presidency would ignite a feeling of national purpose and renewal that our country has not witnessed in my lifetime," Davis said. "Finally, Obama's victory would crystallize this country's movement beyond race and ethnicity as political impediments."

One House leader with potentially divided loyalties is Rahm Emanuel (Ill.). The Democratic Caucus chairman and 2006 electoral hero has close ties to the Chicago political community certain to back Obama as well as to Sen. Clinton and her husband, whom Emanuel served as a campaign strategist and senior White House aide. Emanuel has demurred on the question of his 2008 allegiances, although his brother Ari has helped raise money for Obama.

Obama has laid out his biography in two best-selling books and a 2004 speech to the Democratic National Convention that sparked his meteoric rise to fame. He was born in Hawaii to a white Kansan mother and a black Kenyan father, spent childhood years in Indonesia and went on to a degree from Harvard University, where he was the first African-American president of the prestigious law review.

"Obama could do quite well in New Hampshire," said Kathy Sullivan, chairwoman of the Democratic Party in that first-in-the-nation primary state. "[He] has a message of hope and unity, which I think is a good message. People are very tired of the divisiveness that's been a hallmark of the Bush administration."

Sullivan has spoken with Obama about his nascent bid in recent days, though she declined to give details. She said the 45-year-old senator's path to national politics is "representative of America these days … You don't necessarily have to have the same identification with a state your entire life."

The Iowa Democratic organization, which hosted Obama for a pre-election rally for new Gov. Chet Culver (D), issued Obama its traditional welcome to the race through spokeswoman Erin Seidler.

DOJ_NMG_0117621

And Obama got a warm welcome from DraftObama.org, a volunteer movement born last year but conceived in the wake of his 2004 convention speech. DraftObama, a registered PAC, recently ran TV spots in New Hampshire, Iowa, Hawaii and Washington urging Obama to seek the presidency and has organized in 22 states, spokeswoman Kris Schultz said yesterday.

Schultz said Obama's deadline of Feb. 10 for an official decision presented a mandate for her group. "We've almost been tasked to encourage the senator during this exploratory phase … We do feel like the senator basically sent a message" to his supporters, she said.

Amid the acclamation from grass roots and establishment alike that has greeted Obama's ascent to presidential contender, some potential roadblocks have emerged that could test a freshman who faced little serious opposition during his 2004 Senate campaign.

Obama has a long record of opposition to the war in Iraq, stating in 2004 that he would have challenged that year's $87 billion war supplemental, which notoriously dogged then-nominee Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) on the trail, if he had been in Congress at the time. But this year, Obama has refrained from making similar vows about the imminent $100 billion-plus war supplemental and has not yet embraced Sen. Edward Kennedy's (D-Mass.) bill to require congressional approval of the troop "surge" planned by President Bush.

Two months before Obama was elected, he told an Illinois broadcasters' group that he would be open to a temporary increase in U.S. troops as part of a broader plan to begin withdrawal from a stabilized Iraq. Such comments could alarm anti-war Democrats in search of a 2008 candidate fully committed to ending U.S. involvement in Iraq.

In addition, Obama wrote in his announcement yesterday that "our continued dependence on oil has put our security and our very planet at risk," yet he has befuddled some environmentalists by cosponsoring a measure with Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.) that would provide tax breaks, loan guarantees and Pentagon support for coal-to-oil conversion, a costly process that can cause more environmental harm than burning traditional fossil fuel.

But for the moment, Obama's party spoke exultantly in one voice about his arrival on the presidential scene. One big winner is the Virginia Democratic Party, which will host Obama for a Jefferson-Jackson Day fundraiser on Feb. 17 that spokesman Mark Bergman said would likely sell out by today in the wake of the presidential news.

Renowned campaign-finance lawyer Bob Bauer of Perkins Coie, who has done past work for Obama, will serve as treasurer of his exploratory committee, according to papers filed yesterday. The announcement was e-mailed from Robert Gibbs, who previously had served as Obama's Senate press secretary, a signal that Gibbs may be shifting full-time to exploratory committee duties.

Obama Takes 1st Step To '08 Run (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama yesterday formed a presidential exploratory committee, citing a fundamental desire to change the "bitter and partisan" nature of politics and positioning himself as an anti-war candidate, drawing implicit contrasts with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The Illinois Democrat, 45, made the announcement in a uniquely 21st-century manner -- telling voters in a Web video that he needs their help to "change our politics and come together around our common interests and concerns as Americans."

"I certainly didn't expect to find myself in this position a year ago," said Mr. Obama, two years into his first term in the U.S. Senate. "But as I've spoken to many of you in my travels across the states these past months ... I've been struck by how hungry we all are for a different kind of politics."

In a theme sure to be repeated in the coming weeks as voters and pundits compare Mr. Obama to Mrs. Clinton, the senator reminded supporters of his early opposition to the Iraq war, calling it a "tragic and costly war that should never have been waged."

Mrs. Clinton, the former first lady and now a New York senator, had long been seen as the front-runner for the Democratic nomination. But press and voter attention to Mr. Obama, coupled with an electorate increasingly frustrated by the war, have contributed to Mrs. Clinton's slipping in some recent polls.

Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina and Mr. Obama were tied for first place in a December Iowa presidential poll that left Mrs. Clinton in fourth place in the state that holds the nation's first caucus vote on Jan. 14, 2008.

In New Hampshire, which holds the nation's first primary election, Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton are virtually tied for the lead. Mr. Edwards, the 2004 vice-presidential nominee, came in third place in that poll.

But Mrs. Clinton, just elected by an overwhelming margin to a second Senate term by New York voters, still holds a significant lead over her potential opponents in national polls conducted through January.

DOJ_NMG_0117622

In the three-minute Web video found at www.barackobama.com and touted in an e-mail titled "My plans for 2008," the senator says he will announce his final decision Feb. 10.

In the meantime, Mr. Obama will attempt to raise the millions necessary for a presidential bid. Reported to be a secret upcoming guest on the Oprah Winfrey show to discuss his candidacy, he is expected to travel to Iowa this weekend.

"For the next several weeks, I am going to talk with people from around the country, listening and learning more about the challenges we face as a nation, the opportunities that lie before us, and the role that a presidential campaign might play in bringing our country together," said Mr. Obama, who served in the Illinois Senate from 1996 to 2005.

The early polls suggest that Mr. Obama, who is black, has significant momentum one year before the country holds its nominating contests. A CBS News poll conducted the first week of January showed Mr. Obama's popularity growing, although his name recognition is still lacking nationally, especially compared with Mrs. Clinton's.

In December, 62 percent of voters in a CNN poll said America is "ready" for a black president.

Mrs. Clinton -- with a deep fundraising base, an ex-president husband and near-universal name recognition -- is widely expected to announce her presidential ambitions this week, perhaps as early as today.

Although Mrs. Clinton is likely to be Mr. Obama's most formidable opponent, the Democratic field is crowded.

Other announced Democratic candidates include Mr. Edwards, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut.

Mr. Dodd said the field is "getting crowded" but dismissed the common cliche that Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton are "sucking the oxygen" from the field, saying: "There's a lot of oxygen."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware has said he will form a presidential exploratory committee this month. Also thought to be interested are Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic nominee; New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson; and retired Gen. Wesley Clark, who also ran in 2004.

The Iraq war is a defining issue for Democratic hopefuls, and Mr. Obama is one of the few in the crowd who does not have to defend a vote to go to war. Unlike Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards, who voted to give the president authority for the war in October 2002, Mr. Obama was not in the Senate.

In just a few years, Mr. Obama quickly rose from a local politician with a self-described "funny name" to a man who thinks he can be president.

In a biographical video on his newly designed Web site, the best-selling author and lawyer highlights some of his career and personal achievements and replays excerpts from his 2004 speech at the Democratic National Convention that made him a political star.

Obama's First Blunder (HILL)

The Hill, January 17, 2007

Presidential hopeful Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) made his first misstep a few days ago when he joined only a handful of Democrats in opposing a Senate reform banning the increasingly widespread practice of legislators hiring their family members on their campaign or PAC payrolls. Obama has not heard the last of this vote. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who opposes wives cashing in on their husbands' positions, voted righteously in favor of the reform and will probably use the Illinois senator's vote against him in the presidential primaries.

When a legislator hires his or her spouse on the campaign or PAC payroll, he is effectively converting contributions to his campaign committee into personal income that flows into the family's checking account, blurring the line between contribution and bribe.

In the past, senators and House members routinely hired their spouses and other family members on their public payrolls. In the early 1940s, for example, Harry S. Truman hired his wife, Bess, to work on his Senate staff. She got $2,500 a year in salary at a time when senators themselves only earned $8,500. But nepotism on the public payroll is now banned. So inventive congressmen and senators have filled the void by hiring family on their campaign or PAC payrolls.

Hiring family members and paying them with campaign donations is, if anything, more pernicious than doing so with public funds. Where tax money is involved, the sin is against the taxpayer for wasting his funds. But where campaign contributions are involved, the congressman is profiting personally from the largesse of special interest donors. In plain English, that's a payoff.

There is, of course, a certain hypocrisy in the Senate action since very few senators, in fact, hire their families on their payrolls. It is, though, widely practiced in the House of Representatives, where 30 members have their families on their payrolls. But senators are much less likely to do so. Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who voted "present" on the reform, hired her son, Douglas, a lobbyist, to manage her PAC, paying him $130,000 over a four-year period. Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, then a Democrat, hired his son, Matthew, for $34,000 and his daughter, Rebecca, for $36,000 to work on his 2004 presidential campaign.

So the congressional ethics reform of 2007 boils down to this: The House banned the use of corporate jets but the Senate did not, even though senators are more likely to avail themselves of the luxury than is the average House member. The Senate banned hiring family members but the House did not, even though House members are far more likely to hire their significant others to work for them.

Obama's inexplicable pro-nepotism vote may have been cast in sympathy with Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr. (D-Ill.), whose hiring of his wife, Sandi, to work on his campaign prompted an FEC ruling allowing the practice. Jackson might be afraid that the Senate action will catalyze a similar reform in the House, which could cut way back on his disposable family income.

But whatever the reason for his vote, Obama has screwed up. The public will not take kindly to a senator who pledged to clean up the political process voting to allow wives to be hired with special-interest campaign funds.

The FEC required, in allowing the practice, that the contract for the services of the family member contain the language customarily used between campaign committees and consultants. The FEC also ruled that any payment to a family member in excess of the fair market value of the services would be considered to be a "personal use of campaign funds."

But, as usual, the FEC has missed the point. Any payment from campaign money to a spouse is, in fact, an appropriation of campaign funds by the member of Congress for his own personal use, however camouflaged or disguised. The Senate was right to ban the practice and the House should follow suit.

McCain To Make Amends With Dobson (AP)

By Jim Davenport

AP, January 17, 2007

Sen. John McCain said Tuesday he hopes to patch things up with conservative Christian leader James Dobson, who recently said he wouldn't support the Republican's presidential bid under any circumstances.

In a radio interview with KCBI, a Dallas Christian station, Dobson argued that McCain didn't support traditional marriage values and complained that the campaign finance legislation he co-authored hurt Christian broadcasters.

"Speaking as a private individual, I would not vote for John McCain under any circumstances," Dobson said on KCBI.

The 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance legislation stifled "Christian radio" and "kept us from telling the truth right before elections," Dobson contended. "He is not in favor of traditional marriage and I pray that we will not get stuck with him."

During a campaign stop in Columbia, S.C., McCain said: "I'm obviously disappointed and I'd like to continue and have a dialogue with Dr. Dobson and other members of the community."

McCain has said gay marriage should not be legal but has angered some conservatives with his opposition to a constitutional amendment banning same-sex unions. The Arizona senator said the issue should be left to the states.

"I'm happy to say that I've established a dialogue with a number of other leaders," including the Rev. Jerry Falwell, "Purpose Driven Life" author Rick Warren and Dr. Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention.

McCain has reached out to conservatives he once crossed. Last May, he spoke at Falwell's Liberty University in Virginia. In 2000, Falwell opposed McCain's campaign for the GOP nomination and supported George W. Bush. At the time, McCain labeled Falwell and others on the right and the left as "agents of intolerance."

During his 2000 presidential bid, McCain also criticized Bob Jones University, a Christian fundamentalist college, for its ban on interracial dating.

In a GOP debate with Bush, McCain said that given the opportunity to speak at the school as Bush had, he would have said: "Look, what you're doing in this ban on interracial dating is stupid, it's idiotic, and it is incredibly cruel to many people."

McCain said last year that he wouldn't turn down an opportunity to speak at Bob Jones.

Since 2000, the school has lifted its interracial dating ban.

Tancredo Forms Exploratory Committee (AP)

By Jennifer Talhelm

AP, January 17, 2007

Colorado Republican Rep. Tom Tancredo, an outspoken opponent of illegal immigration, said Tuesday he will form an exploratory committee this week for a possible presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0117624

After making a weekend trip to Iowa, home to the first nominating caucus in January 2008, Tancredo said voters there told him other presidential candidates don't share their views.

"They believe that there is a void in this race that none of the other candidates are willing or able to fill," said Tancredo, who plans to remain in the House.

Tancredo has said immigration would be a central issue if he does run. Campaign spokesman Tim Haley said on Tuesday that Tancredo would also push opposition to abortion and other conservative themes as well.

Haley said grass-roots leaders in Iowa told Tancredo they want a "true conservative" in the race to counter other potential GOP candidates, including Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, who are seen as moderates by some.

While in Iowa, Tancredo promoted his book, "In Mortal Danger," which warns about the need to secure U.S. borders.

Tancredo was partly testing the support among Iowa Republicans for McCain, who has proposed a guest worker program for illegal immigrants.

Tancredo and other anti-immigration activists have heavily criticized McCain for being too soft on immigration.

A bill McCain helped sponsor would have provided a path to citizenship for some of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in the country now. Tancredo advocate securing the border before creating a guest worker program.

Tancredo met with activists and GOP leaders in Iowa.

"Too many people believe that their leaders in Washington have forgotten them," Tancredo said after the visit. "I want to make sure that their voices are heard in the upcoming election."

Colo. Lawmaker Considers Run For President (WP)

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), one of Congress's most outspoken opponents of illegal immigration and guest-worker programs, said yesterday that he will take the first step toward a 2008 presidential bid.

Tancredo said in a statement that he decided to form a presidential exploratory committee after visiting Iowa last weekend.

"The one thing I heard over and over is that they don't believe the other contenders care about the same things that they do," Tancredo, 61, said.

None of the White House candidates, the five-term lawmaker added, "reflects the grass-roots, majority belief of Americans that our borders must be secured, that employers who hire illegals must be prosecuted, and that no one who has broken our immigration laws should ever be put on a 'pathway to citizenship.' "

Tancredo Forms Presidential Exploratory Committee (CQ)

By Marie Horrigan

CQ Politics Tancredo, '08, January 17, 2007

After spending last weekend consulting with Republican insiders in the first-in-the-nation presidential caucus state of Iowa, Colorado Republican Rep. Tom Tancredo has decided to form an exploratory committee for a possible White House run in 2008.

Though little known to most of the nation's voters, the five-term congressman from suburban Denver has a following among some conservative activists — particularly those who favor his leadership role in efforts to crack down on illegal immigration and also limit the numbers of legal immigrants in the United States.

The 61-year-old Tancredo's ostensible reason for visiting Iowa was to promote his book on his trademark issue, "In Mortal Danger: The Battle for America's Border and Security."

According to a report Tuesday by the Associated Press, Tancredo said he found Iowa Republicans who think the other potential candidates for the party's presidential nomination do not share their views. "They believe that there is a void in this race that none of the other candidates are willing or able to fill," he said.

The news that Tancredo plans to move ahead with a presidential exploratory committee comes just a day after another Colorado Republican made headlines: Sen. Wayne Allard announced Monday in Denver that he will not run for a third term in 2008.

Tancredo is considered a possible Republican contender for Allard's seat in a contest that Democrats — who have made significant gains in Colorado over the past two election cycles — are targeting for a takeover bid in 2008.

But Tancredo, following Allard's announcement, appeared to signal a preference for his longshot presidential prospects, with his spokesman telling the state press that Tancredo is urging Republican former Rep. Scott McInnis to run for the Senate next year.

DOJ_NMG_0117625

Tancredo is one of 13 Republicans listed by CQPolitics.com as having a stated interest in running for president in 2008, a group that includes much better known figures such as Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

The only officially announced GOP candidate at the moment is a distinct long-shot, attorney John H. Cox of Illinois, who happens to share many of Tancredo's views on immigration.

Tancredo Begins White House Bid (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

Rep. Tom Tancredo yesterday formed a committee to explore a run for the Republican nomination for president, hoping to force the issue of immigration into the primary debates and push the candidates to embrace stricter enforcement.

"As I look at the current presidential candidates -- Republican and Democratic -- I simply do not see one who reflects the grass-roots, majority belief of Americans that our borders must be secured, that employers who hire illegals must be prosecuted, and that no one who has broken our immigration laws should ever be put on a 'pathway to citizenship,' " Mr. Tancredo wrote in his first fundraising letter.

The Colorado Republican's political rise has tracked closely with the immigration issue, which went from being a "sleeper" issue to a dominant part of the 2006 congressional campaigns. Mr. Tancredo on Monday ruled out a run for the U.S. Senate seat that will open in 2008 with the retirement of Sen. Wayne Allard.

Mr. Tancredo, 61, has spent time during the past two years traveling in the early primary and caucus states of Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. He said at the time that those trips were designed to put the issue of immigration on the minds of voters and said he would only enter the race if no credible candidate stepped in to represent the immigration-enforcement approach.

Yesterday, Mr. Tancredo said nobody has picked up the banner.

Bay Buchanan, a friend and confidante of Mr. Tancredo's who runs his political action committee, Team America, said that immigration is the issue that will help Mr. Tancredo stand out from the pack of candidates. She also said his record, consistently conservative up and down the line, will go over well with Iowa's pro-life, conservative caucusgoers.

"He is an across-the-board social conservative -- one that the Christian right can feel completely comfortable with, that he has been with them on those issues for his whole life," she said.

His advisers say Mr. Tancredo will not raise the sort of money that Republican heavyweights Sen. John McCain, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney expect to raise. Advisers to Mr. Romney say their target is $70 million this year, while a campaign document from Mr. Giuliani says his target is $100 million.

Mr. Tancredo is in the smaller-budget group that includes Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, Rep. Ron Paul of Texas, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III, former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy G. Thompson and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas.

But Mr. Tancredo stands out from that pack because he brings to the race a dedicated army of talk-radio show hosts and activists who oppose illegal immigration.

"His strength is that he already has a national following. He has enormous grass-roots support. He is well-known across this country by the Republican base," said Mrs. Buchanan, who was chairman in all three of her brother Pat Buchanan's presidential campaigns.

She said Mr. Tancredo's candidacy should excite those who supported Mr. Buchanan in 1992 and 1996, but said that as a five-term congressman, Mr. Tancredo also brings his own national following.

Tancredo Officially Eyeing Bid (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern

Denver Post, January 17, 2007

Washington - Colorado's Tom Tancredo took his first official step Tuesday toward running for president.

The Republican congressman from Littleton - known for his hard-line stance on immigration - announced his plan to file paperwork for a presidential exploratory committee. He set up a website and within four hours, he said, collected about $10,000 in campaign contributions.

After spending the weekend in Iowa, where the earliest presidential nominating caucus is to be held in mid-January 2008, Tancredo, 61, said he decided there's a need for a candidate with traditional Republican beliefs of small government, reduced spending and conservative social values.

"It appears to me that there is a void,

DOJ_NMG_0117626

Talk back

Discuss this story. Join the conversation. which I think I can fill, (being) a true conservative with a conservative history," Tancredo said. "I believe I can play a role, and I believe I can be viable."

Tancredo's move comes as others are stepping forward on the presidential front, including Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.

Tancredo is one of the first to do so on the Republican side, a step he said he needs in order to determine whether he can raise enough money to make a respectable showing. Under campaign rules, setting up such a committee allows a potential candidate to raise and spend money to explore a run without yet declaring for office.

Spokesman Carlos Espinosa said Tancredo may announce this summer whether he'll run or not.

A Tancredo presidential bid would be a quixotic quest, analysts said. Though he's trying to broaden his appeal, Tancredo is known mostly for wanting to tighten immigration policies.

At the same time, analysts said, Tancredo's position on immigration would grant him credibility with some conservative caucus voters in Iowa and elsewhere.

"I wouldn't underestimate the power of this immigration issue to become one of the litmus tests" for Republican candidates, said Chuck Todd, editor of the Hotline, a nonpartisan political blog attached to National Journal.

Tancredo for two years has flirted with the idea of running for president, saying previously that he'd do so primarily to push the immigration issue.

Several recent events propelled him closer to an official run, including the near certainty that the new Democratic-controlled Congress will pass immigration reform Tancredo finds objectionable. The presidency in 2008, he said, "is for all the marbles."

A resounding welcome from Iowa Republicans last weekend cemented his decision to form the exploratory committee, he said. "I had to know that I had a good solid base."

Tancredo acknowledges he has no chance to raise the "hundreds of millions of dollars" that likely candidates such as Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.; former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney; and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani could potentially acquire.

He said for now he needs to determine whether he can raise the $1 million or so he'd need to compete in Iowa. Tancredo has hired a representative to run his campaign there.

Tancredo has name recognition in Iowa, said Chuck Laudner, executive director of the Iowa Republican Party, but "it's a crowded field," with McCain and Romney seen as the front runners. Giuliani also has traction, Laudner said.

But his immigration stance, Laudner said, "is enough to get (Tancredo) into the game. But staying power will mean broadening his message."

Espinosa said Tancredo would consider a third-place finish in Iowa a victory.

"I don't think he's there yet," Laudner said. "If you announce you're playing for third, you'll never get there. You have to be in the game."

Tancredo's presence in Iowa would put pressure on McCain, who would have a hard time appeasing the wing of the Republican Party that agrees with Tancredo on immigration, said Norman Ornstein, political analyst with American Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank.

Tancredo also could boost Romney by allowing him to withhold criticism of McCain and let Tancredo voice it instead.

Invest More Now (WT)

By Newt Gingrich And Bart Gordon

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

Throughout history, national security has been dependent on economic prosperity, and visa versa. An economically strong America is better able to defend itself. Likewise, the nation's ability to defend itself is a prerequisite to maintaining the infrastructure and other elements of a strong national economy.

Unfortunately, the nation has forgotten one of the most important ways our economic prosperity and national security are linked — investment in fundamental scientific research. Investments made in fundamental scientific research after World War II and during the Cold War have been essential to making our fighting men and women today the best equipped in the world. These previous investments and the new knowledge they generated also made enormous contributions to our economic vitality.

But our commitment to that defense-oriented fundamental research — the kind of research that pays off not in a year or two but in the long run, sometimes decades in the future — has eroded. If we do not renew this commitment, it will harm our global economic competitiveness as well as the effectiveness and safety of our troops.

The extraordinary technologies upon which today's military equipment is based come from an extraordinary research and development enterprise. The foundation of that enterprise is the basic scientific research funded by the Department of Defense.

Unfortunately, the national commitment to investing in basic defense research has waned in recent years, with funding levels essentially flat for several years and the overall percentage of the Pentagon budget devoted to such research significantly less than it was in the 1980s.

While spending on overall defense research and development has increased significantly over this period, this spending has been focused on development and testing of major weapons systems and advanced technologies. Yet even these advanced weapons systems are dependent on fundamental discoveries made years or even decades ago.

We take for granted advances in military equipment from decade to decade, but imagine having fought wars from World War II to the defeat of the Taliban in Afghanistan and Saddam in Iraq without the use of radar, lasers, stealth technology, fiber-optic-based communications, satellite and global positioning system (GPS) navigation, and precision guidance technologies. These technologies have at least one thing in common — all are the end result of basic research — much of which, by the way, took place on the campuses of our nation's universities.

Most of them have something else in common. Consider how some of these technologies — GPS, radar, lasers, fiber-optic communications — have been converted to civilian uses in areas ranging from manufacturing and transportation to telecommunications and health care, with great benefit to our economy and our quality of life. And then there is the Internet, which was the result of defense researchers looking for a fail-safe communications network that could survive a nuclear attack.

In addition to creating specific "dual-use" technologies, defense research plays an important role supporting scientific fields essential to both our economy and our security. Historically, the Defense Department has invested heavily in research in the physical sciences and engineering. More than one-third of all engineering research comes from the Defense Department, and it is one of the largest supporters of research in electronics, computers, mathematics, aeronautics, material science, mechanics and the environmental sciences, especially oceanography.

President Bush and Congress have shown over the past decade that they understand the importance of basic research to the economy and to our health. First, Congress, with both the Clinton and Bush administrations, doubled the size of the National Institutes of Health, laying the groundwork for extraordinary advances in biomedical research.

Last year, the president took the next logical step — his most important new economic proposal — doubling basic research in the physical sciences and engineering at three key research agencies that fund basic university research: the National Science Foundation, the Department of Energy Office of Science and the National Institute of Standards and Technology.

Notably absent from the president's proposal, however, were major increases for basic research at the Defense Department. But like the research supported by these other agencies, funding for basic defense research is essential to our economic competitiveness.

Therefore, we are joining the Task Force on the Future of American Innovation, a coalition of business and academic organizations, in calling on the president to add Department of Defense research to his competitiveness initiative, make this a part of his State of the Union address later this month, and include it in his budget in February.

National security and economic competitiveness are linked in reality — they should be linked by national policy as well.

Newt Gingrich is the former speaker of the House. Rep. Bart Gordon is chairman of the House Committee on Science and Technology.

Scramble For Cash Underway (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON — The competition among presidential contenders for the Democratic Party's most influential donors and fundraisers grew more intense Tuesday with Sen. Barack Obama's decision to raise money to explore a 2008 race.

The move by the Illinois senator comes as many of the party's top-tier fundraisers sit on the sidelines and size up the potential rivalry between Obama and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The scramble to win prominent fundraisers is critical in the first contest since 1928 in which neither the president nor his vice president is seeking the office. The top candidates are likely to raise $100 million before the first primary.

Chicago investment banker Lou Susman, a major Democratic fundraiser, said just hours after Obama's announcement that he would work with the Illinois senator. "I think he has struck the right chord with Americans in terms of his philosophy," Susman said.

On the Republican side, financial backers of President Bush have started to migrate to Sen. John McCain. The Arizona senator's political action committee raised more than twice the amount from Bush's 2004 donors than the PAC of a potential rival, former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, The Arizona Republic found.

DOJ_NMG_0117628

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, however, recently raised $6.5 million in one day and has attracted several big Bush fundraisers, including Mel Sembler, former ambassador to Italy.

In an election that could set fundraising and spending records, "who can round up a ball team of $100,000 fundraisers" will be crucial to success, said Steve Grossman, a former Democratic National Committee chairman who has not yet backed a candidate. "People are playing their cards very close to their chests," he said.

Some examples:

•Alan Solomont, who raised more than $35 million for John Kerry's 2004 White House bid, is weighing his options. Solomont said he's getting so many calls about 2008 that his wife jokes "my phone number is written on the restroom wall of the Capitol."

•Billionaire George Soros, who gave more than $15 million to liberal groups working to defeat President Bush in 2004, will probably give to several Democrats but "has no plans to become actively involved in the primary," aide Michael Vachon said.

•Margery Tabankin, a Democratic activist who advises Barbra Streisand and other Hollywood figures on giving, says many Hollywood Democrats are looking closely at Clinton, Obama and former senator John Edwards. "You will see people writing checks to all three — not cynically, but to let them each get their message out there," she said.

Clinton aide Jonathan Mantz said big donors will support the former first lady. "We are going to be in a very solid position going into this race, if we decide to do it," he said.

Clinton has $14 million left over from her Senate campaign that she can use for a White House bid.

Among those with Clinton: Philadelphia lawyer Alan Kessler. Former president Bill Clinton and his wife "were very good to most of us, not just in appointments to federal commissions," he said. "He was incredibly helpful to Pennsylvania."

Frist Looking At Governor Run In 2010 (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, January 17, 2007

Former Majority Leader Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) is seriously considering a gubernatorial run in Tennessee in 2010, possibly setting up a White House bid further down the road.

Sources in Washington and Tennessee say Frist, who will turn 55 next month, is leaning heavily toward a run for the governor's office, where he could gain executive experience that might position him to try for the presidency in either 2012 or 2016.

"It's a done deal," said a source with knowledge of Frist's plans.

Frist was considering a 2008 presidential run until late last year, when he announced he would not run, opening the door for a bid at the Volunteer State's governor's office.

Waiting three to eight years before making a gubernatorial or presidential bid would provide Frist needed distance from his unenviable tenure as Senate majority leader, a period that culminated in the Democrats' takeover of Congress last November.

Such a significant layoff would also allow Frist to distance himself from allegations of conflict of interest involving his ownership of stock in Hospital Corporation of America, a company founded by his brother and father, allegations that could have further derailed his White House hopes this year.

Frist could not be reached and an official at his Volunteer PAC office in Nashville declined to comment.

Bob Davis, chairman of the Tennessee GOP and a friend of Frist's, said that while the former senator has not told him he will run, there has been a lot of talk and encouragement for Frist to do so.

"If he chooses to do something like that, he'd have a lot of support," Davis said.

Davis said a number of Republicans in the state are being mentioned as possible candidates, including Beth Harwell, a state representative and former chairwoman of the state GOP who was considering a run for Frist's Senate seat last year.

Lt. Gov. Ron Ramsey, who recently ended Democratic state Sen. John Wilder's 36-year hold on the seat, is also being mentioned as a possibility.

Bruce Oppenheimer, a political scientist at Vanderbilt University, said a number of Republicans have been positioning themselves to run for governor, including Reps. Zach Wamp and Marsha Blackburn, and possibly former Reps. Ed Bryant and Van Hilleary, both of whom lost to Sen. Bob Corker in the GOP primary for Frist's seat.

"I believe some of that field might clear if [Frist] decides to run," Davis said.

Oppenheimer said Frist's vast resources could scare away much of the competition.

"He raises the ante," Oppenheimer said. "He makes the cost of getting in quite a bit higher. That's the real difficulty other Republicans face."

DOJ_NMG_0117629

Frist's Volunteer PAC, or VOLPAC, had about $166,000 cash on hand according to post-election filings, but Tennessee state law would only allow for PAC contributions to a gubernatorial run totaling $15,000; $7,500 for both the primary and general elections.

Oppenheimer said raising money would not be an early concern for Frist, but maintaining relevance and overcoming other political "liabilities" could prove a challenge.

Frist's approval ratings have been consistently lower than Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who is up for reelection in 2008, Oppenheimer said. But voters in Tennessee were less likely to pass a harsh judgment on Frist's tenure as majority leader than national voters would.

"I don't think the people in Tennessee have as critical an evaluation of the job he did as majority leader as they do in Washington," he said.

Oppenheimer cautioned that making political predictions this far out is "risky."

But Davis said that while it is early, the time to raise money, raise a profile and really start running comes sooner that most people think.

"It's really not four [years]; it's really two," he said.

Allard's Exit Opens Door To Elway (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, January 17, 2007

Former Denver Broncos quarterback John Elway will always be remembered by Coloradoans as the orchestrator of "The Drive" — a 98-yard touchdown march in the closing moments of the 1987 American Football Conference Championship game.

Whether the Hall-of-Famer and statewide sports hero has the drive to score a big win for Colorado Republicans in 2008 is another matter, and it's the subject of growing speculation now that Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) is not running.

Elway's office at the Colorado Crush of the Arena Football League said yesterday that Elway "has no intentions of running," and observers say a 2008 Senate bid that could muddy his popular image is unlikely, though attractive to the party.

Colorado Republicans have shown an interest in celebrity candidates in the past — Republican beer baron Pete Coors lost narrowly in 2004 to current Sen. Ken Salazar (D) — and some have suggested they will look in that direction now that the other Senate seat is open and top statewide candidates appear unlikely to run.

And there is no bigger celebrity in the state than Elway.

Allard's announcement on Monday that he would not seek a third term has left Republicans searching for a candidate in what's set to be among the toughest and most expensive Senate races in the country. A candidate with top name recognition and a golden image like Elway's would have a serious leg up.

Former Rep. Scott McInnis (R-Colo.), who said he will run if former Gov. Bill Owens doesn't, told the Associated Press last month that if Owens bows out, the major parties would also likely search for celebrity candidates such as Elway. He said he thought "Elway could clear the field."

Owens has defused talk that he would run.

If Colorado Republicans go after Elway, the situation would be similar to the Illinois Senate race of 2004, when Republicans tried hard to recruit former Chicago Bears Coach and Hall-of-Famer Mike Ditka to run against now-Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) for an open seat.

Ditka decided not to run, and Republicans settled for Alan Keyes, who lost badly.

Elway, a two-time Super Bowl winner, has been involved mostly behind the scenes in Republican politics since retiring in the late 1990s. He has generally focused on the top-of-the-ticket races — the Senate in 2004 and governorship in 2006 — while dabbling in business ventures like car dealerships and the Crush.

Elway's nine-year relationship with a Denver-area car dealership chain ended late last year, prompting some to suggest politics was next.

He has given thousands to Colorado GOP candidates including McInnis, Coors, Rep. Tom Tancredo and 2006 7th district House candidate Rick O'Donnell. He has also contributed to former Rep. Rick Lazio (R-N.Y.) and the Republican National Committee, according to Federal Election Commission reports. He contributed more in the 2006 cycle than previous cycles.

Colorado GOP consultant Katy Atkinson said Elway increased his activity this past cycle, but she also emphasized that his name has previously been thrown out as a potential House candidate and in 2004 for the Senate seat.

"I think if John Elway wants it, it's his," Atkinson said, referring to the Republican nomination and likely the seat too. "He has god-like status in Colorado."

DOJ_NMG_0117630

The Colorado Republican Party is on the verge of changing chairmen, with Dick Wadhams likely to become the new head in March, and the decision whether to woo Elway could rest with him.

State party spokesman Bryant Adams said Elway would be "a viable candidate," and it would help that he could self-fund to some extent.

"I'd say his name I.D.'s probably pretty close to 100 [percent]," Adams said. "The question is: Would he want to get in? I just don't know, frankly."

Many in Colorado politics subscribe to the view that Elway would be formidable, but they still doubt he would give up his private life.

"You just don't see him do the whole policy-strengthening and intense schmoozing you see from somebody thinking about it," independent pollster Floyd Ciruli said.

Others see Elway as neither a likely candidate nor an attractive one. Mort Marks, a longtime GOP operative in Arapahoe County, where Elway conducts his business, said Republicans are tossing Elway's name out "for no reason."

"It would not be an automatic win," Marks said. "It's very equivalent to running Pete Coors."

The Coors comparison is just one Elway would have to deal with while his prospects are being assessed. Coors was well known and well liked in Colorado, but he proved a less-than-polished politician and lost 51-47 to Salazar.

Bruce Peterson, a former Arapahoe County GOP chairman, said he's encouraged about the Elway talk, which he's heard both publicly and privately. But he said Coors and others might have ruined it for Elway by turning Coloradoans sour on "rich Republicans."

"I think there's a concern that we might have a similar situation with Elway, entering the picture with similar credentials," Peterson said.

The other main comparisons would be with sports figures like Ditka. Numerous athletes and coaches have served or are serving in Congress, including: NBA Hall-of-Famer former Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.); NFL Hall-of-Famer former Rep. Steve Largent (R-Okla.); Hall of Fame baseball pitcher Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.); and former Rep. J.C. Watts (R-Okla.), a college football star at the University of Oklahoma.

Recent sports-to-politics pathways have proven less successful.

Last cycle, Republican Lynn Swann, an NFL Hall-of-Famer with the Pittsburgh Steelers, proved politically inept in his bid to unseat Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell (D). Also, former Rep. Tom Osborne (R-Neb.), a famous University of Nebraska football coach, lost in the Republican gubernatorial primary.

Democrats for now appear set to go with Rep. Mark Udall (D-Colo.) who yielded to Salazar in 2004 and said soon after that he would run for Allard's seat. Denver Mayor John Hickenlooper (D), who packs some celebrity appeal, has said he's not interested and appears the only alternative to Udall right now.

On the Republican side, another local celebrity, radio show host Dan Caplis, is also reportedly considering running.

McInnis, who left Congress after 2004, had more than $900,000 in his most recent FEC filing.

Seven Tough Choices We Will Not Make (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Fulfilling their promise, Democrats in the House have voted to raise the minimum wage from its current $5.15 an hour to $7.25 by 2009. But before you count the big gains for low-income families, consider this fact: Among the poorest fifth of U.S. households (their 2005 incomes: less than $19,178), only one in seven has a full-time, year-round worker. About 60 percent have no worker at all, says the Census Bureau. The rest have part-time or part-year workers. A higher minimum wage won't help most of these households, which consist heavily of single parents and the elderly.

Among social scientists, it's no secret that the minimum wage is a weak weapon against poverty. Modest numbers of workers are affected; many are teenagers, often from middle-class homes; and many of the poor don't work. And a higher minimum wage may destroy some jobs. No matter. Democrats plunged ahead because raising the minimum wage is symbolically powerful. It says that you care about "economic justice."

This is, I think, a metaphor for what ails our politics: It's mostly about gestures and giveaways; it's not about hard choices.

I certainly don't exempt Republicans from this indictment. After all, the Bush administration and Republican Congresses devoted six years to cutting taxes, increasing spending and ignoring budget deficits. Republicans and Democrats often differ on causes and constituencies. But they share a political culture. They are long on self-promotion and short on self-discipline. They do what sounds good and pleases partisans.

DOJ_NMG_0117631

Let me engage in a fantasy. Let me assume that Democrats and Republicans actually intended to address two serious national problems: first, our huge dependence on insecure sources of foreign oil; and second, the persistent mismatch between public resources (taxes) and public obligations (spending). What might they do? Herewith, a package of proposals:

Â· Enact an energy tax equivalent to $2 a gallon on gasoline -- introduced over six years, or about 33 cents annually. The purpose: to increase tax revenue and induce Americans to buy more fuel-efficient vehicles.

Â· Raise federal fuel-efficiency standards for cars from the present 27.5 miles per gallon to 40 mpg by 2020 and make similar increases for light trucks and SUVs. If fuel-efficient vehicles are to be favored, they must be available.

Â· Open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil production. This would help offset declining U.S. output elsewhere.

Â· Increase the top tax rate on dividends and capital gains (profits on stocks and other assets) from today's 15 percent to at least 25 percent.

Â· Require Congress to cut $1 of spending for each dollar of tax increase until the budget balances. After that, tax and spending changes would have to offset each other. Higher spending would require higher taxes -- and vice versa with exceptions for recessions.

Â· Require the Congressional Budget Office to confirm spending cuts -- and if they're not made, mandate automatic cuts to all non-defense programs, including Social Security and Medicare (Social Security checks would shrink, Medicare premiums would rise).

Â· Raise the eligibility ages for Social Security and Medicare gradually to 70 by 2029. At 65, people would have to buy into Medicare (that is, pay for coverage) until they reached eligibility for subsidized benefits.

A package like this would eliminate the budget deficit, probably within two or three years. It would temper our dependence on foreign oil (gasoline accounts for almost half of U.S. oil use) and let us begin to adapt to an older, healthier society (since 1970, life expectancy has increased seven years). Although it would be controversial, the package would be balanced. Budget measures would be split between tax increases and spending cuts; energy measures would be split between more production and more conservation. Finally, this approach would compel legislators to debate openly the value of higher spending vs. higher taxes.

That something like this won't soon be proposed -- let alone passed -- speaks volumes about our politics. Both parties have marketed government as a source of aid and comfort. Benefits are to be pursued, burdens shifted and choices avoided. Problems are to be blamed on scapegoats ("the liberals," "the rich"). There is little sense of common interests and shared obligations. Politicians resort to symbolic acts that seem more meaningful than they actually are: the minimum wage, for instance.

What results is a politically expedient world of make-believe that takes many sensible compromises off the table. Drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, for example, wouldn't ravage the environment. But for many Democrats, it's a cause celebre. Voting to open ANWR would be politically unpardonable. Similarly, some tax increases wouldn't destroy the economy; it has operated satisfactorily at higher levels of taxation. But for many Republicans, voting for any tax increase would also be a political death sentence. We are condemned to rituals that usually get us nowhere.

Fury Over Delegate's Remarks On Slavery (WP)

By Amy Gardner

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

RICHMOND, Jan. 16 -- A veteran Virginia lawmaker from suburban Richmond ignited a hot exchange in the House of Delegates on Tuesday after criticizing a proposal for the state to issue an apology for slavery and likening it to requiring Jews to apologize for "killing Christ."

Del. Frank D. Hargrove Sr., a Republican from Hanover County, told lawmakers that his comments were intended only to make the point that "not a soul in this legislature" had anything to do with slavery -- and that there is no point in dwelling on a chapter of U.S. history that all agree was repugnant.

"If we keep bringing this up, bringing this up -- I think this is a harmful idea just to keep recycling this thing which we all know and all despise and have no respect for," said Hargrove, a 25-year veteran of the House.

But Hargrove's remarks, first made in a newspaper interview on the holiday honoring civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., prompted a blistering censure from the 17-member Legislative Black Caucus. The Anti-Defamation League condemned Hargrove's comments about Jews.

His statements caused further consternation for Virginia Republicans, who are recovering from the defeat of U.S. Sen. George Allen last year and who are preparing for a tough election year in which all 140 General Assembly seats will come open.

Allen's defeat was attributed in part to his use of the word macaca -- a slur in some cultures -- to describe a young man of Indian descent. The one-term senator and former governor was accused of racial insensitivity, and his popularity plummeted -- notably in Northern Virginia, where affluent and well-educated newcomers are swaying the state's politics away from its more conservative, less racially tolerant past.

Hargrove's remarks don't help the GOP's image, said Del. Vincent F. Callahan Jr., a Fairfax County Republican and a 39-year House veteran whose district has been targeted by Democrats for the fall elections.

"People ought to have learned a lesson from this past year's senatorial campaign in Virginia," Callahan said. "We live in a different age as far as sensitivity goes and personal feelings. Particularly in a legislative body, where we operate in a goldfish bowl, we ought to be very careful about what we say in public."

The flap caused much greater outrage among Democrats and blacks in the legislature, who bristled at the timing of the remarks, not only on the King holiday but also at the start of a year during which Virginia is celebrating the 400th anniversary of the founding of Jamestown, where blacks were once sold as slaves.

"For 400 years, this commonwealth has not apologized, and I for one believe it is high time for that apology," said Del. A. Donald McEachin (D-Richmond), sponsor of the resolution, which would require the General Assembly to "atone for the involuntary servitude of Africans and call for reconciliation among all Virginians."

McEachin also rebuked Hargrove for making a theologically incorrect statement: that Jews killed Christ. "My faith teaches me that Christ died for the sins of all of mankind," he said.

Del. David L. Englin (D-Alexandria), who is Jewish, said that such comments give him reason to fear for his 7-year-old son's safety and self-esteem.

"As a young child, I dealt with verbal attacks and physical attacks from other children who believed that, as a Jew, I killed Christ," Englin said. "When people of the respect and stature of a member of this body perpetuate that notion, it troubles me."

Del. Dwight Clinton Jones (D-Richmond), chairman of the black caucus, scoffed at the idea that people should "get over" slavery "as if slavery was a birthday party that somebody had last Saturday night."

"If there are those who do not feel the need to apologize, I want to apologize," Jones continued. "I want to apologize to the mothers and fathers of my ancestors who were transported to this nation against their will in order that this nation might be built upon their backs. I want to apologize to the mothers and fathers of the civil rights generation who were hosed and bitten by dogs, and their children killed in churches as they burned, because of hatred that was put upon them. I want to apologize to them."

Hargrove, whose original remarks were reported in the Charlottesville Daily Progress, tried to make amends during a speech on the House floor. As fellow Republicans looked on warily -- notably House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith (R-Salem), who stood stiffly and silently at the back of the chamber -- Hargrove told Englin, his seatmate, that Englin's "skin was a little too thin."

"I didn't even know you were Jewish," said Hargrove, who turns 80 this month. "I don't care what your religion is. I really don't care."

Conservatives? On Network TV? It's True. (USAT)

By Melana Zyla Vickers

USA Today, January 17, 2007

It's no exaggeration to say that conservative female characters have been rarer on prime-time TV than either space aliens or same-sex kissing.

ABC's Invasion gave us semi-human aliens last year, and Fox's The OC gave us girl-on-girl kissing the year before that. Neither was a first — in 2001, Buffy the Vampire Slayer offered same-sex kissing between semi-humans. By contrast, it's rare, indeed, to find a prime-time character whose politics are similar to the 31 million American women who voted Republican in 2004.

Sure, TV has had about one conservative male per decade — over-the-top Reaganite Alex P. Keaton on Family Ties in the '80s, and over-the-top elitist Denny Crane on Boston Legal these days — as well as plenty of Donna Reed-type housewives whose views might have been conservative had they been aired along with the laundered sheets. But in the 50 years since The Loretta Young Show, there have been few female characters whose conservatism is a central element of a show, according to TV historian Walter Podrazik.

Lately, viewers have begun to see that perhaps times are changing.

This season, there's Harriet Hayes (Sarah Paulson), the socially conservative Christian comedienne on NBC's Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip, a drama about the making of a weekly comedy show. There's also Kitty Walker (Calista Flockhart), the Republican aide on ABC's Brothers & Sisters, a California family drama. Vague hints of the new diversity came in 2005-06, with Bree Van De Kamp (Marcia Cross) owning a gun on ABC's Desperate Housewives, the muscular if apolitical patriotism of Sidney Bristow (Jennifer Garner) on Alias, and patriotic, God-referencing dialogue from the soldiers' wives on CBS' The Unit.

DOJ_NMG_0117633

Now the conservatives are fully out of the closet, delivering heretofore unheard-of dialogue that may well be music to the ears of millions of conservative viewers. Consider this line from Brothers & Sisters' Kitty about African children dying of malaria: "What could save them? DDT. But environmentalists don't want to lift the ban on DDT because it might thin the shells of bird eggs. Excuse me while I projectile vomit on Al Gore." Meanwhile, Studio 60's Harriet praises her pastor and wittily dismisses cynicism about her values.

If the shows' producers can sustain the characters through the entire season, they may find they've germinated the entertainment-TV equivalent of Fox News: Mutually beneficial programming in which conservative viewers get one of their own to watch and cheer for, and network executives get a valuable demographic for advertisers.

The value of such shows may also reach beyond conservative viewers. When they depict a conservative in a positive, normal light instead of in the shadowy, conspiratorial darkness of Hollywood stereotypes, the shows play a small but important role in adjusting unfair perceptions.

But being able to sustain the characters' conservatism is a big "if." After all, TV writers are unlikely to meet many Republicans in Hollywood, says Jon Robin Baitz, creator and executive producer of Brothers & Sisters. This isn't to say that there are no such conservatives in Hollywood. There must be one or two toiling away out there. But as historian Podrazik puts it, Hollywood's social values "seem to coincide with the Democratic Party agenda."

The leftward lean opens the risk that Kitty and Harriet will become liberal caricatures of conservatives, or worse, go wobbly ideologically. Kitty on Brothers & Sisters has already been taking heat. After saying in an early episode that the Iraq war "was necessary when it began," she later said the war "is in desperate need of re-examination … that cannot come until we acknowledge that the war itself was a mistake." While the shift is consistent with that of some real-world conservatives, producer Baitz says many viewers wrote to complain.

Criticism of such shows is likely to keep coming. Ted Baehr, chairman of the Christian Film & Television Commission, a private group that reviews movies and TV shows, says conservative Christians' wider complaint about TV is they don't "want to be appeased by one character, the token character. They want a worldview."

Whether conservatives get that worldview remains to be seen. But Baitz predicts TV will keep pace with the times. "It flies in the face of the empirical reality of our time," namely the patriotic, post-9/11 era, for Hollywood to continue to ignore conservatives. But diversifying won't be easy. Baitz admits, "I am not comfortable with (Kitty). She is not me." To develop her character, Baitz talked to GOP pundit Mary Matalin and gets a litmus test from "family and friends who don't just live on the two coasts and who aren't rushing out to buy (leftist magazine) The Nation."

Baitz says that while he might not be comfortable with Kitty, neither is he comfortable having her abandon "what she believes because what she believes is harder to believe in."

Such discomfort is a good thing if it stiffens TV script writers' spines: Brothers & Sisters rates highly with about 13 million viewers who are primarily female, suburban and Midwestern — red-state viewers if ever there were such a Nielsen category. If their new heroines abandon their conservatism because Hollywood finds it hard to believe in, Hollywood shouldn't be surprised to see these viewers leave in search of programming that doesn't treat them like alien beings.

U.S., N.Korean Nuke Negotiators To Meet (AP)

By Bo-mi Lim

AP, January 17, 2007

The U.S. negotiator at North Korean nuclear talks will meet Wednesday with his North Korean counterpart in Germany for a second day, South Korea's foreign minister said.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill and the North's Kim Kye Gwan met in Berlin for several hours Tuesday, according to the U.S. State Department. South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-soon told reporters the two would meet again Wednesday.

Song said the "meeting should produce the groundwork for reaching agreements on measures to implement the initial steps of" a September 2005 accord, in which the North agreed to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

No progress has been made in implementing that agreement, and in October, North Korea tested a nuclear weapon, drawing strong criticism from world leaders.

Hill and Kim were trying "to set the groundwork for the next round of six-party talks, to ensure those talks will be productive," State Department spokesman Tom Casey told reporters in Washington on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0117634

The latest round of negotiations — involving the two Koreas, Russia, China, Japan and the U.S. — ended in December with no agreement on disarmament nor a date for further talks.

During five days of meetings in Beijing, negotiators from other delegations said North Korean negotiators refused to talk about the country's nuclear weapons program and stuck instead to its demand that the United States first had to remove its financial restrictions on North Korea.

Washington imposed the restrictions against a Macau-based bank holding North Korean accounts for Pyongyang's alleged involvement in counterfeiting and money laundering. That led to a freezing of the North's assets at the bank worth around $24 million.

The U.S. held separate financial talks with North Korea on the sidelines of the Beijing talks but made no progress. The two sides have provisionally agreed to hold financial talks next week.

Song cautioned that the Berlin meeting does not signal any shift in North Korea's position that the financial issue be addressed first. However, he said the meeting could mean North Korean negotiators are now ready to present the government's position on U.S. proposals.

The U.S. has offered security guarantees, a peace treaty and normalization of relations with the North if the communist country dismantles its atomic weapons program and laid out a timeline for implementation. The North has yet to respond to the U.S. proposal.

Casey said Hill had traveled to Berlin for a speech Wednesday at the American Academy. It was unclear why Kim was in Germany.

Hill is scheduled to travel to Asia this week for discussions with his counterparts. He will be in Seoul Friday, in Beijing Saturday and in Tokyo Sunday.

US, North Korea Envoys Meet On Renewing Nuclear Talks (AFP)

AFP, January 17, 2007

Top US envoy Christopher Hill met with his North Korean counterpart Kim Kye-gwan in Berlin to discuss the possibility of resuming multilateral nuclear talks, the State Department said.

"They did meet in Berlin," Gonzo Gallegos, a department spokesman, confirmed, saying details of the discussions were not immediately available.

Assistant secretary of state Hill was reportedly in the German capital to attend a forum and the meeting was not expected.

In a recent statement, Hill said that the nuclear talks aimed to end North Korea's atomic weapons program were slow but progressing. "It requires a lot of patience," he said.

The Berlin meeting came ahead of Hill's visits beginning Friday to South Korea, China and Japan to continue consultations with key partners in the six-party talks on how to make progress in the next round, the State Department said last week.

China, Japan, the two Koreas, Russia and the United States met for five days in December after a year-long break, but no progress was made toward dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

The six-party negotiations were suspended in late 2005 after North Korea walked out in protest at US financial sanctions imposed on a Macau bank accused of illicit dealings on behalf of Pyongyang.

Before the breakdown, North Korea signed a statement agreeing to give up its nuclear weapons program in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees from the other five states.

But it then went ahead and conducted its first nuclear weapons test in October, sparking international condemnation and UN sanctions.

Under intense pressure from its main ally, China, and with a promise from the United States that it would discuss the financial sanctions issue, North Korea agreed to return to the talks last month.

Seoul Helps All North Korean Defectors (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

In response to the article "Defections Tweak Seoul" ("Leading the News," Jan. 9), Evan Ramstad made a number of incorrect assertions about the South Korean government's handling of Mr. Choi Wook-Il, a South Korean citizen who recently escaped 31 years of captivity in North Korea. The article claims the South Korean consulate in Shenyang refused to assist Mr. Choi, until public pressure forced officials to provide refuge for the 67-year-old. I would like to correct your accounting of the events.

First, it is not true that the South Korean consulate general in Shenyang started working to secure Mr. Choi's protection only after the Korean public expressed outrage at the government. In fact, ever since it became aware of his defection from the North, the South Korean government has consistently exerted its utmost diplomatic efforts for Mr. Choi's speedy repatriation home.

Second, it is a completely unfounded allegation that the South Korean government is walking a tightrope with North Korea and the United States, and consequently showing a passive attitude in supporting South Koreans kidnapped by the North. The South Korean government has dealt with the North Korean refugee problem in the spirit of brotherhood and from a humanitarian basis -- and has accepted all North Korean refugees in foreign countries in all cases, if they wish to come to South Korea. The South Korean government has also cooperated closely with related international organizations such as the the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the governments of countries in which North Korean defectors are likely to stay, in a bid to prevent the possibility of such defectors being sent back to North Korea against their will.

Third, it is not true that the South Korean government has reduced the resettlement subsidy for North Korean defectors. There has only been a change in the way the subsidy is provided. Originally, the South Korean government provided a portion of the subsidy in a lump sum, to resettle North Korean defectors. However, these defectors experienced many difficulties in spending the government subsidy effectively, often stemming from their unfamiliarity with a market-based economic system. As a result, while maintaining the overall size of the resettlement subsidy, the South Korean government decided to reduce the initial cash support and provide, instead, other supporting services to the defectors, such as expanded job training, educational opportunities and increased workplace salaries.

Moscow, Beijing Eye Space Weapons (WT)

By Bill Gertz
The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

China and Russia are developing space weapons and are among several nations working on systems to threaten U.S. satellites with lasers or missiles, says the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency.

In Senate testimony last week, Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples for the first time raised Pentagon concerns about secret Chinese and Russian space weapons programs.

"Russia and China continue to be the primary states of concern regarding military space and counterspace programs," Gen. Maples said at the annual threat briefing of the Senate intelligence committee.

Gen. Maples said that "several countries continue to develop capabilities that have the potential to threaten U.S. space assets, and some have already deployed systems with inherent anti-satellite capabilities, such as satellite-tracking laser range-finding devices and nuclear-armed ballistic missiles."

Other countries are working on improving space-object tracking and "kinetic or directed energy weapons capabilities."

Gen. Maples did not discuss the reported testing of a Chinese anti-satellite laser against a U.S. satellite, which triggered high-level Bush administration worries about Beijing's growing space-weapons program.

U.S. officials said details about the Chinese anti-satellite laser shot remain classified so as not to alert China about U.S. knowledge of what intelligence officials say may have been a test shot of an anti-satellite weapon.

China has developed several types of ground-based lasers with Russian and Israeli technology, U.S. officials have said.

Russia developed anti-satellite weapons during the Cold War, and U.S. officials think the Russian military is continuing work on the weapons, which include both anti-satellite missiles and ground-based lasers.

Both Russia and China deny that they are building space weapons and have sought to curb U.S. space defenses through a proposed international ban on weapons in space.

The Air Force in 2004 deployed the 76th Space Control Squadron, which can disrupt or knock out foreign satellites using electronic jammers from the ground.

Nations other than Russia and China that have space capabilities in key areas also "will acquire military and commercial space-based assets," Gen. Maples said.

"Increasing levels of international cooperation, along with the growing number of commercial space consortia, is allowing the proliferation of advanced satellite technologies and knowledge of space systems operations to become available to nations lacking a domestic space capability," he said.

Gen. Maples said that building space weapons is "financially taxing" and that "most countries assessed to be pursuing these capabilities are not expected to acquire them within the next few years."

He warned, however, that less-developed states and "nonstate entities" also "are pursuing more limited and asymmetric approaches that do not require excessive financial resources or a high-tech industrial base."

Why Is Egypt Airing Insurgent TV From Iraq? (CSM)

By Sarah Gauch

The Christian Science Monitor, January 17, 2007

Al Zawraa television station, the face of Iraq's Sunni insurgency, shows roadside bombs blowing up American tanks, dead and bloody Iraqi children, and insurgent snipers taking aim and firing.

And all this blatant anti-Americanism is broadcasting 24/7 on an Egyptian government-controlled satellite provider from one of Washington's closest allies. Even though Iraq and the US have asked Egypt to pull the plug, the station remains on the air.

The question is, why? While Nilesat, which broadcasts Al Zawraa, argues that it's airing the channel for purely commercial reasons, analysts point to the political benefits for Egypt.

Some say the country's reluctance to shut down the channel shows that Egypt, predominantly Sunni, may be taking a stand against what it sees as the unjust aggressiveness of Iraq's Shiite-led government and the dangers of Iran's influence there.

"With Iran flexing its muscles in Iraq and Lebanon and talking about becoming a nuclear power, all of this puts the Sunni Arab regimes – Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan – on the defensive," says Lawrence Pintak, director of American University in Cairo's television journalism program and author of "Reflections in a Bloodshot Lens: America, Islam, & the War of Ideas."

Mr. Pintak says Egypt's decision to keep Al Zawraa on the air plays into the Sunni-Shiite cold war that has descended on the region, caused largely by sectarian bloodshed in Iraq and Iran's nuclear ambitions. In essence, he says, it's a show of support for fellow Sunnis.

American officials have reportedly called the station "utterly offensive," saying that closing it down is a priority.

But one Egyptian government official, who asked to remain anonymous, reiterated Nilesat's stand that the station remains on air purely for commercial reasons. "We're merely a carrier of this station. We're not producing it. This is a straightforward business deal," he says, adding that, "none of us would reject the principle of freedom of speech and broadcasting for everyone."

Egypt has a history, though, of arresting bloggers and journalists and violently dispersing protests critical of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's government. On Saturday, Egyptian authorities detained an Al Jazeera journalist for allegedly fabricating scenes of torture in Egyptian police stations. The journalist was later released.

If Nilesat should buckle under US pressure, however, Al Zawraa will soon have other venues.

Station owner Mishan al-Jabouri says he's just signed contracts with Paris-based satellite provider Hot Bird and Emirates-based Arabsat. He also hopes to sign a contract soon with an American satellite company, which he didn't want to name, and to open new studios in Paris. American subtitles, too, are in the offing, he says.

"I want to show people everywhere what the Americans are doing to my country," says Mr. Jabouri, a former member of Iraq's parliament, now based in Damascus, "what American democracy has done to Iraq, how it has killed children, what has happened in the prisons, how the Americans gave Iraq to Iran."

While many see Nilesat as Al Zawraa's staunch supporter, Jabouri complains that the satellite provider is already reacting to US pressure by raising technical obstacles that prevent him from sending new footage from the field, forcing him to loop already-broadcast material.

Al Zawraa began two years ago as an above-ground, hard-line Sunni TV station, based in Iraq, until the Iraqi government closed it down last November, around the time Saddam Hussein was sentenced to death. Today, it's an underground station with brutal, no-holds-barred content, often amateur, shaky footage showing American soldiers crumpling to the ground after being shoot, and alleged American atrocities against Iraqi civilians. The station's anchors wear military fatigues and rail against the Shiite-led Iraqi government.

The Iranian flag is superimposed over Iraq's Shiite leaders shown on air and news crawls call on viewers "to liberate Iraq from occupying US and Iranian forces" and say that "the mafia" of Moqtada al-Sadr are all "criminals and thieves."

The station closely resembles Islamic extremist websites, with even religious chanting backing up some footage, although Jabouri emphasizes that his station has no ties to Al Qaeda.

The business deal between Al Zawraa and Nilesat is all the more curious, commentators say, since Islamic extremism remains a threat in Egypt and Al Zawraa appears the perfect militant recruiting tool. But, it seems Egypt is more concerned about reasserting its leadership in the Sunni Arab world than it is in gagging a possible militant mouthpiece, analysts say.

This is also a sign that Egypt may be further distancing itself from Washington. Recently, it defiantly announced a nuclear energy program of its own and criticized Mr. Hussein's execution last month.

DOJ_NMG_0117637

However, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with Egyptian officials Monday to shore up this country's support for American efforts in Iraq. Ms. Rice is traveling through the Middle East on a trip intended largely to bolster support for President Bush's new plan to stabilize Iraq and to reassure the US's Arab allies of its commitment to Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking. Arab states are anxious for Washington to renew efforts to find a solution to the historical conflict, which they say is the underlying cause of the region's political problems.

In Egypt, Ms. Rice said, "We share risk and we share responsibility, because this is an area of the world which will very much be affected by how Iraq turns out."

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit, a frequent critic, was ready to give Mr. Bush's plan the benefit of the doubt. "We are supportive of that plan because we are hopeful that the plan would lead ensure the stability, the unity, and the cohesion of the Iraqi government."

Another Perspective, Or Jihad TV? (NYT)

By Judea Pearl

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

Los Angeles

IN late 2001, three months before my son, the Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, was kidnapped, he interviewed the influential Qatari cleric Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi, and asked him about suicide bombings against Israeli civilians. The sheik replied with a novel twist of logic. “Israeli society in general is armed,” he said, implying that Israeli civilians — including women and children, doctors and journalists — are legitimate targets.

At the time, it was still surprising to see an authoritative Muslim cleric give religious license to the ideology of terror — granting the faithful permission to elevate their own grievances above the norms of civilized society.

Daniel would fall victim to that same ideology when he was abducted and murdered in Pakistan. After his death, I discovered that Sheik Qaradawi is the host of a weekly program on the Qatar-based TV news network Al Jazeera called “Sharia and Life.” He uses this forum to preach his new morality to millions of Arabic-speaking viewers, including Hamas operatives, Al Qaeda recruits, schoolteachers and impressionable Muslim youths. “We have the ‘children bomb,’ and these human bombs must continue until liberation,” he told his audience in 2002. Consistent with this logic and morality, Sheik Qaradawi later extended his Koranic blessing to suicide bombing against American civilians in Iraq.

A few in the Arab world have taken issue with his calls for violence. Al Ittihad, a newspaper in the United Arab Emirates, editorialized in 2004 that the beheading of two American hostages in Iraq happened “in direct response to Qaradawi’s fatwa and incitement, which permits the killing of American civilians.” Yet few, in the Middle East or the West, seem willing to condemn Al Jazeera’s management for giving the cleric regular airtime.

None of this might seem to matter much to Americans except that for two months now Al Jazeera has been taking its mixture of news coverage and extremist propagandizing to our front door through an English-language station. Called Al Jazeera English, the network can be received via satellite or streamed over the Internet. It has bureaus in London and Washington, and has recruited such high-profile Western journalists as Sir David Frost as correspondents.

In part, this is promising. The Arabic version of Al Jazeera and its various spinoffs on satellite TV and the Internet are usually credited with having a positive influence on Arab society. True, Al Jazeera’s coverage has placed an emphasis on younger leaders, reformers and successful businessmen who may serve as role models for today’s Arab youth. And it has brought — as the press usually does — a degree of inquisitiveness and openness that could become a useful engine of reform in the region.

Westerners have been quick to point out these benefits. A critic for The Times said that “though Al Jazeera English looks at news events through a non-Western prism, it also points to where East and West actually meet.” Time magazine noted, “arguably nothing — including the Bush administration’s panoply of democratization programs — has done more than Al Jazeera to open minds and challenge authority in the Middle East.”

But what should concern Westerners is that the ideology of men like Sheik Qaradawi saturates many of the network’s programs, and is gaining wider acceptance among Muslim youths in the West. In its “straight” news coverage on its Arabic TV broadcasts and Web sites, Al Jazeera’s reports consistently amplify radical Islamist sentiments (although without endorsing violence explicitly).

For example, the phrase “war on terror” is invariably preceded by the contemptuous prefix “so-called.” The words “terror” and “insurgency” are rarely uttered with a straight face, usually replaced with “resistance” or “struggle.” The phrase “war in Iraq” is often replaced by “war on Iraq” or “war against Iraq.” A suicide bombing is called a “commando attack” or, occasionally, a “paradise operation.”

Al Jazeera's Web site can be less subtle. On Dec. 12, after religious leaders and heads of state all over the world condemned President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran for staging a Holocaust denial conference in Tehran, the headline on the site read, "Ahmadinejad Praised by Participants of the Holocaust Conference in Tehran, but Condemned by Zionists in Europe."

In short, Al Jazeera's editors choreograph a worldview in which an irreconcilable struggle rages between an evil-meaning Western oppressor and its helpless, righteous Arab victims. Most worrisome, perhaps, it often reports on supposed Western conspiracies behind most Arab hardships or failings, thus fueling the sense of helplessness, humiliation and anger among Muslim youths and helping turn them into potential recruits for terrorist organizations.

The question is, to what extent will this pathological worldview infiltrate Al Jazeera's English channel, which is still trying to find its voice? David Marash, a former "Nightline" correspondent who is the American anchor on Al Jazeera English, acknowledges such a possibility, but dismisses the responsibility of the network. "Undoubtedly, some Al Jazeera programs may have inspired some social misfits to undertake terrorism," he told The New York Sun. "The danger with information is that some people will take it the wrong way."

Still, with the growing number of social misfits in society, and the growing confusion between "information" and deception in the news media, the danger of fueling combustible anger in some viewers cannot be ignored, especially when pumped subliminally by well-respected Western anchors.

Let's face it: when a terrorist attack is described as a "martyrdom" in a thick Middle Eastern accent, it can be dismissed by Americans as a peculiarity of cultural differences. But imagine the effect of the word if spoken in David Frost's cultured British tones. This is why, even if Al Jazeera English waters down its alarmist content, it should still be seen as a potential threat: it will bestow respectability upon the practices of its parent network in Qatar, which continues, among other things, to broadcast Sheik Qaradawi's teachings.

I wouldn't call for banning Al Jazeera English in the United States even if that were possible. It is important to extend a hand to the network because it can become a force for good; but it is as important for our news organizations to scrutinize its content and let its viewers know when anti-Western wishes are subverting objective truth. As Al Jazeera on the whole feels the heat of world media attention, we can hope that it will learn to harness its popularity in the service of humanity, progress and moderation.

Israeli General Who Led War Against Hezbollah Resigns (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

JERUSALEM, Wednesday, Jan. 17 — The Israeli military's chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, submitted his resignation after facing months of fierce criticism over the military's performance in last summer's war in Lebanon, officials said early Wednesday.

In a separate development, an Israeli prosecutor on Tuesday ordered a criminal investigation to determine whether Prime Minister Ehud Olmert exercised improper influence in the privatization of the country's second-largest bank in 2005.

The two developments were the latest blows to a political and military leadership that have been tarnished by its collective handling of the Lebanon war and a number of scandals.

The Israeli public has widely blamed General Halutz, along with Mr. Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz, for mismanaging the 34 days of fighting with Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon, which turned into a much tougher battle than Israelis expected.

General Halutz, 58, sent his letter of resignation to Mr. Olmert, saying he was taking responsibility for the war. "For me, the concept of responsibility is everything," General Halutz wrote, according to Israeli Army radio.

General Halutz rose through the ranks and was head of the air force before becoming the military's chief of staff in 2005.

When Hezbollah staged a surprise cross-border raid on July 12, killing three Israeli soldiers and seizing two more, Israel immediately responded with intense airstrikes, and the war was under way.

Israel relied heavily on the air force to strike at Hezbollah's rocket launchers, but the Lebanese group was able to continue firing 100 or more rockets daily on northern Israel throughout the war, to the great frustration of the Israelis.

Mr. Olmert and Mr. Peretz, who both have limited military experience, were seen by many as indecisive and reluctant to send a large ground force into southern Lebanon, fearing heavy casualties.

General Halutz, in turn, was seen as overly reliant on air power. In addition, the Lebanese reported that many of their casualties were civilians, which worked in many quarters to turn international opinion against the Israeli campaign.

A United Nations resolution brought the fighting to a halt on Aug. 14, and Israel claimed victory, but many saw the battle as inconclusive, or at least far short of a decisive victory that many Israelis had expected.

General Halutz faced further criticism when it was disclosed that he sold part of his stock portfolio only hours after the fighting began on July 12.

He said he had left a message for his broker before the Hezbollah raid. When the broker called back several hours later, the fighting had already begun. The general told the broker to sell some mutual funds as planned. But the episode only added to the sense of public outrage.

Just hours before General Halutz resigned, Mr. Olmert received the news that he would be formally investigated for his role in the 2005 privatization of Bank Leumi.

The criminal investigation, which is expected to last months, only adds to Mr. Olmert's woes. Elected less than a year ago, his popularity has plummeted in opinion polls.

Mr. Olmert is the fourth consecutive Israeli prime minister to be investigated. No charges were brought in the other three cases, involving Benjamin Netanyahu, Ehud Barak and Ariel Sharon.

According to reports in the Israeli news media, the investigation will seek to determine whether Mr. Olmert, as finance minister in 2005, tried to guide the privatization sale of Bank Leumi toward friends.

Ultimately, a stake in the bank was sold to companies that have not been linked to the investigation.

However, the Justice Ministry said in a statement that "preliminary findings have led to the conclusion that enough evidence has been gathered to justify opening a criminal investigation."

Mr. Olmert has denied any wrongdoing, saying last week that, "I have no doubt that the process was conducted in the best way possible." His office said Tuesday evening that the "prime minister will cooperate with any investigation."

Israeli Head Of Military Quits After War Critique (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 17 -- Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, head of the Israel Defense Forces, resigned abruptly Tuesday after one of his predecessors presented findings of an internal review that sharply criticized the military's leadership during the war with Hezbollah last summer.

Since the end of the 33-day war, Halutz has come under heavy pressure from senior reserve officers to step down. The war failed to achieve the stated goals of freeing two Israeli soldiers captured by the Lebanese Shiite militia in July and stopping Hezbollah rocket attacks on Israeli cities.

But Halutz insisted as recently as two weeks ago that he would remain in his post unless called on to resign by the Winograd Commission, an inquiry panel established by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to examine the performance of the military and political leadership during the war.

The commission's interim report was due in coming weeks. Olmert, who has also been severely criticized for his management of the war, reportedly expressed regret over Halutz's decision to resign after trying to persuade him to change his mind.

"It is the nature of people not to be overjoyed serving in a system that is not appreciated and not protected by those it represents," Halutz wrote in his letter of resignation, according to a translation published online by the newspaper Haaretz.

"We must promise never to reach a situation in which people of quality would hesitate to tie their fate and future with" the Israel Defense Forces, he wrote. "Neither good education nor a strong economy would help us then, and there is a danger that the threats the state of Israel faces will become more substantial."

Halutz was appointed the first air force officer to lead Israel's military in July 2005 by then-Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Among his first duties was to oversee the withdrawal of Israeli settlements and military installations from the Gaza Strip, an operation praised for its speed and precision. But it won him few supporters among hawkish lawmakers and reserve officers, some of whom opposed the withdrawal on strategic and ideological grounds.

Sharon's decision to appoint Halutz reflected the shifting priorities within the military from infantry to air power. Most Israelis serve in the military because of mandatory service requirements, making the chief of staff position one of the most highly esteemed and scrutinized in the country.

Born in 1948 in the Israeli town of Hagor to a Jewish family of Iranian descent, Halutz joined the air force in 1966. He flew F-4 Phantoms during the war of attrition in the Sinai between the 1967 and 1973 Arab-Israeli wars and was credited with shooting down three combat aircraft in the 1973 Arab-Israeli conflict, known in Israel as the Yom Kippur War.

The sharp public criticism of his leadership during the most recent Lebanon war, much of it from senior reserve officers, has focused on Halutz's heavy reliance on air power against an entrenched guerrilla force often fighting from residential areas.

DOJ_NMG_0117640

Hezbollah fired about 4,000 short- and medium-range rockets into Israel, including more than 100 on the last day of fighting. The Israeli military said 117 soldiers died in combat during the fighting. In addition, 41 Israeli civilians were killed, most of them by rocket fire.

Halutz also came under public pressure when it was revealed that in the first hours of the war he took the time to phone his stockbroker with instructions to sell portions of his portfolio, fearing a decline in value because of the conflict.

Earlier Tuesday, Dan Shomron, a retired lieutenant general who led Israel's military from 1987 to 1991, told the Israeli parliament's defense and foreign affairs committee that the summer war in Lebanon was "run without any goal."

"The prime minister instructed the army to halt the rocket fire on Israel, but the army failed to translate it into a military objective," Shomron told the committee, although he did not call on Halutz to step down.

Halutz is the third general to resign as a result of the war against Hezbollah, whose performance against Israel's modern military has strengthened its position within Lebanon's fractious political system and drawn praise across the Arab world.

Maj. Gen. Udi Adam, head of the Northern Command, resigned in September. Halutz accepted the resignation two months later of Brig. Gen. Gal Hirsch, an esteemed younger officer who led the Galilee Division, the unit responsible for the Israel-Lebanon border. Hirsch called on Halutz to resign at the same time.

In his resignation letter, Halutz expressed "great pride" in his career and said he had "fulfilled my obligations."

Maj. Gen. Moshe Kaplinsky, the deputy chief of staff, will at least temporarily replace Halutz.

Military Leader Resigns Over War (WT/AP)

By Amy Teibel

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Israeli army commander Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, under fire for failures in last summer's war in Lebanon, has resigned, the Defense Ministry said early today.

Gen. Halutz has been under pressure to step down since the end of the 34-day war, which failed to defeat the anti-Israel militant group Hezbollah and force the return of two captured soldiers.

Israeli launched a full-scale attack on Lebanese Hezbollah guerrillas after they seized the two men and killed three other soldiers in a cross-border raid July 12.

Army Radio reported that the general sent his letter of resignation to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and took responsibility for the outcome of the war.

"For me, the concept of responsibility is everything," Gen. Halutz wrote, according to Army Radio.

Mr. Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz also have been criticized for decisions made before and during the war.

In its announcement of Gen. Halutz's resignation, the military spokesman's office said the general submitted his resignation because the dozens of military inquiries into the war had been completed.

None of the inquiries concluded that he should step aside or be replaced.

The spokesman's office said both Mr. Olmert and Mr. Peretz have to accept the resignation before it can go into effect.

The offices of the two Israeli leaders did not release any comments.

The United Nations, Israeli and Lebanese officials said the war left more than 1,000 people dead on both sides. Lebanon's Higher Relief Council, a government organization, said the majority of those killed were Lebanese civilians. UNICEF said about a third were children.

The fatalities included 159 in Israel, including 39 civilians killed in rocket attacks.

Israel said 600 Hezbollah fighters were killed, but that figure has not been substantiated. Hezbollah said 250 of its fighters were killed.

An inquiry by a former chief of staff found that the war's goals were vaguely defined and that command centers performed faulty work.

Reserve generals have criticized Gen. Halutz, a former air force chief, for focusing too much on aerial bombardments and not enough on ground operations.

Maj. Gen. Moshe Kaplinski, who was dispatched to the Lebanon front to assume command during the war, told Israeli television last week that he would be a candidate for chief of staff after Gen. Halutz leaves. Gen. Kaplinski is serving as deputy chief of staff.

Bush, UN's Ban See Cooperation On Darfur, Iran (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117641

US President George W. Bush and UN chief Ban Ki-moon worked to push past any lingering US-UN ill will and vowed to work together on issues like Middle East peace and violence in Darfur.

"You want to talk, pick up the phone and call me," Bush twice encouraged Ban as they wrapped up an hour-long meeting that also covered Iran, Iraq and climate change, according to UN sources.

Ban, who took over January 1 as secretary general, told reporters after the meeting that he would push "vigorously" for UN reforms and urged the world community to give war-torn Iraq "all possible assistance."

"The Middle East is a source of grave concern. This deteriorating situation in Iraq and Israel needs (the) urgent attention of the international community," Ban said outside the White House.

"Particularly when it comes to Iraq, the international community should have all possible assistance to help the Iraqi government and people to restore peace and stability and recover from economic devastation," said Ban.

During their joint public appearance in the Oval Office, Ban and Bush struck a cordial tone, noting their past cooperation on the North Korean nuclear crisis when the UN chief was South Korea's foreign minister, and vowed to work closely on other issues like Iran's atomic ambitions and violence in Darfur.

"The United States wants to work with the United Nations to achieve peace through the spread of freedom," said Bush. "I admired the way you handled your previous job, and I'm confident you'll do a fine job now."

"I want to thank you for your commitment to help the suffering people of Darfur. I wish you all the best as you work hard to convince the president of the Sudan that it's in his interests and in the world's interest that he allow enhanced African Union peacekeepers in," said Bush.

Bush did not mention Washington's repeated called for UN reforms -- in US Security Council membership, peacekeeping operations and transparency following the ethics scandals surrounding the oil-for-food deal with Iraq.

But Ban told reporters after the meeting that he was pushing "vigorously" for such changes, while a UN source said Ban was leading the way towards greater financial disclosures by top UN officials.

"The United Nations should change with much more efficiency and effectiveness and mobility and the highest level of ethical standard," said the secretary general.

Behind closed doors, Bush and Ban worked to banish any lingering tensions between the United Nations, which did not explicitly authorize the war in Iraq, and the United States, the world body's biggest donor and frequent critic.

But the meeting yielded no breakthroughs on Iraq, the Middle East peace process and efforts to limit climate change -- an issue the secretary general brought up as their face-to-face talks wrapped up, the sources said.

Ban called climate change "a global problem that needs to be addressed globally," while Bush retorted that "folks who sign on to protocols like Kyoto need to live by them," referring to the UN pact aiming to cut emissions of so-called "greenhouse gases," according to one UN source.

The US president was expected to lay out his climate change approach in his annual State of the Union speech on January 23.

On Iraq, Bush told Ban the United States "would appreciate any further role, political, not military" for the United Nations, while Ban said the world body was "constrained by the ongoing security problems," the UN source said.

On North Korea, Ban and Bush agreed on the need to pursue six-nation talks grouping China, Japan, North and South Korea, Russia, and the United States, the source said.

But UN sources said Ban was also "contemplating" the possibility of naming a special envoy, while stressing that "it's not going to happen immediately."

Ban Vows Reform At U.N. (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

New U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon yesterday pledged to complete much-needed reforms at the United Nations and urged all nations to make efforts to secure Iraq, saying the war-torn nation "is the whole world's problem."

Meeting with President Bush in the Oval Office yesterday, the South Korean vowed to tackle the world's most pressing issues -- Iraq, the Middle East, Sudan, Lebanon, Somalia and North Korea.

Afterward, speaking with reporters, Mr. Ban promised to revamp the troubled organization, which has been a sore point with the Bush administration.

"The United Nations should change with much more efficiency and effectiveness and mobility, and highest level of ethical standard," he said. "I'm very much committed to carrying out this reform and I need strong support of all member states and staff of the United Nations in carrying these reform measures."

The Bush administration has long complained that U.N. bureaucracy has compromised the once-effective organization, and dispatched staunch critic John R. Bolton to New York to address its concerns. During the run-up to the Iraq war, Mr. Bush said the body was teetering on the brink of irrelevancy, but in more recent times has effectively pressed member states into action on several issues, including Lebanon and Iran.

While neither Mr. Bush nor Mr. Ban mentioned Iraq in their brief Oval Office comments, the new secretary-general sounded a far more agreeable tone than did his predecessor, Kofi Annan. Before departing his post, Mr. Annan called the Iraq war "illegal" and declared the country safer under dictator Saddam Hussein, who slaughtered hundreds of thousands of Iraqis during his rule.

The secretary-general's long day in Washington ended with a dinner for "120 of his best new friends" at the Kalorama home of Esther Coopersmith, Washington's reigning "hostest with the mostest." Rep. Tom Lantos, California Democrat, saluted him with an emotional toast to the United States as a partner with the U.N. "Had it not been for the United States I would not be here," said Mr. Lantos, a Holocaust survivor, "and had it not been for the United States your country would not have survived. You and I have a special bond. We do not believe the United States to be the 'great Satan.' "

Mr. Ban answered in kind, taking note of South Korea's debt to the United States and the U.N. In a lighter vein, he quipped that if the New Orleans Saints should oppose the New England Patriots in the Super Bowl, "I'm glad that as a diplomat I won't be forced to choose between God and country."

Earlier in the day, Mr. Bush appeared pleased to be starting with a clean slate, and smiled often as he assured Mr. Ban that he planned to continue to work with the world body -- although he stopped mid-sentence to change a word he may not have meant to use.

"The United States is willing -- wants to work with the United Nations to achieve a peace through the spread of freedom," Mr. Bush said. "I appreciate so very much how you opened up the discussion with a strong commitment to democracy and freedom," he told Mr. Ban.

For his part, Mr. Ban expressed hope that the United States would continue its role as a U.N. leader as he urged continued support for the organization.

"I would need strong participation and support of the United States in all activities of the United Nations. In fact, I believe that the United Nations and United States have shared objectives -- peace and security, freedom, democracy. All these important goals and ideas are what the United States is also trying to achieve," he said.

While neither leader spoke of Iraq after their meeting, Mr. Ban spoke freely afterward with reporters on the White House driveway.

"Iraq and elsewhere needs an urgent attention of the international community," he said. "Particularly when it comes to Iraq, the international community should have all possible assistance to help Iraqi government and people to restore peace and stability and recover from economic devastation."

He expanded on the topic in a speech later in the day, delivered at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"Iraq is the whole world's problem. I pledge my best efforts to help the Iraqi people in their quest for a more stable and prosperous Iraq. The U.N. role can assist in building an inclusive political process, helping to cultivate a regional environment supportive of a transition to stability, and pursuing reconstruction," he said.

During his speech, the South Korean spoke of his first visit to Washington 45 years ago, when, at 18, he visited the White House and met President Kennedy.

"That was a magical experience for a young person like me. It gave me something even more significant than the thrill of the moment. It offered me a personal connection to this country, and to the ideas and principles it stands for," he said.

Mr. Ban laid out four areas he plans to focus on in his new post: the genocide in Darfur, the Middle East, North Korea, and Kosovo, where he said the world must continue "working for a conclusive resolution to the uncertainty that still hangs over Kosovo's status."

On North Korea, Mr. Ban said he would "try my best" to facilitate six-party talks, which seek to discourage the communist state from pursuing nuclear weapons.

Russian Forces On High Terror Alert (AP)

By Steve Gutterman

AP, January 17, 2007

Russian authorities have ordered security forces on high alert after receiving information from foreign officials pointing to the threat of a terrorist attack on public transportation, officials said Tuesday.

Authorities were checking information about the potential threat, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0117643

A federal anti-terrorism headquarters received information "from foreign partners ... about the possibility a subversive terrorist act could be committed on ground transport and in the metro," according to a statement confirmed by a Federal Security Service official who said he was not authorized to give his name.

Federal Security Service chief Nikolai Patrushev, who also heads the anti-terror center, ordered anti-terror forces on high alert and called for stepped-up measures to prevent any attack, the statement said. It offered no details on the nature of the threat or the measures to be taken.

It was unclear what country the information about the potential threat came from; Russia cooperates against terrorism with countries around the world, including the United States.

The statement did not say whether the threat was limited to any particular location in Russia, where several cities have subway systems. Security was stepped up in Moscow's extensive subway system, including by increasing the number of teams with bomb-sniffing dogs, the RIA-Novosti news agency quoted a Moscow police official as saying.

The statement, read in part during news programs on state-run television, urged Russians to be alert and to cooperate with law enforcement authorities and inform them of anything suspicious.

It said the warning was received by the Federal Operative Headquarters, which is under the auspices of the National Anti-terrorism Committee, a body created by President Vladimir Putin early last year to coordinate anti-terror efforts.

The potential threat was discussed at a meeting of the headquarters Tuesday and law enforcement agencies gave reports on measures they were taking to avert an attack, the statement said. That suggested the information was received earlier, but it was unclear when.

Several bombings have occurred in the Moscow subway system and on ground transport in the capital and elsewhere during more than 12 years of conflict in mostly Muslim Chechnya, where large-scale fighting ended years ago but an insurgency continues. Separatist rebels from Chechnya and other restive parts of southern Russia's troubled Caucasus region have claimed responsibility for or been blamed for most of the many terrorist attacks that have plagued the country.

Russia Warns Citizens Of Possible Security Threat (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 16 — Russian intelligence officials placed the country on an unusual high alert on Tuesday night, appealing to citizens for vigilance and saying that the government had been informed by “foreign partners” of a possible terrorist act.

The warning was at once detailed and vague. Issued at the end of a 9 p.m. national news broadcast, it said that the National Antiterrorist Committee was checking information about a possible attack on public ground transportation or subway systems, but it did not specify in what city an attack was feared, or when.

It also did not identify the “foreign partners” who had provided the information.

The National Antiterrorist Committee is led by Nikolai P. Patrushev, the director of the Federal Security Service, or F.S.B., Russia’s domestic successor to the K.G.B.

The broadcast said Mr. Patrushev had ordered “antiterrorist forces and resources to a state of increased readiness and to carry out preventive measures.”

An unidentified antiterrorist official also urged that “the population take this information seriously, raise their degree of vigilance, render necessary assistance to law enforcement structures and, in the event of coming across what appear to be suspicious signs, to notify security and law enforcement agencies immediately,” according to Interfax.

Russia has suffered severe and widely varied terrorist attacks since the 1990s, including truck, subway and suicide bombings, the in-flight destruction of civilian passenger jets and mass hostage-takings in a hospital, a theater and a school. Chechen separatists have claimed responsibility for most of the most lethal attacks.

But the attacks have slowed markedly since the seizure of a public school in Beslan in 2004 ended with more than 300 civilian deaths, and as Russia and pro-Kremlin Chechen forces have gained the upper hand over separatists in the lingering war in Chechnya. Moreover, Shamil Basayev, the terrorist leader who often claimed responsibility for ordering or organizing previous attacks, was killed in an explosion last summer near Chechnya, and no similar figure has emerged.

A spokeswoman for the national electricity monopoly said the guard had been increased at its facilities around the country, but there were no immediate reports of disruptions from Mr. Patrushev’s warning. Worries about the safety of public transportation in 2004 after a bombing on a subway car led to huge traffic jams on Moscow’s already clogged roads.

Castro Sets Stage For Power Transition (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0117644

By Katherine Shrader

AP, January 17, 2007

Cuban President Fidel Castro, ailing and out of sight, has been meeting with a trickle of international guests in recent months, a U.S. government official said Tuesday.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive situation with Cuba, declined to say with whom Castro was meeting. But the meetings, generally with visitors from Latin America, suggest he may be setting the stage for a transition of power that he hopes will protect the government he has built over four decades.

In a review of global threats last week, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said that Castro and his brother Raul, who has taken over as Cuba's temporary leader, are trying to create a "soft landing" during the transfer of control.

"From the point of the United States policy, we don't want to see that happen," Negroponte said. "We want to see the prospects for freedom in that country enhanced as a result of the transition" from Fidel Castro.

Negroponte also said Castro's days "seem to be numbered," a view supported Tuesday by the U.S. government official. That official said U.S. intelligence believes that Castro is likely to die within a month or two, although analysts don't yet know the precise nature of his illness.

That assessment narrowed the life-expectancy estimate of U.S. intelligence agencies, which previously had said Castro was not expected to make it through the end of this year.

The Spanish newspaper El Pais reported on Tuesday that Castro has had at least three failed operations and is suffering complications from an intestinal infection, leaving him with a "grave prognosis."

The reported rare details about his medical treatment, citing two unidentified sources from Madrid's Gregorio Maranon hospital, which employs surgeon Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido. An expert in the digestive system, Sabrido flew to Cuba in December to treat Castro and returned insisting that the 80-year-old was recovering slowly from a serious operation.

One of the journalists who wrote the article told The Associated Press that Sabrido was not one of the two sources. The journalist, Oriol Guell, said the sources were both doctors at the hospital, but he declined to identify them.

A Cuban diplomat in Madrid said the El Pais report was false. "If anyone has to talk about Castro's illness, it's Havana," the diplomat said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of official policy.

U.S. officials will not disclose how they glean clues to Castro's health. But American spy agencies employ physicians who study images, public statements and other information coming out of Cuba and other countries.

Some intelligence officials believe Castro is suffering from diverticular disease, which can cause bleeding in the lower intestine, especially in people over 60. Others believe that Castro has cancer of the stomach, the colon or perhaps the pancreas.

Yet Cuban officials told a delegation of U.S. lawmakers visiting last month that Castro did not have cancer, and the Spanish doctor who came to check on him said the same.

Havana's public position is that Castro is alive, healthy and will return to power, which U.S. analysts discount.

Negroponte said last week it is an open question whether Castro's death could trigger a popular demand for democratic change.

"What is not known is whether people are holding back — maybe we're not seeing the kind of the ferment yet that one might expect to see once Mr. Castro has definitively departed the scene," said Negroponte, who has been nominated by President Bush to be deputy secretary of state.

Pressed further by senators on whether the U.S. knows what to expect in Cuba, Negroponte added: "We don't know in large measure because it is a repressive society. They've repressed their opposition so severely over all these years, so people aren't exactly speaking up yet."

Despite uncertainty about the future of Cuba, the island's Communist Party retains firm control on the island. And the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, said Raul Castro probably will maintain power and stability after his older brother dies — "at least for the short term."

"Raul Castro has widespread respect and support among Cuban military leaders who will be crucial in permanent government succession," Maples said in written testimony to the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, a close friend and political ally of Castro, said Tuesday that he had spoken with the Cuban leader a few days ago and denied that Castro's condition was grave.

"I'm not a doctor, I'm not at the foot of Fidel's bed, but it's not like they say: neither grave, nor does he have cancer," Chavez told journalists while visiting Ecuador. "I received recent reports that Fidel continues a slow process of recovery that is not easy — I'm not going to give details — but I'm far from sure of all these catastrophic versions that have already killed him several times."

Two In House See No 'Uprising' After Castro (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

President Fidel Castro's exit from Cuba's political scene is unlikely to spur major changes in the situation there, two House members who recently visited the country told reporters yesterday.

Reps. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat, and Jo Ann Emerson, Missouri Republican, were part of a 10-member congressional delegation that visited Havana last month.

"There's no indication at all that what this administration's been telling people for a long time, that there's going to be this massive uprising, is going to happen -- that's not going to happen," Mr. McGovern said.

Mr. Castro ceded power to his brother, Raul, in July, until he could recover from surgery, but the notion that his death would lead to a fundamental shake-up in Cuban politics is dismissed by some analysts, including the Economist Intelligence Unit in London.

Although Cuba's government may still be hanging onto the idea that Fidel Castro will return, average Cubans "have already kind of moved on," Mr. McGovern said.

Both House members said that without a shift in U.S. policy, political changes are not likely in Cuba. Mr. McGovern suggested that eased relations with the United States could lead to political liberalization.

He also said some senior Cuban officials might not want the United States to ease its embargo or otherwise loosen relations, saying that every time the two countries start to get close, "they do something stupid," such as arrest dissidents or shoot down a plane.

Mrs. Emerson criticized U.S. isolation of Cuba for providing Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez an opportunity to exert influence and was critical of Radio and TV Marti, the U.S. government program to broadcast U.S. values into Cuba.

She called the program a "waste of taxpayer dollars" and said the money could be better spent on cooperative counternarcotics or counterterrorism efforts with Cuba.

Yesterday the Spanish newspaper El Pais reported that Mr. Castro was suffering from diverticular disease, which can cause bleeding in the lower intestine, especially in people over 60. In severe cases, emergency surgery may be required.

"In the summer, the Cuban leader bled abundantly in the intestine," El Pais reported. "This adversity led him to the operating table, according to the medical sources. His condition, moreover, was aggravated because the infection spread and caused peritonitis, the inflammation of the membrane that covers the digestive organs."

The recovery from the first operation, in which part of his large intestine was extracted and the colon was connected to the rectum, did not go well, resulting in peritonitis, the report said.

A second operation to clean and drain the infected area was conducted. Doctors removed the remainder of Mr. Castro's large intestine and created an artificial anus. But this operation also failed, El Pais said.

The Cuban leader was then hit with inflammation of the bile duct. He developed a condition called cholecystitis, which is an inflammation of the gall bladder. El Pais said this condition has an 80 percent mortality rate.

A prosthetic device made in South Korea was implanted in the bile duct and failed, and was replaced with one made in Spain, the report said.

El Pais said that in December, when Spanish surgeon Dr. Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido visited, Mr. Castro had an abdominal wound that was leaking more than a pint of fluid a day, causing "a severe loss of nutrients." The Cuban leader was being fed intravenously, the report said.

Castro Reportedly Struggles With Disease (AP)

By Maria Cheng

AP, January 17, 2007

The intestinal disease Fidel Castro is reportedly suffering from is usually easy to treat — but if complications develop in an elderly patient like the Cuban leader, it can quickly become a death sentence.

The Spanish newspaper El Pais reported Tuesday that the 80-year-old Castro is suffering from diverticulitis, an inflammation of the colon that can lead to serious infection if contents from the intestine leak into the abdomen.

In the elderly, the prognosis for this kind of infection is generally very poor — with the mortality rate as high as 90 percent. "Castro would definitely qualify as critically ill," said Dr. Roshini Rajapaksa, a gastroenterologist at New York University School of Medicine, referring to the report.

DOJ_NMG_0117646

In a younger patient, even the severe complications Castro has reportedly suffered are not necessarily fatal. But Castro's advanced age is a major factor.

"When you're in your 80s, any complication can be fatal," said Dr. Joel Weinstock, director of the gastroenterology department at Tufts Medical School.

Still, it is possible that Castro could recover.

"If they get the infections under control, he should get stronger in the next few weeks," Weinstock said. "But given everything he's supposedly been through, it would be difficult. He's had a tough run."

About 65 percent of people develop weak spots, or bulges called diverticula, on their colons by age 85. In about 10 percent of cases, these pouches become inflamed, causing pain and other problems, a condition called diverticulitis. The illness can become life-threatening if other complications, such as infection, occur, requiring removal of part or all of the large intestine.

Patients with mild diverticulitis are usually treated with antibiotics, as well as being put on a liquid diet. El Pais reported that Castro had his entire large intestine removed, suggesting the infection was extremely severe.

Doctors then reportedly implanted a bile duct device, presumably to help drain the infected area, as Castro may have been too ill to have his gall bladder removed.

Additional problems — such as a clot caused by remaining immobile in bed, a heart attack due to increased stress or kidney failure — are still possible, experts said. In his weakened condition, Castro is also vulnerable to additional infections.

The El Pais report was not made public in Cuba, where the government controls the media and Cubans have become accustomed to very limited details about their ailing leader's health.

A Cuban diplomat called the report a "lie," and the government has not otherwise reacted.

In its report, El Pais cited two unidentified sources from Gregorio Maranon Hospital in Madrid, which employs surgeon Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, who flew to Cuba in December to treat Castro. It said a grave infection in the large intestine, at least three failed operations and various complications have left Castro with a "very grave prognosis."

El Pais said that in December, when Garcia Sabrido visited, Castro had an abdominal wound that was leaking more than half a pint of fluids a day, causing "a severe loss of nutrients." The Cuban leader was being fed intravenously, the report said.

Garcia Sabrido, the Madrid hospital's chief surgeon, could not immediately be reached for comment Tuesday. A secretary who answered the phone at his office said the doctor did not plan to comment on the report.

U.N. Says Global AIDS Effort For Children Falls Far Short (NYT)

By Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

Some countries are making progress in treating children with AIDS and preventing others from becoming infected, but the overall global response is “tragically insufficient,” Unicef said yesterday.

“Children affected by AIDS are now more visible and are taken more seriously in global, regional and national forums where they had received little consideration before,” the United Nations agency said in a report. Better testing to find children with H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS, and simpler formulations of the antiretroviral drugs that combat the infection have increased the number of children under treatment, Unicef said. Additional factors were lower prices for the drugs and improved skills among health workers.

But the overall statistics for children are grim, Unicef found. It took stock of changes in 2005 and 2006, when the agency began a program to put what it called the “missing face” of children at the center of the world effort to halt and reverse the spread of H.I.V. by 2015.

Central to that effort is testing pregnant women, providing short-term drug therapy to prevent them from transmitting the virus to their newborns, testing children and treating those infected.

About two years ago, Unicef was concerned that a number of factors stopped children from getting treatment. One was the ability to detect infected children. Two others were whether the available drugs were safe for children and affordable for poor countries.

The progress since then, though small, has exceeded Unicef’s expectations, Peter McDermott, who runs Unicef’s AIDS program, told reporters by telephone. “Children do very well on treatment,” he said.

Still, about 10 percent of pregnant women in capital cities in sub-Saharan Africa are infected with H.I.V. But the vast majority of pregnant African women do not have access to drugs that would prevent transmitting the virus to their infants. So about one-third of their children will become infected at or shortly after birth, Unicef said.

Progress in providing drugs to infected pregnant women to prevent transmission to their infants was small. The 9 percent of such women in low- and middle-income countries worldwide who received antiretroviral drugs in 2005 rose from 3 percent in 2003.

The data available for 2005 shows that only seven countries cited in the report provided drugs to at least 40 percent of infected pregnant women to prevent H.I.V. among newborns: Argentina (87 percent), Brazil (48 percent), Botswana (54 percent), Jamaica (86 percent), Russia (84 percent), Thailand (46 percent) and Ukraine (90 percent).

Of the estimated 2.3 million children under 15 who had H.I.V. in 2005, 780,000 needed antiretroviral therapy, Unicef said, and only 10 percent of them received it.

Untreated, about one-third of infected infants die in their first year, and half die by their second birthday. That translated into 380,000 children dying from AIDS last year, Unicef said.

Only seven countries identified in the report provided antiretroviral therapy to at least 20 percent of children needing it. They were Botswana (84 percent), Cape Verde (47 percent), the Dominican Republic (23 percent), Jamaica (47 percent), Namibia (52 percent), Rwanda (20 percent) and Thailand (95 percent).

Lack of prevention and treatment has left an estimated 15.2 million children as orphans. The number is expected to grow to 20 million by 2010.

The actual problem is worse, the report said, because “many more children live with parents who are chronically ill, live in households that have taken in orphans due to AIDS or have lost teachers and other adult members of the community to AIDS.”

In issuing the report, Unicef said it was trying to establish a baseline for future monitoring. Because data from 2005 was the latest available, the agency said it could not provide statistical comparisons for changes in the year since it began its effort. Even so, it said it could make some determinations about progress, of the lack thereof, based on the work it has been doing in the field.

An additional problem is that national data on pediatric care and treatment is limited in most countries.

Scotland Ponders Going Its Own Way (WT/AP)

By Ben Mcconville

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

EDINBURGH, Scotland -- With barely the raising of a glass, Scotland is marking 300 years since it accepted union with England and officially put the Great in Britain.

The anniversary yesterday of the Scottish Parliament's vote for the Treaty of Union is focusing attention more on the perennial discord than the ties that bind these two members of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Polls show advocates of Scottish independence are gaining strength in their campaign for a referendum on breaking the union.

"This treaty can and will be undone, and at the moment there is a wellspring of Scottish nationalism," said Murray Ritchie, convener of the Scottish Independence Convention, an advocacy group. "What we need is a referendum to settle the issue of independence."

The feeling seems mutual, judging from opinion polls in recent months, which have said that a bit more than half of Scots -- and of the English -- support independence for Scotland, while much smaller percentages are opposed.

Prime Minister Tony Blair, however, said any attempt to split England and Scotland would be a "crazy" idea.

"In commerce, in trade, in security and above all in shared values, the union of England and Scotland continues to be good for England, good for Scotland and right for the future of Britain," Agence France-Presse quoted Mr. Blair saying at his regular press briefing yesterday.

The union has been contested since 1707, when protesting mobs took to the streets of Edinburgh and Glasgow. The Scottish poet Robert Burns labeled those who voted for union a "parcel of rogues."

Though Scotland's Parliament dissolved, the country maintained much of its national identity, its own legal and education systems and its own religion -- Presbyterianism, although Queen Elizabeth II is the head of the Church of Scotland.

Ten years ago, Scotland voted overwhelmingly to accept a proposal from Prime Minister Tony Blair to have its own elected assembly with limited tax-raising powers.

Now the tercentenary, and the strong opinion poll standings of the pro-independence Scottish National Party (SNP), are giving the topic fresh impetus among Scots, who number 5 million to England's 50 million.

Without the leveling effect of national tax rates, Scots would probably have to pay more to make up for what would be lost in parting with England.

DOJ_NMG_0117648

North Sea oil revenue is the cornerstone of the separatists' dream; oil prices have doubled the value of the industry since 2000, netting a fifth of Britain's total corporate tax revenue, and much of that revenue would go directly to an independent Scotland, according to the SNP. But North Sea reserves are expected to run out by 2020.

Some in England grumble that Scotland effectively rules the United Kingdom with its abundance of Scottish lawmakers in high-ranking roles, as well as polling districts that make the Scottish votes a determining factor in national elections.

Mr. Blair is one of four Scottish-born prime ministers in the past century, as is Gordon Brown, Mr. Blair's likely successor when he steps down in September.

Embassies In 'Turf Wars'? (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

A report by Senate Republican staffers urges the departments of Defense and State to better coordinate the role of military personnel in U.S. embassies and warns that a growing military presence is causing anxiety among some host governments.

"Blurred lines of authority between the State Department and the Defense Department could lead to interagency turf wars that undermine the effectiveness of the overall U.S. effort against terrorism," the report says.

It adds: "There is evidence that some host countries are questioning the increasingly military component of America's profile overseas."

The report, titled "Embassies as Command Posts in the Anti-Terror Campaign," was prepared last month by staff from the outgoing Republican majority on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Then-Chairman Richard G. Lugar, Indiana Republican, sent six staffers to visit 20 countries in Latin America, Africa, Asia and the Middle East to examine the relationship between the State Department and the Defense Department in U.S. embassies and the effect it was having in the war on terror.

The report, which was filed with little fanfare Dec. 15, warns of the risk of bruising policy and management conflicts in four areas:

•Development assistance to foreign countries, especially in the Horn of Africa.

•Training and materiel support for foreign militaries.

•The deployment of special-operations forces to more than 50 countries.

•The operation in many embassies of small teams of military personnel conducting so-called "information operations."

Such teams of three or four persons have been deployed to 18 embassies in "key countries to carry out informational programs" and are expected in a dozen more "if current plans are realized," the report says.

"Some foreign officials question what appears to them as a new emphasis by the United States on military approaches to problems that are not seen as lending themselves to military solutions," it adds.

"Some host countries have elements in both government and general society who are highly suspicious of potential American coercion."

The report says some ambassadors insisted on having memorandums of understanding signed by regional combatant commanders "to clarify lines of authority" for military personnel operating in their country.

"The situation should not be left for resolution in the heat of the moment," it warns, recommending that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "pursue a more systemic solution" and negotiate "a global memorandum of agreement" with the new defense secretary.

"It is important," the report concludes, "to get lines-of-authority questions sorted out before directives from the ambassador and the combatant commander conflict in an urgent situation."

Hugo And Mahmoud (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

We've known for some time that Hugo Chávez is a menace to the economic well-being of his own people. But the question that seems increasingly urgent is whether he's becoming a threat to U.S. security interests -- both in the Western Hemisphere and beyond.

Specifically, we'd like to know what Senator Chris Dodd and Congressman Bill Delahunt make of Mr. Chávez's weekend summit with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. The Iranian President stopped by Caracas on Saturday as part of a four-day engagement with Latin America's new leftist governments. On Sunday, the Iranian communed with Nicaragua's new boss, Daniel Ortega, and then on Monday he hit the inauguration of Ecuador's new pro-Chávez President Rafael Correa.

The Caracas visit was Mr. Ahmadinejad's second in four months. "This is just a prelude of what we will do," declared Mr. Chávez, in a televised speech announcing the creation of a joint $2 billion fund to finance development and other projects. "This large and strategic fund, brother, is going to be converted into a mechanism of liberation," he added, saying their goal is to build "a network of alliances."

In Managua, the Iranian also signed a "broad cooperation accord" with Mr. Ortega. Mr. Chávez openly funded the Sandinista's Presidential campaign last year, and he earlier supported Evo Morales in Bolivia. Venezuelan soldiers have reported that they are under orders to give Colombian rebels safe haven, and Mr. Chávez signed contracts last year to buy Russian MiGs and open a Kalishnakov factory at home.

Meanwhile, the Venezuelan is using his recent election victory to consolidate his grip on the economy. A week ago, he announced he would nationalize the country's electricity and telephone companies; he already controls the oil business. His goal here is to redistribute income but especially to shrink the private economy in order to reduce the space in which any political opposition can operate.

The Caracas Stock Exchange Index fell 16% last week, but that didn't phase Señor Chávez. He's moving to withdraw the license of a prominent independent television network, and he has asked Congress to grant him temporary executive power to rule by decree. "The world should know: Our revolution is not turning back," he said. "This is the path our boat is on: socialism. Country, socialism, or death."

The world should have known this a long time ago but too many people chose to ignore it. Mr. Chávez took office in 1999 on a promise to end corruption and injustice. By 2000, human rights groups warned of a deterioration in constitutional protections, and Mr. Chávez began importing Cuban security agents along with Cuban doctors and teachers to spread propaganda.

Each time Mr. Chávez has faced resistance, he has tightened the screws. Price and capital controls and property seizures became state policy. Employees of the state-owned oil company and its contractors were fired if they opposed the government; political opponents were jailed.

All the while, Mr. Chávez has had American enablers who excused his growing repression, or blamed it on a reaction to U.S. policy. Foremost among them has been Mr. Dodd, who has defended Mr. Chávez as "democratically elected" despite his clear trend toward authoritarianism. In 2004, the circumstances surrounding a recall referendum were so anti-democratic that the European Union refused to act as an observer. Jimmy Carter nonetheless blessed the outcome amid heavy irregularities, and the U.S. State Department endorsed the process. Other politicians, such as Mr. Delahunt, embraced and flattered Mr. Chávez for his PR stunt of offering cut-rate oil to poor Americans.

Perhaps it's time these Americans paid attention to the kind of "socialism" and "revolution" that their support is helping Mr. Chávez to build in Venezuela.

TERRORISM NEWS:

AG Criticizes Judges For Terror Rulings (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says federal judges are unqualified to make rulings affecting national security policy, ramping up his criticism of how they handle terrorism cases.

In remarks prepared for delivery Wednesday, Gonzales says judges generally should defer to the will of the president and Congress when deciding national security cases. He also raps jurists who "apply an activist philosophy that stretches the law to suit policy preferences."

The text of the speech, scheduled for delivery at the American Enterprise Institute, was obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press. It outlines, in part, what qualities the Bush administration looks for when selecting candidates for the federal bench.

"We want to determine whether he understands the inherent limits that make an unelected judiciary inferior to Congress or the president in making policy judgments," Gonzales says in the prepared speech. "That, for example, a judge will never be in the best position to know what is in the national security interests of our country."

Gonzales did not cite any specific activist jurists, or give examples of national security cases, in his prepared text. The Justice Department is appealing an August decision by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit, who ruled the government's warrantless surveillance program unconstitutional and ordered it stopped immediately.

The Justice Department appealed her decision and the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati has ruled that the administration can keep the program in place during the appeal.

Attorneys representing terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay are challenging the legality of a law, signed by President Bush in October, that authorizes military trials. Those challenges raise the possibility that trials will be struck down by a federal appeals court or the Supreme Court.

Gonzales, a former Texas Supreme Court justice, has in the past warned about judges who inject their personal beliefs in cases. But his prepared remarks Wednesday mark his sharpest words over concerns about the federal judiciary - the third, and equal, branch of government.

Judges who "apply an activist philosophy that stretches the law to suit policy preferences, they actually reduce the credibility and authority of the judiciary," Gonzales says. "In so doing, they undermine the rule of law that strengthens our democracy."

Even so, Gonzales characterized efforts to retaliate against unpopular rulings as misguided, noting a failed South Dakota proposal to sue or jail judges for making unpopular court decisions. He also called for Congress to consider increasing the number of federal judges to handle heavy workloads, and to offer them higher salaries to lure and keep the best jurists on the bench.

Gonzales: Gitmo Trials Delayed Because Of Challenges By Detainees' Lawyer (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON – Trials for detainees at Guantanamo Bay have been delayed because of numerous challenges by their own lawyers, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday in defending the Bush administration's treatment of terror suspects.

A leading human rights attorney called the attorney general's comments “a convoluted view of the world.”

Gonzales, meeting with Associated Press reporters and editors, said the trials of terror detainees may begin as early as this summer, and that rules for military commissions in carrying them out will be sent to Capitol Hill this week.

But he acknowledged the delays, of up to five years in some cases, in deciding the legal fate of detainees being held at the military facility in Cuba.

“It's not for lack of trying,” Gonzales said. “We are challenged every step of the way.”

“A lot will depend on the courts and the legal challenges brought by detainees at Guantanamo,” he said. “But we are trying as hard as we can to bring these individuals to justice.”

DOJ_NMG_0117655

The Bush administration has been widely criticized for its detention of about 395 men at Guantanamo, some without being officially charged, on suspicion of links to al-Qaeda or the Taliban. The government has characterized the detainees as enemy combatants who should have fewer legal protections than civilians in U.S. courts.

Military officials say 60 to 80 detainees will be charged and brought to trial. Another 85 men have been cleared for release or transfer to other countries.

Last October, President Bush signed a law authorizing military trials and harsh interrogations of terrorism suspects. Defense lawyers have challenged the validity of the law and have raised the possibility that the military trials will be struck down by a federal appeals court or the Supreme Court.

“We've been trying for five years to get the majority of the detainees in federal court,” Ratner said. “They've resisted from the first day, when they took people to Guantanamo.”

The Guantanamo issue was one of several topics during the hourlong AP interview that had Gonzales on the defensive over Bush administration policies criticized by Democrats and civil libertarians as overstepping legal boundaries.

Others included:

Little-known but recently revealed powers authorizing the Pentagon to examine banking records of Americans suspected of terrorism or espionage. Congress authorized such investigations decades ago, and recently affirmed them in the USA Patriot Act, but some lawmakers question whether it is an improper expansion of the Defense Department's domestic role.

“If Congress gives them the authority, I think they probably ought to be exercising that authority in connection with national security investigations,” Gonzales said.

Bush's use of so-called signing statements, which accompany legislation he inks into law. Gonzales said the president used the statements to identify for federal agencies which parts of the law he believes could be viewed as unconstitutional. But critics believe Bush is using them to publicly interpret how to expand his powers.

The issue boiled over earlier this month when it appeared that the president authorized his administration to open mail without a warrant. Gonzales denied that, and said the government continues to only open mail with court approval. The signing statements “do not give the president any more authority than he already has,” he said.

Justice Department requests for the resignations of several U.S. attorneys. Democratic senators have suggested that the department's demands were politically motivated or intended to circumvent the Senate confirmation process. “Nothing could be further from the truth,” Gonzales said.

Additionally, Gonzales announced the indictments of 148 illegal immigrants who acquired other peoples' Social Security numbers and other personal information to get jobs at Swift & Co. meat packing plants.

The indictments, in six states, follow federal raids on the plants last month in the largest-ever workplace crackdown on illegal immigration. The raids led to the arrests of nearly 1,300 employees and temporarily halted operations at the Greeley, Colo.-based meat processor.

“Obviously, we're concerned about identity theft in this country,” Gonzales said. He said the Bush administration is studying ways to curb identity theft, including better ways for police to report the crime, and to reduce the access that thieves have to Social Security numbers.

The federal indictments include: 53 in Texas, 30 in Iowa, 26 in Nebraska, 20 in Minnesota, 18 in Utah and one in Colorado. Local prosecutors are bringing state charges against the immigrants, including 80 in Cache County, Utah, and 18 in Weld County, Colo.

Excerpts From Gonzales Interview (AP)

AP, January 17, 2007

Excerpts from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' interview Tuesday with reporters and editors from The Associated Press.

On his upcoming priorities:

I'm doing, making sure that we're doing everything that we can to prevent another terrorist attack. ... But in addition to terrorism we'll also be focusing on things, what additional measures we can do to protect our children.

(We) want to engage in a dialogue with the Congress about what additional tools are necessary to protect children, particularly with respect to, quite frankly, maintaining information within Internet service providers. We are discovering in connection with certain investigations relating to child pornography and pedophiles, oftentimes the information is no longer available within Internet service providers and there is no obligation to retain that data.

On sentencing:

I am concerned about the disparity we're seeing in sentencing around the country. We're seeing disparities with respect to certain kinds of cases. Ten percent, I think, disparity from the guidelines with respect to offenses involving children. That is troubling.

We're seeing disparities with respect to races, different races. It appears that maybe if you're of a certain race, maybe you get a tougher sentence, or a lighter sentence. And I think in this country you can't have that.

On Guantanamo detainees:

I mean I have every expectation that we'll see commissions hopefully this summer. But again a lot will depend on the courts and the challenges, legal challenges brought by, by detainees at Guantanamo.

But we are trying as hard as we can to, to bring these individuals to justice. And I think we now have, we have a framework under the Military Commissions Act to do, that provides certainty as to the legality of, of these proceedings.

On criticism about replacing U.S. attorneys:

U.S. attorneys, like the attorney general of the United States, we serve at the pleasure of the president of the United States. We can, we can be removed at any time for any reason by the president of the United States.

And, of course, like any big organization -- and the, and the Department of Justice is a big organization -- we constantly make evaluations as to the performance of individuals. And sometimes decisions are made that we can, hopefully, achieve greater success, better performance, by making changes in personnel. And so I would just leave it at that.

With respect to politicizing the process, I mean nothing could be further from the truth.

On immigration:

I will play a role if it's appropriate. You know, obviously the administration needs to settle given the recent elections, and you know, changing circumstances as to what we'd like to see happen and develop a strategy about how to ... achieve that outcome. Obviously, you know, we're talking about dealing with the Congress -- or working with the Congress.

On President Bush's use of signing statements:

Let me just say that what we are doing is nothing new. It began with Thomas Jefferson and I could give you a whole list of presidents that have used signing statements. ... It's a discussion between the president and the American people, the Congress and particularly the executive branch about provisions in a bill which he is concerned about may be unconstitutional if applied in a certain way.

In the particular -- the most recent case relating to physical searches of mail, what the president was trying to do was to preserve existing authority already to engage in physical searches of certain kinds of mail without warrants. That authority already exists. ... And what the president wanted to make clear is that that this new reauthorization of the Postal Act did not in any way affect the existing authority the president has to engage in physical searches of mail under certain circumstances. That was the purpose of that signing statement.

U.S. Official Apologizes For Guantanamo Remarks (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

A Pentagon official who criticized large U.S. law firms for representing terrorism suspects at the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has apologized for his comments, saying that his discussion on a local radio program does not reflect his "core beliefs."

Charles D. "Cully" Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, said yesterday that he regrets what he told Federal News Radio on Thursday, when he suggested that chief executives of U.S. companies should question being represented by lawyers who do pro bono work for terrorism suspects. The Washington Post editorial page reported Stimson's comments Friday.

In a letter to the editor that appears today on The Post's editorial page, Stimson said he believes that both sides of a legal case should have "competent legal counsel." Stimson is a former prosecutor and defense lawyer.

"Regrettably, my comments left the impression that I question the integrity of those engaged in the zealous defense of detainees in Guantanamo," Stimson wrote. "I do not."

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said yesterday that Stimson's original comments "do not reflect the department's position, nor are they the views of the senior leadership."

The remarks drew condemnation on the floor of the Senate yesterday from Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), and more than 130 law school deans have signed an Internet petition declaring themselves "appalled" by them.

DOJ_NMG_0117657

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales pointed at the detainees' attorneys himself yesterday, telling the Associated Press that their numerous challenges have delayed trials for their clients at Guantanamo Bay.

In an interview with The Post later yesterday, Gonzales said the remarks were "not intended as criticism of defense attorneys doing their jobs" but were "a statement of reality."

"We had to fight many legal battles to get where we are today," he said.

An Apology To Detainees' Attorneys (WP)

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

During a radio interview last week, I brought up the topic of pro bono work and habeas corpus representation of detainees in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Regrettably, my comments left the impression that I question the integrity of those engaged in the zealous defense of detainees in Guantanamo. I do not.

I believe firmly that a foundational principle of our legal system is that the system works best when both sides are represented by competent legal counsel. I support pro bono work, as I said in the interview. I was a criminal defense attorney in two of my three tours in the Navy Judge Advocate General's Corps. I zealously represented unpopular clients -- people charged with crimes that did not make them, or their attorneys, popular in the military. I believe that our justice system requires vigorous representation.

I apologize for what I said and to those lawyers and law firms who are representing clients at Guantanamo. I hope that my record of public service makes clear that those comments do not reflect my core beliefs.

Law School Deans Criticize Pentagon Statement On Detainees (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 17, 2007

More than 130 deans of American law schools have signed a letter deploring a Pentagon official's statement criticizing major law firms for representing detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

The law deans wrote that they were "appalled" by an interview last week in which the Pentagon's point man on detainee affairs, Charles Stimson, said corporations should be disturbed by the law firms' pro bono work for detainees and might want to reconsider sending business to the firms involved.

"We find Secretary Stimson's statement to be contrary to basic tenets of American law," the deans wrote. "Our American legal tradition has honored lawyers who, despite their personal beliefs, have zealously represented mass murderers, suspected terrorists, and Nazi marchers…. In a free and democratic society, government officials should not encourage intimidation of or retaliation against lawyers who are fulfilling their pro bono obligations."

A Pentagon spokesman said Friday that Mr. Stimson's views were not shared by the department's leadership. The letter asks the administration to repudiate the statement.

The missive was circulated by the dean of Yale Law School, Harold Hongju Koh, and the dean of Northeastern University's law school, Emily Spieler. The signers include the deans of law schools at Columbia, Fordham, New York University, and New York Law School.

A liberal Web log, tpmmuckraker.com, noted that two of the law firms representing a former White House official now on criminal trial in Washington, I. Lewis Libby, have also done work for Guantanamo detainees. The firms are Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP of Manhattan and Dechert LLP of Philadelphia.

Gitmo Defense Counsel Stand Accused (WP)

By Andrew Cohen, Special To Washingtonpost.com

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Here is how our executive branch last week waged its legal war on terrorism against the detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. While federal lawyers and intelligence officials earnestly prepared behind the scenes to put on trial some of the major terror suspects, a skuzzy Pentagon lawyer was front and center on the radio attacking the motives and integrity and even the patriotism of detainee defense attorneys and the law firms that support them.

DOJ_NMG_0117658

One hand of government prepares in secret for the upcoming battle by identifying workarounds to constitutional due process and the congressional mandate that information gleaned from torture may not be used in the military commissions that may be up and running this summer. The other hand of government works in broad daylight to undercut perceptions about the loyal opposition by suggesting that the law firms whose attorneys work for free on these detainee cases -- it's called pro bono work and it is the law's highest calling -- may be taking money from terrorists or other nefarious sources.

On Friday we learned from the New York Times that the "Bush administration has set up a secret war room in a Virginia suburb" so that government attorneys and military officials can sort through "classified files" containing among other things the "interrogation reports" of top-shelf detainees like Khalid Sheik Mohammed. Their goal is to prepare to try Mohammed and other high-level terror suspects (like fellow 9/11 planner Ramzi Binalshibh) under the Military Commissions Act of 2006, a new federal law that set the rules that govern how the men may be tried.

"Prosecutors could use hearsay evidence or second-hand testimony, but could not use information obtained under torture," report the Times' Neil Lewis and David Johnston. "Even so," they add, "that would mean virtually any information obtained by the C.I.A would appear to be admissible because, under Justice Department legal opinions, none of the harsh techniques amounted to torture." That's certainly convenient in theory -- we'll see how viable it is in practice. Remember, the new Congress has the right to look anew at the Commissions Act and the federal courts have yet to resolve the new questions it raises.

If there is nothing surprising about a group of prosecutors preparing for trial -- even the sort of one-sided terror mega-trial that U.S v. Mohammed would become -- it is, as The Washington Post suggested Friday, downright shocking that a government attorney would denigrate the work of attorneys and their colleagues who have chosen to help men who sometimes quite literally have no one else on their side. The malfeasant culprit is a man named Charles "Cully" Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, and there is simply no excuse for the tone or the tenor of the remarks he made Thursday on Federal News Radio.

Usually, administration officials take pot shots at the detainees -- calling them "killers," for example, even when the vast majority of them are not. But Stimson took his shots at the powerful law firms that have allowed and in many cases encouraged their bright attorneys to represent the detainees. According to The Post, Stimson said: "when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms...."

Stimson also attacked the motives of the men and women, and their bosses, who have accomplished so much in defending the rights of the grim men in Guantanamo Bay. "Some will maintain that they are doing it out of the goodness of their heart, that they're doing it pro bono, and I suspect they are; others are receiving monies from who knows where, and I'd be curious to have them explain that." You don't need to understand the rich history of pro bono work in this country to understand how odious Stimson's remarks are, or how much of a threat they constitute to men and women of goodwill everywhere.

For the sake of argument, however, let's look a bit at the American Bar Association's Model Rules of Professional Conduct -- guidelines for how lawyers ought to behave. Rule 6.1 "Voluntary Pro Bono Publico Service" states that "every lawyer has a professional responsibility to provide legal services to those unable to pay. A lawyer should aspire to render at least (50) hours of pro bono... legal services per year and should "provide any additional services through delivery of legal services at no fee or substantially reduced fee to individuals, groups or organizations seeking to secure or protect civil rights, civil liberties or public rights." I can think of no other cause that better satisfies this solemn responsibility than providing legal help to the Gitmo detainees. Can you?

Now let's spend a minute looking at Stimson's responsibilities as a government lawyer or as a spokesman for federal attorneys. First, Rule 3.4 "Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel" states that a lawyer "shall not... allude to any matter that the lawyer does not reasonably believe is relevant or that will not be supported by admissible evidence, assert personal knowledge of facts in issue except when testifying as a witness, or state a personal opinion as to the justness of a cause, the credibility of a witnesses, the culpability of a civil litigant or the guilt or innocence of an accused."

Even though Stimson is not now technically a prosecutor, he was one, once, and thus should know about Rule 3.8, too. It states that a prosecutor in a criminal case shall "refrain from making extrajudicial comments that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused..." and shall "make reasonable efforts to assure that the accused.... has been given reasonable opportunity to retain counsel." No doubt Stimson and his supporters would argue that the detainees do not deserve these "courtesies" because they are not defendants in our civilian courts. That is no argument against treating opposing counsel with the respect and dignity they deserve.

American Bar Association President Karen J. Mathis wrote Friday: "Lawyers represent people in criminal cases to fulfill a core American value: the treatment of all people equally before the law. To impugn those who are doing this critical work -- and doing it on a volunteer basis -- is deeply offensive to members of the legal profession, and we hope to all Americans." She is right. Stimson should be immediately fired for what he said last week and, furthermore, he should be investigated for breaching the code of professional ethics. Not only were the remarks nasty, they were politically and diplomatically unwise.

What Stimson said, and why, and how, constitutes conduct unbecoming a member of government and a member of the bar. One hand may be acting aggressively, if not mercifully and justly, toward prosecuting suspected terrorists. But the other hand, Stimson's hand, is undercutting the very principles we fight for. This is how our government waged the legal war on terror in our name last week.

Editorial: Clueless 'Cully' Stimson (BOSH)

By Boston Herald Editorial Staff

Boston Herald, January 17, 2007

Well, it's official now: Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs Charles "Cully" Stimson has made himself a household name virtually overnight with a comment that is beyond idiotic.

Interviewed by Federal News Radio on the fifth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo Bay prison, Stimson said, "It's shocking . . . The major law firms in this country . . . are out there representing detainees."

Then the former Navy lawyer went so far as to suggest a boycott of those firms, noting, "when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms."

Many of the nation's largest law firms are defending detainees pro bono, including Wilmer Hale, Covington & Burling, and Pillsbury Winthrop. It's what good, public-spirited law firms - and lawyers - do and have done since the very founding of this nation. It was, after all, John Adams who defended the British soldiers accused of killing Americans in the Boston Massacre. What is it about that long and proud tradition that Stimson doesn't get?

Now deans of the nation's major law schools have signed a letter taking him to task for his remarks and asking the Bush administration to repudiate them.

A Pentagon spokesman has already distanced the Defense Department from Stimson's comments. And Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told The New York Times [NYT], "Good lawyers representing the detainees is the best way to ensure that justice is done in these cases."

Anyone clueless about that concept ought to be out the door.

Letter Tells Of Difficulties In Prosecuting Detainee Abuse (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — A Justice Department team responsible for reviewing accusations of abuse of detainees by civilian government employees in Iraq and Afghanistan has encountered "delays" and "unique difficulties," the department said in a letter on Tuesday.

The letter, to Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, said prosecutors found that some accusations were not credible. Some victims could not be identified, it said, and a few had been released from custody and could not be found.

In one case, two lawyers were prepared to travel to an unidentified Middle Eastern country to interview people who say they had been abused, but canceled the trip because the country's officials refused to allow the prosecutors to meet with them.

"As with an American suspected of a crime, those Americans who are the subject of the referrals are innocent until proven guilty," the letter said. "When career prosecutors conclude that we cannot prove allegations of a crime beyond a reasonable doubt, the department — consistent with its longstanding practices and policies — will not prosecute."

The Justice Department provided the report in response to questions posed by Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, who in a letter on Dec. 18 asked government lawyers for a progress report. Democrats have expressed skepticism about the department's inability to bring cases to trial.

The letter described the reasons no charges would be brought in most of the cases, saying, "All were declined for insufficient evidence to warrant criminal prosecution for one or more of the following reasons: insufficient evidence of criminal conduct; insufficient evidence of the subject's involvement; insufficient evidence of criminal intent; low probability of conviction."

A government lawyer who worked on some of the cases said Tuesday that the problems made prosecutions unlikely in nearly all of the 21 abuse accusations the team reviewed.

But the official, who did not want to speak on the record about pending investigations, said prosecutors had tried hard to assemble cases.

DOJ_NMG_0117660

“We took these allegations very seriously,” the official said. “We tried hard to get the complete story, to get these cases to prosecution. A lot of effort has gone into this.”

Of 10 accusations referred to the Justice Department by the inspector general of the Central Intelligence Agency, one remains under investigation, the official said. The unclassified version of the letter, which is heavily edited to remove classified information, provides no details.

Some human rights lawyers said the open case could be that of an Iraqi man who died during an interrogation at Abu Ghraib prison in November 2004 after he was turned over to the C.I.A. by the military. Of 10 accusations referred by military authorities against civilian contractors, one was dropped, the official said. Nine remain open, but the officials said it was uncertain if any action would be taken because the offenses could be misdemeanors.

One additional case, stemming from an F.B.I. accusation of abuse at the detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, also remains open. The official said there had been no referrals from any agency to the Justice Department after January 2006.

Appeals Court Throws Out Sentence Of Man Convicted In Plot To Bomb Los Angeles Airport (AP)

By David Kravets, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

AP, January 17, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A federal appeals court on Tuesday threw out the sentence of a man who was convicted of plotting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport at the turn of the millennium.

Ahmed Ressam was arrested near the U.S.-Canadian border in December 1999 after customs agents found 124 pounds (56 kilograms) of explosives in the trunk of his car.

Prosecutors said he was intent on bombing the airport on the eve of the millennium. The arrest raised fears of terrorism attacks and prompted the cancellation of millennium celebrations at Seattle's Space Needle.

Ressam was sentenced to 22 years in prison after being convicted off all nine charges. On Tuesday, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco reversed his conviction on one of the charges and sent the case back to a lower court to issue a new sentence and explain the rationale behind the 22-year term. No new sentencing date was immediately set.

The decision does not necessarily mean Ressam will get a shorter term. Judges are given wide latitude to sentence defendants as they see fit.

Defense attorney Thomas Hillier II said the reversal might not reduce his client's sentence but "helps in fending off the government's argument that the original sentence was too lenient."

Two of the three appellate judges said Ressam was improperly convicted of carrying an explosive while committing a felony by lying on a customs form.

The government failed to show the "explosives somehow aided or emboldened" him to provide a false name at the border because he had not intended to detonate explosives at the border when he was arrested weeks before Jan. 1, 2000, Judge Pamela Rymer wrote for the majority.

After his conviction in 2001, Ressam began cooperating with authorities in hopes of winning a reduced sentence. He faced a maximum of 65 years in prison.

Over the next two years, according to court documents, he provided information on more than 100 potential terrorists and testified against coconspirator Moktar Haouari and Sept. 11 plotter Mounir el-Motassadeq.

Ressam told authorities he saw Zacarias Moussaoui, , a Moroccan-born Frenchman, at a training camp in Afghanistan in 1998. He also told investigators about the type of shoe bomb Richard Reid attempted to detonate on a U.S.-bound airline flight in 2001, and provided information about a network of Algerian terrorists in Europe.

U.S. District Judge John Coughenour of Seattle, who sentenced Ressam, said the information he provided was "startlingly helpful."

But Ressam's cooperation came to a halt by early 2003, resulting in charges being dropped against two other co-conspirators. His lawyers said years of solitary confinement, broken by periods of intense interrogation, had taken their toll on his mental health and corrupted his memory.

Emily Langlie, spokesman for U.S. attorney John McKay in Seattle, said the government was mulling whether to ask the 9th Circuit to rehear the case with 15 judges. They maintain Ressam should get a 35-year term.

"I don't see any reason why that should change," Langlie said.

Millenium Bomb Plotter's Sentence Is Thrown Out (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo, Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117661

A federal appeals court threw out the 22-year prison sentence of Ahmed Ressam, convicted of plotting to blow up Los Angeles International Airport, and sent his case back to a lower court for resentencing.

The U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco said today the sentence should be recalculated in part because the court overturned one of Ressam's convictions, for carrying an explosive during the commission of a felony. The charge carried a 10-year minimum sentence under federal guidelines.

"We vacate the entire sentence so that the district court can resentence in light of this decision and developments in the law of sentencing," the court said in its ruling.

The U.S. Justice Department had sought a tougher sentence for Ressam after he stopped cooperating with investigators. The 9th Circuit declined to address the government's appeal because of its reversal of one of his convictions.

"We are studying the ruling to determine whether or not to seek an appeal," said Dean Boyd, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington. Thomas Hillier, a federal public defender who represented Ressam, didn't immediately return a message seeking comment.

Ressam, a native of Algeria, was convicted in 2001 of conspiracy and carrying explosives and sentenced to 22 years in prison in 2005. Ressam was arrested in Port Angeles, Wash., in December 1999 as he drove off a ferry from British Columbia, Canada, with a trunk filled with bomb-making materials.

After his conviction, Ressam cooperated with the government until early 2003, the appeals court said. Ressam then sought to be sentenced and the U.S. filed a motion to allow for a prison term shorter than the normal range. Ressam was sentenced to 22 years after he failed to resume cooperating, the ruling said.

Hot-button Law Prof Ready To Take The Podium (STPPP)

By Paul Tosto

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, January 17, 2007

It may be the most anxiously awaited constitutional law class ever at the University of Minnesota.

At the podium Tuesday will stand Robert Delahunty. A recognized scholar and U.S. Justice Department veteran, he is better known as co-author of one of the most controversial legal opinions in the nation's war on terrorism.

His one-term appointment to the U triggered waves of praise — and scorn — from students and faculty in the fall.

While he's kept a low profile, supporters and detractors continue to slug it out in letters and on the Web. The latest volley came two weeks ago, when eight of Delahunty's former Justice Department bosses wrote to praise him — and to scold U professors for deriding his hiring as being akin to the U paying Enron executives to teach accounting.

With that kind of tension, how will spring term begin Tuesday?

"I expect it to be a normal class and for him to do a pretty good job," said Jon Taylor, a first-year law student who opposed Delahunty's selection. He and other students met with Delahunty in the fall to ask questions about the memo. The reception was mixed.

"It didn't change my mind," said Taylor, who petitioned law school leaders to reconsider their choice.

Written while Delahunty was a Justice attorney, the 2002 memo concluded al-Qaida and Taliban prisoners were not protected by international treaties or federal law.

Critics charged the memo paved the way for the Bush administration to mistreat prisoners and ignore the Geneva Conventions. Amnesty International has called for Delahunty and other attorneys to be investigated for failing to meet professional standards in advising the president — accusations his supporters ridicule.

Delahunty joined the University of St. Thomas Law School faculty in 2004. The St. Thomas law dean defended Delahunty then, noting his "long and distinguished career" working for several presidents, including Bill Clinton.

He fell out of the public eye until last fall, when the U began looking to fill a constitutional law teaching slot after a professor took an unexpected leave.

The class is required for first-year students, and the spring class is an extension of the fall course, so it was a critical position to fill. The U first looked to William Mitchell College of Law and then to St. Thomas, where Delahunty's federal experience appeared to make him the perfect choice.

U law school leaders signed him, apparently without realizing he was co-author of the controversial memo and that his hiring could divide the law school. They found out quickly, however, when professors began tossing barbs over issues of academic free speech and the ethics of lawyers.

Delahunty said Friday he hopes he and the students can focus on constitutional law once the classroom door closes.

"I think everyone who wanted to say their piece has said their piece," he said. "My job is to teach these students. I don't think they're served by the spectacle of teachers falling out with each other."

He said he's left an open invitation to his students to answer any questions.

DOJ_NMG_0117662

"Academic diversity is good for our school, and the university should not have ideological or political litmus tests for its professors," said Sam Diehl, a third-year law student and president of the Federalist Society, a group of conservative and libertarian law students at the U. The society, he added, has invited supporters and opponents to debate Jan. 23.

Taylor said his opposition was never about ideology; he worried Delahunty's hiring might tarnish the law school's reputation.

Of the petition drive: "I think we totally accomplished a lot," Taylor said. "We feel like across the country people will look more closely at professors … the legal community respects human rights even if a few professors don't."

Delahunty said he doesn't relish the controversy and has no desire to prolong it: "I am looking forward to teaching my students at both the U and St. Thomas next term."

Class starts Tuesday morning, 9:05 a.m., Mondale Hall.

Jury Sees Tape From London Bomb Scare (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan And Karla Adam

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 16 -- The grainy security video showed a London subway car crowded with midday riders, a man with a backpack among them. He looked around, then turned his back toward a woman with a child in a stroller. Suddenly, a large puff of dust shot out of his pack, and panic erupted among the other passengers.

British prosecutors played the video to a jury in London on Tuesday. The man, they said, was Ramzi Mohammed, 25, one of six men on trial for conspiracy to murder commuters that day, July 21, 2005. The dust, they said, was residue from a bomb hidden in his backpack. Its detonator fired and caused the puff of dust, prosecutors said, but the shrapnel-laced main charge failed to explode.

Prosecutor Nigel Sweeney told jurors that three other bombs carried onto subway trains and a bus that day also failed to explode, preventing a repeat of a nearly identical attack two weeks earlier, July 7, that had killed 52 commuters and wounded about 700 others.

With the four July 7 bombers dead, the six July 21 defendants are the first people to face trial on charges relating to a pair of incidents that were the first major Islamic extremist attacks on British soil and created chaos in one of the world's biggest cities. The attacks spurred a continuing national debate over how young Muslim men, all either British citizens or residents, could have become so radicalized that they could have plotted mass murder in Britain.

The video footage played at the high-security Woolwich Crown Court showed panicked commuters, still jittery two weeks after the July 7 bombings, running off the train at the next stop, while an off-duty firefighter remained on board to confront the man with the backpack. Sweeney told the jury that Mohammed dropped his load to the train floor and told the firefighter, "What's the matter -- it is bread," before running away into the chaos on the train platform.

Mohammed and his five co-defendants -- Muktar Said Ibrahim, 28; Yassin Hassan Omar, 26; Hussain Osman, 28; Manfo Asiedu, 33; and Adel Yahya, 24 -- watched silently as Sweeney played the surveillance footage. They have denied the charges.

All six are London residents originally from Africa and face charges of conspiracy to commit murder. Eleven other people charged with helping them, or with failing to alert police to their plot, face trial later this year.

Britain has perhaps the world's highest concentration of closed-circuit surveillance cameras in public places. Those cameras were a critical tool used by police to identify the suspects in the July 7 and July 21 incidents and trace their movements on the day of the attacks and leading up to them.

The footage played in court showed the man identified as Mohammed running from the Oval subway station into a nearby housing project, where he pulled off a hooded sweatshirt with "New York" emblazoned across the front. Sweeney told jurors that this was a reference to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States, which included the destruction of the World Trade Center in New York. Mohammed was arrested several days after the July 21 incidents.

Sweeney also showed jurors photos of the abandoned backpack oozing a substance that police explosives specialists later identified as hydrogen peroxide. In the trial's opening session Monday, Sweeney told the jurors that the backpack bombs carried onto three subway trains and a bus that day were made from hydrogen peroxide mixed with flour for making chapati, an Indian flatbread.

Jurors on Tuesday also saw surveillance footage allegedly showing Ibrahim attempting to detonate his bomb on the upper level of a double-decker bus, causing panicked passengers to flee.

DOJ_NMG_0117663

They also saw footage alleging to show Omar entering and leaving the subway train he is accused of trying to blow up.

Sweeney told jurors that as Omar ran away from the Warren Street station, he approached a woman in full Muslim dress and demanded that she take him home.

"When she declined, he said words to the effect of, 'What kind of Muslim are you not helping another Muslim?' " Sweeney said.

The trial is expected to last three or four months.

U.S. Examines Footage Of Embassy Attack (AP)

By Nicholas Paphitis

AP, January 17, 2007

FBI agents are helping investigate last week's rocket-propelled grenade attack on the U.S. Embassy, trying to enhance security camera footage, the American ambassador said Tuesday.

The Jan. 12 attack was the first major strike on a Western target by suspected left-wing Greek militants in six years. It smashed a window and damaged a third-floor bathroom in the heavily fortified glass and concrete embassy. Nobody was hurt.

FBI experts flew in over the weekend and were working on the security footage, said U.S. Ambassador Charles Ries.

"It shows the missile streaking across the street and into the embassy," he told state NET television. "It was dark, it's not as good as we want. We're bringing in some experts to see what they can do in terms of looking at the files, ways to enhance it."

"The FBI is involved ... providing us their best people," he said.

Police have blamed Greek left-wing militants for the attack, but there have been no arrests and no claim of responsibility.

Greek law enforcement authorities are also seeking access to footage recorded by traffic cameras just outside the embassy compound.

But the move has provoked a debate about privacy rights, and the country's Data Protection Agency has imposed restrictions blocking police access to the footage.

The camera network was part of a $1.3 billion security umbrella bought for the 2004 Athens Olympics. Government spokesman Evangelos Antonaros said it proved useful during the games.

"How can some people now persuasively claim that this efficient system should not be used to protect Greek citizens' life and security?" Antonaros said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Vast Data Collection Plan Faces Big Delay (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

The Treasury Department reported to Congress yesterday that a data-collection program to give counterterrorism analysts routine access to as many as 500 million cross-border financial transactions a year could not be implemented until 2010. The department had hoped to implement it by the end of this year.

The Cross-Border Electronic Funds Transfer Program was part of the 2004 Intelligence Reform Act, and Congress directed the Treasury secretary to determine if the program would be effective in tracking terrorist financing. In a report to Congress to be released today, the Treasury Department concluded that the program was technologically feasible and has value, but said it needs to determine whether the counterterrorism benefit outweighs banks' costs of compliance and to address privacy concerns.

The program is opposed by bankers, who view it as burdensome and invasive.

Unlike another Treasury program, which uses administrative powers that bypass traditional banking privacy protections to tap into the vast global database of transactions maintained by the Brussels-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, the cross-border plan is the result of legislation sought by Treasury and would require congressional oversight.

Both programs were inspired by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Banks and money services are required by law to keep records on all wire transfers of $3,000 or more. The proposed program would mandate that each of those transactions -- if they cross the U.S. border -- be reported to the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network (FinCEN).

The type of data captured would include the names and addresses of senders, the amount and dates of the transfers, the names and addresses of the beneficiaries and their financial institutions.

Treasury officials said in interviews and in the report to Congress that the data would give analysts more information to ferret out illicit activity as they try to detect links between suspects.

FinCEN said that Australia and Canada had used similar data effectively. Australia has used it to catch tax evaders and predict the movement of drugs into and out of the country. But those countries deal with much smaller numbers of transactions.

Treasury receives more than 16 million currency transaction records and suspicious activity reports a year from banks and other financial institutions, which help officials track money launderers and terrorist activity.

Bankers say the additional reporting requirement would be a tremendous burden.

"We're talking about a volume of transactions that dwarfs anything that has been done in the name of [financial regulatory reporting] up to now," said Richard R. Riese, director of the American Bankers Association Center for Regulatory Compliance.

Beyond the reporting burden, he said, privacy concerns are significant. "All this information will now end up in the hands of the U.S. government for them to sift through at their leisure without any apparent process to assure that it is being used for the most significant national security investigations," Riese said. He likened it to a "fishing expedition" -- "except that the government no longer has to go and put their hook in the water. We have to give all the fish."

To streamline reporting, Treasury officials are recommending a "first in" and "last out" system so that only a single U.S. financial institution -- the last one in a transfer out of the country, or the first one in a transfer in -- would have to report each transaction.

"It's another example of the U.S. government's pattern of sweeping up massive amounts of data that it can't possibly analyze, that is not likely to have any significant security benefit, but does threaten privacy" -- that of Americans and of foreigners doing business with Americans, said Barry Steinhardt, director of the American Civil Liberties Union technology project.

European officials, too, raised privacy concerns. "If the program affects non-U.S. citizens, it should be developed in close cooperation with these other countries," said Sophie in't Veld, a member of the European Parliament from the Netherlands.

Stephen R. Kroll, former Democratic special counsel for the Senate Banking Committee, said the statute "wasn't designed to require reporting of every wire transfer that goes in and out of America -- both because that's billions of transactions and because most of them are perfectly ordinary."

He said the law was designed to give the Treasury Department power for "targeted data collection," aimed, for example, at a country where there is known terrorist activity.

In an October interview, Robert W. Werner, who then was director of FinCEN, said most of the data collected would be "commercial oriented" transactions and "irrelevant" to FinCEN's mission to detect and prevent illicit activity. "The key is to have a system that allows you to be able to pull the relevant data without people worrying that irrelevant data is being browsed and used inappropriately," he said.

FinCEN would also need to develop the technical capability to store and analyze the information, the study noted. FinCEN is considering setting up a "federated data warehouse" to store the data, which would be held separately from other financial records data.

Officials said there would be strict rules to ensure that the data is not shared inappropriately, including audit trails to check for improper access. The program would be developed through a public rulemaking process over an extended period, officials said.

"We know there will be costs. We believe there is value. How do those two play out?" said Eric Kringel, senior policy adviser at FinCEN. He said that as a regulatory body, FinCEN "would not want to proceed" without determining if the benefit is worth the cost.

FinCEN has proposed taking a year to conduct a $1.1 million cost benefit analysis. Implementation would cost $32.6 million and take 3 1/2 years, officials said.

Protesters Found In Database (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

A Defense Department database devoted to gathering information on potential threats to military facilities and personnel, known as Talon, had 13,000 entries as of a year ago -- including 2,821 reports involving American citizens, according to an internal Pentagon memo to be released today by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The Pentagon memo says an examination of the system led to the deletion of 1,131 reports involving Americans, 186 of which dealt with "anti-military protests or demonstrations in the U.S."

Titled "Review of the TALON Reporting System," the four-page memo produced in February 2006 summarizes some interim results from an inquiry ordered by then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld after disclosure in December 2005 that the system had collected and circulated data on anti-military protests and other peaceful demonstrations.

DOJ_NMG_0117665

The released memo, one of a series of Talon documents made public over the past year by the ACLU under a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, said that the deleted reports did not meet a 2003 Defense Department requirement that they have some foreign terrorist connection or relate to what was believed to be "a force protection threat."

The number of deleted reports far exceeds the estimate provided to The Washington Post just over a year ago by senior officials of Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), the Defense Department agency that manages the Talon program. At that time, then-CIFA Director David A. Burtt II said the review had disclosed that only 1 percent of the then 12,500 Talon reports appeared to be problematic.

The ACLU said in its own report that past disclosures about Talon "cried out for congressional oversight yet Congress was silent." It said the new memo indicated there "may be even more disturbing" information to discover and declared "it is time for Congress to act."

The ACLU noted the memo showed that Talon reports had a much wider circulation than previously disclosed, with about 28 organizations and 3,589 individuals authorized to submit reports or have access to the database. The organizations with access include various military agencies as well as state, federal and local law enforcement officials.

In early 2006, Burtt also said CIFA had not devised a formal way to notify its users when it decided to delete a Talon report on American citizens. The newly released memo says that a software enhancement was being initiated to permit users to edit and delete entries from the database and that it was scheduled for completion in April 2006.

A Pentagon spokesman said there are 7,700 reports in the Talon database. Some involve U.S. citizens, but the spokesman declined to say how many. Over the past year the program has instituted multiple layers of review for screening which reports should go into the database, the spokesman said.

CIFA has begun a process for analysts to review materials to make sure they fit the program's criteria before being uploaded and made available to Talon users. CIFA was established in 2002 in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, originally to coordinate the counterterrorism and counterintelligence operations of the various branches and agencies of the Defense Department. It has grown rapidly over the past four years, but not without problems. Along with discovery of the Talon data collection, CIFA was linked to the lobbying and earmarking activities that led to the conviction of former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.). Burtt and his top deputy retired in August 2006, and federal investigators are still looking at CIFA contracting activities.

Last week, the New York Times disclosed that CIFA had been using national security letters to gather financial data on U.S. citizens, but a Pentagon spokesman said yesterday that such information was for particular investigations and not made part of the Talon database.

Talon was started in May 2003 to capture raw, non-validated information about suspicious activity or potential terrorist threats to military personnel or facilities at home and abroad.

Civilian Pilots Provide Target Practice (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

As his watch ticks toward midnight, Paul Gardella checks the oil on the small Cessna 182 parked on a cold, dark airstrip in Fairfax County. He knows what he soon could be facing: Coast Guard helicopters chasing him. F-16s intercepting him. Ground-to-air missiles tracking his every turn.

That's because Gardella -- a software engineer and former military officer -- is taking on a new role.

Enemy of the U.S. government.

"In the Navy, I was on the other side. I was on the side of the ones that were shooting," he muses.

Gardella, 50, is among a group of pilots who pose as nighttime intruders, penetrating restricted airspace over Washington in drills that take place every few weeks. While area residents slumber, the volunteers allow the U.S. military to practice intercepting them -- or worse.

The pilots are with the Civil Air Patrol, a national organization with a proud history of service. During World War II, its daredevil pilots chased German U-boats along the U.S. coast. In the ensuing decades, volunteers ran bomb-shelter exercises and helped the Air Force search for crashed planes.

Now, with the country facing terrorist threats, the Civil Air Patrol is returning to its homeland-defense roots.

"I understand there has to be practice," said Gardella, a laid-back father of three from Burke. If bad guys are what Uncle Sam needs, he declared, "I'm happy to help out."

In the low-slung flight operations center at Fort Belvoir, Gardella and three other pilots met on a recent wintry night to prepare for their mission. Clad in olive flight suits with Civil Air Patrol patches, they sat on couches in a wood-paneled room, studying maps and listening to a flight briefing from Gene Hartman, 72, a patrol member from Springfield.

It was Gardella's first homeland security exercise, but his companions were veteran invaders.

Air Force Col. Keith Zuegel, 47, won a Silver Star for bombing an Iraqi-held air base in the 1991 Persian Gulf War. After being promoted to a desk job, he joined the Civil Air Patrol to fly in his spare time. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he was asked to take part in military exercises again -- this time, over Washington.

As the target.

"I said, 'Can you assure me I won't be shot down?' " the Vienna resident laughed.

Kylie McDonald, 35, has been flying the missions for two years. The Centreville resident grew up in a military family and always felt the tug of national service.

"Now I'm getting a similar opportunity, even though I'm a civilian," said McDonald, who works for a company that provides aviation services.

Outside the room, in a pressed navy-blue uniform, sat Jane Davies, 52, of Springfield, who joined the Civil Air Patrol in 1969 as a "Star Trek"-obsessed teenager. She is commander of the patrol's D.C. area branch, or wing, which includes more than 200 adult volunteers and nearly 300 cadets under age 21.

Only a small group of them are allowed to fly the Civil Air Patrol's red-white-and-blue Cessnas, Davies explained. Other patrol members are trained in activities such as hunting for vanished planes or handing out relief supplies after floods or hurricanes. For decades, the roughly 56,000 members nationwide have helped out the Air Force or local governments with such tasks.

Now they are back doing homeland security -- "exactly what we did 65 years ago," Davies said, referring to the founding of the Civil Air Patrol by aviation enthusiasts at the dawn of World War II.

Nationally, the patrol takes part in a variety of anti-terror activities. Some pilots periodically snap aerial photographs of sensitive sites such as nuclear plants or dams for the government. Sometimes patrol members are asked to fly military officers or government officials over certain areas.

"We're not necessarily made privy to what they're looking at," said Rick Greenhut, head of homeland security for the patrol. "We're kind of the bus driver."

Perhaps the most exciting missions, though, are the exercises known as Falcon Virgo, which take place over cities such as New York and Washington. They are directed by officials from the 1st Air Force at Tyndall Air Force Base in Florida, who coordinate air defense for the continental United States.

Details of the Falcon Virgo exercises are often secret.

"They ask us not to discuss it, for everyone's safety," McDonald said. The volunteer pilot simply informs friends she's "on a special mission for homeland security."

But this much is known: The exercises test Washington's air-defense radar system and the aircraft that might have to confront an intruder. Those include the Air Force jets that fly continuously over the capital, planes that scramble from Andrews Air Force base and Coast Guard helicopters.

Participants include officials up the chain of command who must decide whether to intercept or shoot down an aircraft. Many involved in the exercises are not told that the Cessnas are "friendlies" until after they have been picked up by radar -- but well before any decision would be made to shoot them down.

During some exercises, the military also tracks the Cessnas with ground-to-air missiles. "Which can be kind of disconcerting if you're flying them," observed Lt. Col. Gerry Sohan of the Air Force District of Washington. None are fired, though.

The Civil Air Patrol is an auxiliary of the Air Force, which evaluates each wing every two years and provides about $30 million a year for planes, fuel and other expenses. The patrol owns more than 500 Cessnas, the biggest fleet in the world.

But the Air Force doesn't pay the volunteers, thus saving a huge amount of money.

"Just for the national capital region, one exercise would probably save close to $10,000," said Mark O'Brien, an employee with the 1st Air Force who is in charge of liaison with the Civil Air Patrol.

Civil Air Patrol members pay $65 a year in dues and buy their own uniforms. In return, they get the opportunity to fly at reduced rates or take cheap flying lessons. But, Gardella said, they receive something more important.

"Most of my flying has been for myself, for my own enjoyment," he said, referring to his many years as a private pilot. "I started to feel the Lord gave me the ability and resources and passion to fly, and so I ought to give something back."

That explains why he was lifting off into the sky in a Cessna shortly before midnight with Zuegel at his side. It was to be a long night; they were supposed to invade Washington twice.

Gardella isn't allowed to reveal what transpired in the nightlong exercise. But, contacted a few days later, he said he finished with such an adrenaline rush that he actually went to work instead of taking time off to sleep.

And were his co-workers impressed that he had been out all night trying to help defend the United States from enemies, zooming his little Cessna into restricted airspace to be a target for fighter planes, helicopters and ground-to-air missiles?

New Scanner Gets Off On Wrong Foot; Fliers End Up Shedding Shoes Anyway (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, January 17, 2007

ORLANDO — Many air travelers who were screened Tuesday by a revolutionary new machine aimed at letting them keep their shoes on through airport security got an unexpected surprise — they had to take their shoes off anyway.

About half of the travelers using Orlando International Airport's first-in-the-nation ShoeScanner underwent the very hassle the machines were designed to ease — putting shoes through checkpoint X-rays — because the ShoeScanner detected metal in their shoes.

"It's a waste of time," Tracey Grenkoski of Orlando said after spending more than a minute on a ShoeScanner only to be told to remove her high-heeled shoes. "What's the point of me standing there if I still have to take my shoes off?"

Grenkoski had company. Of 50 travelers who used the ShoeScanner in a one-hour period here Tuesday, 28 had to remove their metal-laden shoes, according to USA TODAY's observation.

Steven Brill, whose Manhattan company, Verified Identity Pass, operates the ShoeScanners, said 52% of hundreds of passengers using the machine Tuesday morning had to remove shoes. In about a third of the cases in which travelers were told to take their shoes off, the ShoeScanner couldn't do an electronic scan for weapons because people moved their feet, he said.

Up to 1,500 of Orlando's 47,000 daily departing passengers will use its ShoeScanners.

ShoeScanners were intended to boost the fledgling Registered Traveler program, which promises fast trips through airport security for people who voluntarily pay about $100 a year and pass a background check.

The program, which has operated only in Orlando, started Tuesday in Terminal 7 at New York's Kennedy International. It opens Thursday in Indianapolis and next week in Cincinnati and San Jose, Calif. All are awaiting approval from the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) to use ShoeScanners.

Brill's company submitted the machine last year to the TSA for approval. General Electric's GE Security, which makes the $200,000 machine, hoped it would detect explosives and distinguish between metal commonly found in shoes and metal that could be a weapon, said company product manager Daniel Mahlum. The company is trying to upgrade the machine so it can allow passengers to wear shoes that contain harmless metal.

For now, TSA spokesman Christopher White said, if the ShoeScanner senses any explosives or metal, "it's going to require additional scrutiny."

Brill said he expects people in Registered Traveler to stop wearing shoes with metal.

Some Orlando passengers didn't mind having to remove their shoes after they were screened for explosives.

"It doesn't make much (time) difference," said Bob Halcrow, noting that even with a one-minute shoe scan, there was no line at the Registered Traveler lane. Regular security checkpoints had a 20-minute backup.

Registered Traveler Starts At JFK Airport (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, January 17, 2007

A long-delayed program aimed at speeding trusted travelers through airport security took a small but dramatic step Tuesday when it opened at one terminal in New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport.

The opening marks the official launch of Registered Traveler beyond Orlando International Airport, which since July 2005 has run the only airport-sponsored program to put airline travelers at the front of security lines if they pay about $100 a year and pass a background check.

Many airlines give first-class and other preferred passengers their own line leading to security checkpoints. Registered Traveler opens such privileges to a potentially much wider market.

"People have been clamoring for this for years," said Caleb Tiller of the National Business Travel Association. "It's available to anybody. Airline programs are really limited to passengers carrying a certain class of ticket or a certain mileage status."

Indianapolis International Airport plans to start a Registered Traveler program Thursday. Airports in San Jose, Calif., and Cincinnati are scheduled to join next week, said Steven Brill, whose Manhattan company, Verified Identity Pass, will manage the programs.

Other airports are likely to follow when they see Registered Traveler grow, Brill said. "The next five airports are infinitely easier than the first five, and the five after that are a cakewalk," he said.

Some travelers are skeptical. "I'm very doubtful it will expand," Patrick Richmond said Tuesday as he bypassed Orlando's regular 20-minute security line for the Registered Traveler "line" that had two other passengers. "The cost seems enormous."

DOJ_NMG_0117668

Orlando has four $200,000 machines — two at each checkpoint — that read fingerprint-embedded ID cards to verify the identities of people in the program and that check their shoes for weapons. The ShoeScanner machines aim to spare passengers from having to take off their shoes when going through security.

Indianapolis and San Jose will have six each, and there will be two at Cincinnati and at Kennedy's Terminal 7, which British Airways owns.

"That makes no difference to me whatsoever," Richmond said of the four airports joining Orlando. "I never go to any of those cities."

More than 30,000 people have joined Registered Traveler at Orlando, which does not have airline-run security lines for elite travelers. About 5,000 total have signed up at the other four airports since enrollment began last fall.

Some Orlando passengers said Tuesday that being able to keep their shoes on while passing through security was a step forward. "It's a little bit less of a hassle," said Derek Simonds of Deland, Fla. "But to have Registered Traveler at other airports would be tremendous."

Last year, 22 airports told the Transportation Security Administration they were interested in starting Registered Traveler, including Los Angeles, Chicago O'Hare, Denver, Miami and Washington's Dulles and Reagan National.

Miami security director Lauren Stover said the ShoeScanner could make Registered Traveler more appealing.

She said the airport is still weighing the "customer-service value and the impact it will have on (security) wait times for passengers throughout the airport."

Keep Your Shoes On, For A Price (NYT)

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

Of all the hassles at the airport in this age of heightened security, perhaps the most annoying is the requirement to take off your shoes to send them through the X-ray screener. That burden will be lifted at some airports shortly — for those willing to pay about $100 a year for the privilege.

The Transportation Security Administration has recently approved a new device that will scan your shoes while you are still wearing them. It uses quadrupole resonance technology, similar to a medical M.R.I., to determine whether explosives or weapons might be hidden in your shoes. It is the first important new technology to emerge from the for-profit registered traveler programs.

The hitch is that, for now, you have to pay to join a program in which private companies pledge to move you through the security lines a bit faster if you submit to a government background check in advance and supply biometric data — like a thumbprint or iris scan — that can be used to identify you at the airport.

The lead company in the field, founded by Steven Brill, operates the registered traveler lanes in Orlando, Fla., where use of the shoe scanner started yesterday, and plans to open lanes at four more airports in coming weeks. That will include Kennedy Airport, where one lane opened yesterday but with its shoe scanner not yet operational.

The scanner was developed for Mr. Brill's company by G.E. Security, a subsidiary of General Electric. It is part of a kiosk that also includes a device to scan fingertips for traces of chemicals that might indicate recent contact with explosives. That technology, if approved by the federal government, could make it possible for travelers to be X-rayed for hidden explosives without first having to take off their coats. Another company is exploring backscatter X-ray technology that can see through clothing to detect hidden objects, although that carries privacy implications. Also down the road is a technology to scan laptops without removing them from their cases.

These technology advances could become the major contribution of registered traveler programs, which otherwise simply offer those willing to pay an annual fee a designated fast lane to a set of the airport's standard metal detectors and X-ray scanners. The kiosks cost a hefty $150,000, probably too much for the government to swallow. But G.E. would surely relish a broad market, and volume production would presumably reduce the price. Someday these technologies may trickle down to us all, and the registered traveler companies will have to keep finding new devices to stay ahead.

Muslims Cite Discrimination In Denial Of Flight (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

An Islamic civil rights group is calling for an investigation to determine why 40 Muslims were not allowed to board a flight from Germany to Detroit after their pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia.

Northwest Airlines officials said the passengers arrived too late to catch the flight, but some of the Muslims, appearing at a press conference yesterday with the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), called it religious discrimination.

DOJ_NMG_0117669

The Muslims arrived at the Frankfurt airport at 7:30 a.m. Jan. 7 on a charter plane from Saudi Arabia. They did not show up at the ticket counter until about 20 minutes before the Detroit-bound Flight 51 left at 10:20 a.m., said Dean Breest, a Northwest Airlines spokesman.

The airline industry and governmental agencies have check-in and boarding deadlines to help ensure on-time departures, and Northwest Airlines policy states that passengers must check in for international flights at least 60 minutes before departure and be aboard the aircraft at least 30 minutes before departure.

"The rules are the rules," said Roman Blahoski, spokesman for Northwest Airlines. "It does not matter who they are; they would be turned away because the flight had already closed."

Mr. Blahoski said, "Northwest takes these accusations very seriously," but "these passengers were denied boarding because they did not meet the standard check-in deadline."

Imam Sayed Hassan Al-Qazwini of the Islamic Center of America in Dearborn, Mich., told reporters that the travelers, who included two imams, were stranded and left on their own to find flights home.

Mr. Breest, however, said those who arrived at the gate in time with boarding passes were allowed onto the plane, and that those who could not be accommodated were rescheduled for other flights.

"It has nothing to do with religion, but when you have to be on the plane," Mr. Breest said. "They just were not there in time.

"We're sorry, but we did get them to the next destination as soon as possible. We were still able to process some of them and get them on the flight, then rebooked the rest of the group the same day for flights via Amsterdam."

Mr. Al-Qazwini demanded an apology from the airline as well as unspecified compensation.

If the airline does not meet their demands, Mr. Al-Qazwini said, he may call for a Muslim boycott of Northwest.

In November, six imams who were removed from a US Airways flight after exhibiting suspicious behavior called for a boycott of that airline. The Muslims retained CAIR as their legal representatives and have threatened to file a lawsuit.

US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said: "We're in contact with them but we have no resolution."

Intelligence Agency's $100M Leasing Deal Examined (USAT)

By Matt Kelley, Usa Today

USA Today, January 17, 2007

Auditors: CIFA lacked authority to sign contract

WASHINGTON — A Pentagon domestic intelligence agency overpaid and might have broken the law in awarding a $100 million contract to lease office space, federal investigators say.

The Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA) awarded the no-bid deal in 2003 to TKC Communications. Federal auditors say the agency lacked the authority to sign the contract and overpaid by more than $2 million.

Internal watchdogs at the Pentagon and Interior Department, as well as Congress' Government Accountability Office, began questioning the contract last year. Still, federal contracting records show CIFA has paid TKC more than $11 million since Pentagon auditors raised their concerns in May, including more than $6 million in late November.

Interior investigators wrote in a report released last week that department officials defended the deal as legal and refused to stop paying the company. "Congressional involvement may be required to sort out this contract," the investigators wrote.

The contracting questions come as CIFA faces criticism over its surveillance tactics. Created in 2002, the agency oversees investigations and efforts to block terrorism or espionage against military bases or personnel in the USA.

The agency has issued hundreds of "national security letters" to obtain the banking records of suspects, a practice The New York Times revealed this weekend.

The American Civil Liberties Union criticized the practice, as it did in December 2005 after reports that a CIFA database included information about non-violent war protesters. Vice President Cheney defended the surveillance as legal during a TV interview Sunday.

The 10-year contract with TKC calls for the company to obtain and renovate office space in the Washington area for other contractors working for CIFA. TKC has leased nine floors of an office building near the Pentagon, and has been paid about $66.7 million for its work, federal records show.

The agency used an Interior Department office that was created to help all federal departments order supplies or services more quickly. Auditors from the Pentagon, Interior and Congress have repeatedly criticized using the Interior office, saying it often means the deals aren't scrutinized as carefully as other Pentagon contracts.

Thomas Gimble, acting Defense Department inspector general, is expected to testify before a Senate Armed Services subcommittee today about the contract, spokesman Gary Comerford said.

The Interior Department report released Jan. 9 says the contract was "likely void from its inception" because only the federal General Services Administration has leasing authority.

DOJ_NMG_0117670

A Pentagon audit released last month cites other problems with the contract. CIFA didn't notify House and Senate intelligence committees about the contract as required and apparently paid the company out of the wrong accounts, the audit found.

Brooke Smith, TKC Communications' chief operating officer, said the company didn't know about the audits until a reporter asked about them Tuesday. CIFA spokeswoman Louise Dreuth did not respond to questions about the contract Tuesday.

TKC got the no-bid contract because it's a subsidiary of two Alaska Native corporations, which get preferred treatment under federal contracting laws.

Congressional investigators reported last year that CIFA officials specifically requested the company because it had done work for another Pentagon agency.

In a written response to that GAO report, Interior official Thomas Weiner disagreed, saying TKC won the deal because its proposal met the agency's requirements. Investigators said government and company employees contradicted him.

WAR NEWS:

President Says His Iraq Policy Was Failing (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

President Bush said that his Iraq policy was headed to "a slow failure" until he changed course last week with the announcement that he was sending more than 21,000 additional U.S. troops to bolster flagging security in Baghdad.

The comment, perhaps the president's frankest admission that the previous strategy was not working, came during an interview yesterday with Jim Lehrer of PBS's "NewsHour," in which Bush detailed some of his decision-making regarding Iraq.

"I had a choice to make," Bush said. "Do what we're doing -- and one could define that maybe a slow failure. Secondly, withdraw out of Baghdad and hope for the best. I think that would be expedited failure. And thirdly is to help this Iraqi government with additional forces -- help them do what they need to do, which is to provide security in Baghdad."

Bush added: "I chose the latter because I think it's going to more likely be successful."

The interview was part of an ongoing White House campaign to sell the new Iraq policy in the face of intense skepticism from Congress and the American public. Bush acknowledged this view while sharpening his criticism of the Iraqi government over its handling of the execution of Saddam Hussein and security in Baghdad.

Bush said the Hussein execution was "fumbled" and "reinforced doubts in people's minds that the Maliki government and the unity government of Iraq is a serious government."

"It looked like it was kind of a revenge killing," Bush added. "And it sent a mixed signal to the American people and the people around the world. And it just goes to show that this is a government that has still got some maturation to do."

Bush also said the U.S. and Iraq governments share blame for the failure to stop sectarian violence from escalating in the aftermath of February's bombing of one of Shiite Islam's holiest sites, the Askariya shrine in Samarra.

"We should have found troops and moved them," Bush said. "But part of it was that the Iraqis didn't move troops. And I take responsibility for us not moving our own troops into Baghdad."

Asked why the troops were not provided, Bush replied: "I think the commanders there felt like it was important to make sure the Iraqis did first, or that the Iraqis made a focused, concerted effort. And they just didn't. There were supposedly six brigades committed and they sent two." He said that will change with the latest Baghdad security plan.

Bush was also asked by Lehrer why he was not willing to ask more Americans to sacrifice something, given the importance he has attached to the struggle in Iraq.

"I think a lot of people are in this fight," Bush replied. "I mean, they -- they sacrifice peace of mind when they see the terrible images of violence on TV every night. I mean, we got a fantastic economy here in the United States, but yet, when you think about the psychology of the country, it is -- it is somewhat down because of this war."

Bush said talk of sacrifice in Washington means raising taxes.

"If that's the kind of sacrifice people are talking about, I'm not for it because raising taxes will hurt this growing economy," the president said.

Bush Chides Iraq Over Recent Executions (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117671

President Bush said Tuesday the unruly execution of Saddam Hussein "looked like it was kind of a revenge killing," making it harder to persuade a skeptical U.S. public that Iraq's government will keep promises central to Bush's plan for a troop increase.

In his toughest assessment yet, Bush criticized the circumstances of Saddam's hanging last month, as well as Monday's execution of two top aides, including Saddam's half brother.

"I was disappointed and felt like they fumbled the — particularly the Saddam Hussein execution," the president said in an interview with PBS' Jim Lehrer.

A cell phone video of Saddam's Dec. 30 hanging showed the deposed Iraqi leader being taunted as he stood on the gallows with a noose around his neck. An official video of the execution of Saddam's half brother showed that the hangman's noose decapitated him. Both hangings provoked outrage around the world, but particularly among Saddam's fellow Sunnis in Iraq.

Bush said he had expressed his displeasure about the way Saddam's execution was handled to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The president announced what he called a new strategy for the war last week, with much of it hinging on his trust in al-Maliki's government to make radical changes.

"It basically says to people, `Look, you conducted a trial and gave Saddam justice that he didn't give to others. But then, when it came to execute him, it looked like it was kind of a revenge killing,'" the president said.

"It makes it harder for me to make the case to the American people that this is a government that does want to unify the country and move forward," Bush said. "And it just goes to show that this is a government that has still got some maturation to do."

Bush agreed to the interview, to be telecast Tuesday evening on PBS' "NewsHour With Jim Lehrer," as well as one last weekend on CBS' "60 Minutes" to help sell his revised war plan to the public.

Polls show that Americans are overwhelmingly unhappy with Bush's Iraq policy. Seventy percent oppose sending more troops to Iraq, as he intends to do, according to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll last week

Bush said if a pollster asked for his opinion about Iraq, "I would be one of those that said, 'No, I don't approve of what's taking place in Iraq.'"

He said that keeping his old policies in place in the war would lead to "a slow failure," but withdrawing from Iraq, as some critics suggest, would result in an "expedited failure."

"I am frustrated with the progress," the president said. "A year ago, I felt pretty good about the situation. I felt like we were achieving our objective, which is a country that can govern, sustain, and defend itself. No question, 2006 was a lousy year for Iraq."

Senate Democrats plan by Thursday to introduce a resolution denouncing the president's plan, with floor debate to begin next week — around the time Bush delivers his State of the Union speech on Jan. 23.

The bill, by not eliminating funding for either current troops or the additions, would be merely an expression of Congress' position. But it would help Democrats gauge Republican support for more aggressive legislative tactics, as well as embarrass Bush.

On Tuesday, Democrats were reaching out to potential Republican cosponsors. Several GOP senators have spoken out against sending more troops.

"The hope is to introduce a bill that would be a bipartisan resolution," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

House Democrats say they will wait for the Senate to debate the resolution before taking up their own. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., told reporters Tuesday he anticipates the Senate will have a "significant bipartisan vote" that will help set the tone for the House debate.

White House press secretary Tony Snow suggested that Congress' Democratic leaders think through the ramifications of any vote.

"In an age of instant and global communication, what message does it send to the people who are fighting democracy in Iraq, and also what message does it send to the troops?" he said. "But, you know, the House and Senate are going to do whatever they do. What the president is determined to do is continue moving forward in a way that creates conditions for success in Iraq."

As the president pressed the case for his troop additions, there were ugly reminders from Iraq of the tough job ahead.

More than 100 people died in several attacks on predominantly Shiite areas, including an explosion outside a Baghdad university that killed at least 65 people and a blast at a marketplace for used motorcycles. The United Nations, meanwhile, said more than 34,000 Iraqi civilians died last year in sectarian violence.

Bush Widens Iraq Criticism Over Handling Of Executions (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — President Bush said Tuesday that Iraq had "fumbled" the executions of Saddam Hussein and two of his deputies, and that the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "has still got some maturation to do."

The president's remarks were the most extensive yet on the executions, and they pointed up the continued tensions between Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki as they try to forge a joint plan to calm the violence plaguing Iraq.

Mr. Bush expressed particular displeasure with the handling of Mr. Hussein's hanging in late December, at which guards chanted their allegiance to the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who backs Mr. Maliki and whose militia has been a major source of anti-Sunni violence.

"It basically says to people, 'Look, you conducted a trial and gave Saddam justice that he didn't give to others,' " Mr. Bush said in an interview with Jim Lehrer of PBS. "But then when it came to execute him, it looked like it was kind of a revenge killing."

The president has said that Mr. Maliki has given him assurances that political considerations will not hinder Iraqi and American forces from going after the militias, including Mr. Sadr's.

But the notion that Mr. Maliki's government will crack down on Mr. Sadr, a course considered crucial to the success of Mr. Bush's new plan for Iraq, has been met with skepticism. And Mr. Bush said the handling of the execution only added to the questions.

"It reinforced doubts in people's minds that the Maliki government and the unity government of Iraq is a serious government," Mr. Bush said, "which makes it harder for me to make the case to the American people that this is a government that does want to unify the country and move forward."

Mr. Bush spoke with Mr. Lehrer, host of the "The NewsHour With Jim Lehrer" on PBS, as part of a media tour aimed at rebuilding support for the war and, more specifically, the new war plan he announced last week. Officials have said that Mr. Bush was in part trying to build credibility after so many setbacks in Iraq by nodding to troubles there.

"We have to swallow hard and remind people the president realizes how hard it is," said a White House official involved in the strategy.

The interview on PBS was the second shown in three days in which Mr. Bush went into detail acknowledging setbacks and public frustration.

"If you were to take it and put me in an opinion poll and said, 'Do I approve of Iraq?' I'd be one of those that said, 'No, I don't approve of what's taking place in Iraq,' " Mr. Bush said in the interview.

"On the other hand, I do believe we can succeed," he said.

Mr. Bush said on "60 Minutes" on Sunday night, "No question decisions have made things unstable," though he added, "But the question is, can we succeed? And I believe we can."

Democrats and even some Republicans have interpreted Mr. Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq as a refutation of the suggestions of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which had as its chairmen Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman, and a longtime Republican aide to Mr. Bush's father, James A. Baker III.

Mr. Bush said he did not disagree with the report's overall suggestion that United States military operations shift their focus to training the Iraqis and going after terrorists. But he said the Iraqis were not yet strong enough to take the lead in combating sectarian strife.

"They have a good strategy inherent in their report towards the role of U.S. troops inside Iraq," Mr. Bush said. "It's just that there needs to be an interim stage in order to achieve that objective."

Bush: Saddam Hanging Botched (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, January 17, 2007

President Bush on Tuesday criticized the handling of Saddam Hussein's execution, saying it looked like "kind of a revenge killing" that had eroded the American public's faith in the Iraqi government.

Bush said the hanging showed that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government "still has some maturation to do" as U.S. and Iraqi forces make a new push to secure Baghdad.

The president's criticism, in an interview with public television's Jim Lehrer, came on a particularly bloody day in Iraq. At least 65 people died in an explosion outside a Baghdad university. Overall, more than 140 Iraqis were killed or found dead.

Bush said that while he was "pleased" with the trials received by Saddam and his top aides, he was troubled with the circus atmosphere surrounding Saddam's execution Dec. 30. Cellphone video showed Saddam being taunted as he stood on the gallows.

"I was disappointed and felt like they fumbled the — particularly the Saddam Hussein — execution," Bush said. Bush acknowledged that the way the execution was conducted made it harder for him "to make the case to the American people that this is a government that does want to unify the country."

Bush has called on al-Maliki, a Shiite, to reach out to disgruntled Sunnis and to help disarm sectarian militias as 21,500 additional U.S. troops begin arriving in Iraq.

An official video of Monday's execution of Saddam's half brother showed him being decapitated by the noose. Al-Maliki said Tuesday's violence was the work of people seeking revenge for the executions. He called those responsible "a desperate group of terrorists and Saddamists." Also Tuesday:

·The U.S. military said four U.S. soldiers were killed Monday in the northwestern province of Ninevah.

·In Baghdad, deadly attacks were staged in primarily Shiite neighborhoods, including an explosion that killed 13 at a marketplace for used motorcycles and a drive-by shooting. Raad Abbas, 26, who was wounded in the attack at the motorcycle market, said he had gone there because the city had been quieter of late.

"Shortly after midday, I heard an explosion. Motorcycles were flying in the air. People were falling dead and wounded," Abbas told the Associated Press.

At Al-Mustansiriya University, Dean Taqi al-Moussawi told Al-Iraqiya TV that there had been two explosions. Another suicide attacker was thwarted, he said. Most of the dead were women waiting for vehicles to take them home.

"The terrorists want to stop education," he said. "Those students had nothing to do with politics. They only came to the university to learn."

·A new United Nations report said 34,452 Iraqi civilians were killed last year — an average of 94 per day — and 36,685 were wounded.

The U.N. report was based on information from Iraq's government and hospitals. "Unfortunately it is a war," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. "The actual number, whatever it is, is too high."

Botched Hangings In Iraq Speed Sectarianism (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

CAIRO, Jan. 16 — The botched hanging of Saddam Hussein and two lieutenants in Iraq by its Shiite-led government has helped to accelerate Sunni-Shiite sectarianism across an already fragile Middle East, according to experts across the region.

The chaotic executions and the calm with which Mr. Hussein confronted the gallows and mocking Shiite guards have bolstered his image among many of his fellow Sunni Muslims.

But something else is happening too: a pan-Muslim unity that surged after the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite militia, is waning.

And while political analysts and government officials in the region say the spreading Sunni disillusionment with Shiites and their backers in Iran will benefit Sunni-led governments and the United States, they and others worry that the tensions could start to balkanize the region as they have in Iraq itself.

“The reality of the current situation is that we are approaching an open Sunni-Shiite conflict in the region,” said Emad Gad, a specialist in international relations at the government-financed Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. “And Egypt will also be a part of it as a part of the Sunni axis. No one will be able to avoid or escape it.”

This changing dynamic in the region, described by many scholars, analysts and officials in recent days, is a result not only of the hangings, the Iraq war and the Lebanese political struggle. It has also been encouraged by Sunni-led governments like those in Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, and some Sunni religious leaders alarmed by the rising influence of Iran, the region’s biggest Shiite power. Far from Cairo, in a sprawling farming village in the Nile Delta region north of the city, Hamada Abdullah, a Sunni Muslim, said that after the war between Hezbollah and Israel, he posted a small picture of Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader, on the bare wall of his home. It did not matter that Sheik Nasrallah was a Shiite Muslim aligned with the Shiite state of Iran.

To Mr. Abdullah, Sheik Nasrallah was first and foremost a bold Arab resistance leader. But since the hanging of Mr. Hussein and since Hezbollah has pushed to topple the Sunni-led government in Lebanon, he has begun to reconsider.

He says he is suspicious of Sheik Nasrallah and his politics. “His whole army in the south of Lebanon, they are Shiites,” Mr. Abdullah said. While some American officials and Sunni leaders say that increased tension leads to reduced Iranian influence, others say that sectarian loyalties are difficult to control.

“When Hezbollah did what they did in Lebanon in the summer, no one thought of it as a Shiite party; it was a nationalist party,” said Taher Masri, a former prime minister of Jordan. “Now with the events in Iraq culminating in the way Saddam Hussein was executed and the lack of condemnation and total silence of Hezbollah, many people are examining the position of Hezbollah as a Shiite party."

Some of the region's Sunni-led governments and religious leaders used the hanging of Mr. Hussein on a Sunni Muslim holy day as a weapon in the jockeying for regional power.

"Sunni states are using this sectarian card to undercut Iran's influence because they feel that Iran was able to penetrate the Arab world after the fall of Iraq, which was acting as a shield against Iranian influence," said Marwan Kabalan, a political science professor at Damascus University.

Sunnis make up a vast majority of the Islamic world. Shiites, who lead Iran and the Iraqi government, are the next largest sect. The two split over who would lead Islam after the death of the Prophet Muhammad.

While the two have theological differences — and similarities — the gathering conflict is being stoked by a determination by Sunni leaders to preserve, or reinvigorate, their waning influence in the region — while emboldened Shiites have pressed for more influence.

After the war between Hezbollah and Israel, Shiite leaders seemed to reach their zenith as an antidote to a Sunni Muslim leadership widely viewed as corrupt, impotent and stooges of the West, analysts said.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and Sheik Nasrallah of Hezbollah, each won wide followings across the region for their willingness to defy the United States. Hezbollah and its allies pressed for more power in Lebanon and when rebuffed, began demonstrations intended to topple the government.

Now, fueled by state controlled media in many Sunni Muslim states, a divide, or at least an estrangement, is growing across the Middle East between Sunni Muslims and Shiites. Egyptians, for example, are inundated nearly daily with headlines, commentaries and television reports alleging Shiite transgressions.

An Egyptian-government controlled satellite service, called Nilesat, has been broadcasting across the Arab world Al Zawraa, a television station that shows what is billed as heroic footage of the Sunni insurgency in Iraq, American soldiers being killed and wounded, and unflattering images of Shiite leaders.

"Raising the ugly face of Shiites, expanding Iranian influence in the region," read a headline in a recent edition of Rose el-Youssef, a pro-government Egyptian newspaper.

In December, a top religious leader close to the Saudi royal family, Abdul Rahman al-Barak, said that Shiites, whom he called rejectionists, were worse than Jews or Christians.

"By and large, rejectionists are the most evil sect of the nation and they have all the ingredients of the infidels," he wrote.

Such talk is causing a creeping sectarian tension, political analysts said. In Mr. Abdullah's village in the Nile Delta region of Egypt, where many people had posted a picture of Sheik Nasrallah, there is a growing sense of disunity with Shiites that mirrors partly what is happening in Iraq. "Saddam Hussein was the one courageous man among Arab leaders," said Ibrahim Mustafa Ibrahim, a school janitor. "We saw how he was executed. We saw everything."

Forget Cash -- Lobbyists Should Set Support For Lawmakers In Stone (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

It looks increasingly likely that the Democrats will pass some sort of ethics reform legislation that, on the off chance that it would close some cash spigots to lawmakers, could require more creative approaches by lobbyists.

Well, not too creative. Fortunately, neither the House nor Senate proposals, we're told, restrict our favorite way for lobbyists to curry favor and gratitude -- and get extended face time with lawmakers: funding those eponymous charitable or educational centers -- the Sen. Preston Flubus Center for the Study of Left-Handed People, and the like.

Granted, these member-connected projects, such as the Joyce Murtha Breast Cancer Center in Rep. Jack Murtha's Pennsylvania district, are often worthwhile. Ditto the Sen. Trent Lott Library at the University of Mississippi or even the Burns Telecom Center at Montana State University in Bozeman, there because of former senator Conrad Burns. There are countless other buildings, programs and chairs named for lawmakers. (Best to give to the building funds, as the programs and chairs most likely will disappear the moment the lawmaker leaves office.) But either way, special-interest groups get to give money for things very near and dear to the hearts of lawmakers -- literally to a monument lasting far longer than a member's tenure. Nothing is as important to our representatives save reelection itself. And some contributions lead to those annual gala dinners at members' alma maters or schools where more face time may be had.

Best of all, such contributions don't even require disclosure. The institutional recipients may disclose the donations in their annual reports, or use the donor list to raise more money, but the individual members obviously don't need to.Once Lawless, Always Lawless?

DOJ_NMG_0117675

New Defense Secretary Robert Gates is said to be putting together his inner office staff and perhaps bringing more new blood to the Pentagon. But it's not going to be easy.

First, there's the problem of recruiting top people to join an embattled administration in its last two years. It's especially hard to recruit someone not in government for a job that requires confirmation. In addition, Gates was happily ensconced in academia for several years and hardly thinking of returning in this position. Finally, he comes from the intelligence community, not the DOD world.

But maybe he could follow the example of Bill Casey, his late boss at the CIA, who was looking for ways around the agency bureaucracy to set up back channels with business leaders to make contact with some of the world's more odious dictators, such as Libya's Moammar Gaddafi.

As Gates recounts in his 1996 book "From the Shadows," Casey "bypassed" the operations directorate structure, "reached down and found an individual case officer he liked and trusted, and gave him the task of making these contacts. The officer's improbable pseudonym was 'Lawless.' "

Still is. And now Richard Lawless works for Gates. He's the deputy undersecretary of defense for Asia and Pacific affairs. Maybe Gates will introduce himself.Cheney's Smooth Talking

Administration officials -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and others -- seemed a bit off-stride, less self-assured, last week as they got a bipartisan hammering on the Hill and from the media about the war in Iraq.

It fell, once again, to Vice President Cheney to show how to take the long view in handling this sniping. On "Fox News Sunday," he told Chris Wallace: "Well, I think if you look at what's transpired in Iraq, Chris, we have, in fact, made enormous progress," and he noted that Saddam Hussein is dead. "The fact is we've come a long way from where we started in Iraq," he said. "Now, no war ever goes smoothly all the way. . . . Lots of times you have to make adjustments, and that's what we're doing here."

That's the ticket. Always bumps in the road in any war.Lawyers Group Name on Trial

Seems that the Association of Trial Lawyers of America (ATLA) was onto something when members voted to change its name to the American Association for Justice (AAJ).

Its archrivals at the U.S. Chamber Institute for Legal Reform (ILR) have proof that it was a smart move, according to a Jan. 4 memo to donors by ILR President Lisa Rickard. ILR paid for two national surveys and focus groups in three cities and found that the name ATLA produced a decidedly "unfavorable" response from participants.

But the name AAJ scored substantially better on the favorability scale, she said, "at 56 points, a 13-point difference, which is a statistically significant gap." What's more, "the name change has a lasting impression." However, when told of the name change, focus groups were aghast and quite "skeptical." And trial lawyers still come off badly.

So here's the plan: "If we begin to use the name American Association for Justice in referring to ATLA," Rickard said, "we become willing participants in their scheme to hide their real identity and we elevate their favorability rating. ILR will continue to refer to AAJ as the trial lawyers association in all public comments and written materials and we encourage all of you to do the same."

AAJ -- that's the trial lawyers -- spokeswoman Chris Mather said this "endorsement from the Chamber of Commerce gives me second thoughts" about the name change. She suggested the ILR might be called the "Chamber of Corporate Criminals." "They defend Halliburton, Philip Morris, Exxon and Enron," she said. "We are fighting for people and they are fighting for corporate bottom lines."

These folks really, really don't like each other.

Like Nixon Or Like Ike? (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

For the Republicans, there are two ways out of Iraq. They can either go out like Eisenhower or like Nixon.

As the first Republican to occupy the White House since the coming of the New Deal, Dwight Eisenhower could have chosen to divide the public and try to roll back Franklin Roosevelt's handiwork. In fact, he didn't give that option a moment's consideration. Social Security and unions, he concluded, were here to stay; any attempt to undo them, he wrote, would consign the Republicans to permanent minority status. Ike also ended the Korean War without attacking Democrats in the process.

His vice president, Richard Nixon, became president largely because of the public's massive discontent with the Vietnam War. We now know that Nixon and Henry Kissinger had no illusions that the war could be won, and Nixon probably could have withdrawn U.S. troops in a way that didn't polarize the public. Such a stance, however, ran counter to Nixon's deepest instincts. For Nixon, politics was about dividing the electorate and demonizing enemies. Even as he drew down U.S. forces, he did all he could to inflame the war's already flammable opponents in the hope that however much the people might dislike the war, they would dislike its critics more.

Today's Republicans now must choose between Eisenhower's way and Nixon's way. If they're like Ike, they will recognize that the war is lost and that public support for it isn't likely to be rekindled. A USA Today/Gallup Poll conducted over the weekend shows more than 60 percent support for a congressional resolution opposing President Bush's escalation. Even reliably conservative Republicans who are up for reelection in 2008 from shaky states or districts are bailing on the war (New Hampshire Sen. John Sununu is questioning the surge) or on their careers (Colorado Sen. Wayne Allard just announced he's not going to run again). To continue dispatching and keeping troops in a country racked by an intra-Islamic civil war, looked at from this perspective, only guarantees that November's Republican defeat will be a prelude to 2008's Republican rout.

A Nixonian perspective also acknowledges that the war cannot be won but believes that blame for the defeat can still, somehow, be placed on the Democrats. If only the Democrats can be held responsible for defunding the troops, if only the U.S. presence in Iraq can be prolonged until it falls to the next administration (which may be Democratic) to end it, if only enough Republicans on the Hill can be dissuaded from voting with the Democrats' attempts to rein in the war, if only the surge engenders some wild and crazy antiwar demonstrations, then maybe, just maybe, there's a way to keep the war going without destroying the GOP. These options may seem a bit far-fetched, but who believes that Karl Rove hasn't at least thought about them in his more contemplative moments?

How Rove defines his job these days is an interesting question. Since November, he's no longer the Republicans' master political strategist -- not just because November was such a debacle but also because the political interests of the Bush White House, congressional Republicans and the Republican presidential candidates are de-aligned and in some cases even adversarial. The man who'd hoped to make Bush the second coming of William McKinley -- a harbinger of a long-term Republican realignment -- now handles a president whose electoral impact on his own party could be nearer to Herbert Hoover's.

For a time, at least, the Republicans' presidential hopefuls can't really rule out a Nixonian tack. For New York's reflexively combative Rudy Giuliani, such politics may come naturally. But the need to win support among Republican primary voters -- the last group in American politics still sticking with Bush and his war -- could compel any number of primary candidates to bash Democrats for their dovishness. Besides, will Bush and Vice President Cheney really cease to defend their war even if the Republicans' eventual nominee wants to wrap it up? If Republican congressional leaders tell Bush that his war has no more support, will Bush and Cheney fold, or will they insist on continuing the war with invocations of executive power or any other doctrine that might work? (Memo to David Addington: The divine right of kings? The infield fly rule?)

The guy to watch in all this is the pooh-bah of Fox News, Roger Ailes. Nixon's onetime aide guides a TV network that is Nixonian to its bones -- Fox's raison d'?tre is to bash liberals, real or imagined. But Ailes can't be insensible to the war's effects on Republican electoral prospects. If Fox News were to break with Bush on Iraq, that would be proof positive that even the Nixonians believe there's no way, politically, they can salvage this miserable war.

The Right Bet In The Mideast (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

It was axiomatic during the Cold War that presidents should not gamble with matters of national security. The stakes were too high. The Bush administration's Iraq policy has long suffered from a lack of that prudence -- and the misplaced gambler's instinct is especially evident in the administration's plan to send more troops to Baghdad.

President Bush's "surge" is a mistake because it is piling more precious chips -- more human lives -- on what so far has been a losing bet. The public sent a clear message in the November election that it wants to take some of those chips off the table. That cautionary theme -- that it's time to reduce America's bet on the long shot that Iraq's sectarian mess can be fixed quickly -- was ably distilled by the Iraq Study Group in its December report.

Bush chose to go the other way, to pursue "an experiment based on high risks," in the words of Anthony H. Cordesman, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies who has written extensively about Iraq.

What prompted Bush's decision, by the president's own account, was his concern about the consequences for regional stability of an American failure in Iraq. To avoid the Baker-Hamilton problem of negotiating from weakness, Bush has chosen instead to signal American resolve in the region in various ways: by sending more troops to Baghdad; by seizing Iranian agents operating in Iraq; by sending additional warships into the Persian Gulf; and finally, according to the well-sourced foreign policy Web site TheSwoop.net, by working covertly with Saudi Arabia to support the Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora against the Iranian-backed Shiite militia Hezbollah.

These moves are especially risky now because they are played against the background of a Middle East riven by conflict between Shiite and Sunni Muslims. This sectarian war is destroying Iraq, and a similar war is perilously close in Lebanon. In this larger arena, U.S. strategy is hard to understand: We are allied with the Shiite government in Iraq against Sunni insurgents; and we are allied with the Sunni government in Lebanon against Shiite insurgents.

Edward Luttwak, a contrarian strategist, argued in the Wall Street Journal last week that by riding Shiite and Sunni horses at the same time, we have accidentally hit upon the divide-and-rule strategy that "past imperial statesmen strove to achieve with much cunning and cynicism." I fear that Luttwak is being uncharacteristically overoptimistic. The reality is that in neither Iraq nor Lebanon are we checking the rising regional power, Iran.

And it seems to me that our adversaries are doing a better job at this business of cynical alliances: Iran and Syria are the key supporters, respectively, of Shiite death squads and Sunni insurgents in Iraq. Yet although they are backing different sides in Iraq, Iran and Syria remain close and effective allies. Two years ago, a pro-Syrian Lebanese warned me in an e-mail that the United States would be caught in a "sandwich strategy" in Iraq -- squeezed by Sunni and Shiite fighters who shared a hatred of American interference. His warnings have proved chillingly accurate. He wrote me a few days ago to reiterate that, for Arabs who oppose American intervention, the operating rule is: "You kill us, we kill you."

The lesson of the Cold War was to be tough -- but also to be careful. I wish I saw more evidence of that prudence now. When U.S. officials encourage the Saudis to check Hezbollah by sending money to Sunni groups in northern Lebanon, do they understand that this region is a stronghold of al-Qaeda and that they are pushing Sunni-Shiite tensions toward the point of explosion? When officials contemplate regime change in Syria, as the Bush administration again seems to be doing, do they understand that they may be creating a wider band of chaos that would stretch from Lebanon to the Iranian border?

When the administration decides to send more ships into the Gulf as a signal to Iran, do officials understand that there are members of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards who might favor a torpedo attack -- so as to provoke an American retaliation and suck us deeper into an apocalyptic battle for control of the region?

In this volatile part of the world, there's just one area where I wish President Bush would take more risks -- and that's in diplomatic efforts to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. If you want to strike a blow at Iran, Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads all at once, that's the way to do it. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made a start this week, but this is one poker game where we should be adding more chips -- doubling down the American stake in peace.

Aux Barricades! (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

WASHINGTON

Being president can be really, really hard.

“Sometimes you’re the commander in chief,” W. explained to Scott Pelley on “60 Minutes.” “Sometimes you’re the educator in chief, and a lot of times you’re both when it comes to war.”

President Bush has been dutifully making the rounds of TV news shows, trying to make the case that victory in Iraq is “doable.” He thinks the public will support the Surge if he can simply illuminate a few things that we may have been too thick to understand. For instance, he says he needs to “explain to people that what happens in the Middle East will affect the future of this country.” Yes, Mr. President, we get it.

He also told Jim Lehrer last night that in 20 years, radical Shiites could be warring with radical Sunnis and Middle Eastern oil could fall into the hands of radicals, who might also get weapons of mass destruction.

So after scaring Americans into backing the Sack of Iraq by warning that radicals could get W.M.D., now he’s trying to scare Americans into supporting the Surge in Iraq by warning that radicals could get W.M.D.

So many deaths, so little progress.

It’s unnerving to be tutored by an educator in chief who is himself being tutored. The president elucidating the Iraqi insurgency for us is learning about the Algerian insurgency from the man who failed to quell the Vietcong insurgency.

During his “60 Minutes” interview, Mr. Bush mentioned that he was reading Alistair Horne’s classic history, “A Savage War of Peace,” about why the French suffered a colonial disaster in a guerrilla war against Muslims in Algiers from 1954 to 1962.

The book was recommended to W. by Henry Kissinger, who is working on an official biography of himself with Mr. Horne.

Mr. Horne recalled that Dr. Kissinger told him: “The president’s one of my best students. He reads all the books I send him.” The author asked the president’s foreign affairs adviser if W. ever wrote any essays on the books. “Henry just laughed,” Mr. Horne said.

It seems far too late for Mr. Bush to begin studying about counterinsurgency now that Iraq has cratered into civil war. Can’t someone get the president a copy of “Gone With the Wind”?

DOJ_NMG_0117678

Maybe it was inevitable, once W. started reading Camus's "L'Etranger," set in Algeria, that he would move on to Mr. Horne. As The Washington Post military correspondent Tom Ricks wrote in November, the Horne book has been an underground best-seller among U.S. military officers for three years, and "Algeria" has become almost a code word among counterinsurgency specialists for the mess in Iraq. The Pentagon screened the 1966 movie "The Battle of Algiers" in 2003, but the commander in chief must have missed it.

I asked Mr. Horne, who was at his home in a small village outside Oxford, England, what the president could learn from his book.

"The depressing problem of getting entangled in the Muslim world," he replied. "Algeria was a thoroughly bloodthirsty war that ended horribly and cost the lives of about 20,000 Frenchmen and a million Algerians. There was a terrible civil war. ...De Gaulle ended up giving literally everything away and left without his pants."

President de Gaulle had all the same misconceptions as W., that his prestige could persuade the Muslims to accept his terms; that the guerrillas would recognize military defeat and accept sensible compromise; and that, as Mr. Horne writes, "time would wait while he found the correct formula and then imposed peace with it."

Mr. Horne also sees sad parallels in the torture issue: "The French had experience under the Nazis in the occupation and practiced methods the Germans used in Algeria and extracted information that helped them win the Battle of Algiers. But in the long run it lost the war, because it caused such revulsion in France when the news came out, and there was huge opposition to the war from Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir."

In May 2005, Mr. Horne gave a copy of his book to Rummy, with passages about torture underlined. "I got a savage letter back from him," the author said.

The best thing now, he said, is to try to "get around the mullahs" and "get non-Christian forces in there as quickly as possible, mercenaries. As Henry said the other day, if only we had two brigades of Gurkhas to send to Baghdad."

Meanwhile, maybe W. should move on to reading Sartre. "No Exit," perhaps.

No Better Idea (LAT)

Max Boot

The Los Angeles Times, January 17, 2007

Both sides' strategies in Iraq are big ifs with big risks. The president's is worth a try.

PRESIDENT BUSH'S plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq has not, to put it kindly, been well received. But does anyone have a better idea?

Should we just declare defeat and go home? Not even most leading Democrats are willing to go that far. At least not yet. Most instead talk of gradually drawing down forces and possibly redeploying them either to Iraq's borders or to other bases in the region. There is something to be said for this strategy. But it also entails huge risks.

If the U.S. is seen as retreating — which is how it would look even if it were labeled "redeployment" — the fragile Iraqi security forces might completely disintegrate. U.S. advisors with Iraqi units could be imperiled. An all-out civil war could break out. Neighboring states such as Jordan could be destabilized by massive refugee flows. Western Iraq could become a Taliban-style haven for Sunni terrorists. Southern Iraq could become a launching pad for Shiite extremists bent on liberating their oppressed brethren in Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf states.

It is doubtful that an "over the horizon" presence of U.S. forces could do much to mitigate these catastrophic effects. Iraq is a big country — about the size of California. You cannot police Los Angeles from San Francisco any more than you can police Ramadi in western Iraq from Irbil in northern Iraq, much less from Kuwait.

It sounds reassuring to say that U.S. forces could be positioned on its borders to "contain" Iraq's civil war, but it's not clear what they would do there. Sure, they could prevent Iranian or Syrian troop formations from entering Iraq. But a conventional invasion is unlikely. U.S. soldiers would have much less success stopping the influx of foreign terrorists, cash and arms that goes on now disguised as normal commercial traffic. Besides, is it really politically possible for U.S. troops to cavalierly sit by while a few miles away ethnic cleansing or even genocide is being perpetrated?

Such a dire outcome is by no means foreordained if U.S. troops start withdrawing. Perhaps, as some advocates of drawdown suggest, the Iraqi government will succeed in establishing law and order on its own. But that's not the way I'd bet. And that's not the way Bush is betting.

After years of taking a rosy view of the war, he has finally acknowledged that conditions are grim and require more troops. Ironically, he is being pilloried for this stance by many of the same people who have been saying for years that we didn't have enough troops in Iraq.

Perhaps the objection now is that 21,500 troops won't make much difference. It's true that, according to the new Army-Marine Counterinsurgency Manual, effective operations generally require at least one soldier or police officer per 40 or 50 inhabitants. That would suggest doubling our current force of 132,000 to secure Baghdad and the entire Sunni Triangle (population 13 million). But it would be difficult to find that many soldiers in the overstretched and undersized U.S. armed forces.

That doesn't mean, however, that the reinforcements Bush is sending are useless. As called for under a plan formulated by military historian Frederick Kagan and retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, the five newly arriving brigades should be deployed alongside Iraqi units to live in Sunni and mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad. This is a classic counterinsurgency approach focused on securing the populace, and it has never really been tried before in the capital. It could work, especially if the surge is long lasting and if it's coupled with other vital steps — such as increasing the number of American advisors in the Iraqi security forces, instituting a biometric identity card to make it easier to detain terrorism suspects and enhancing the capacity of the Iraqi legal system to incarcerate more violent offenders.

If everything goes right, large swathes of Baghdad could gradually be brought under control. Then American and Iraqi units could pursue a "spreading inkblot" strategy — another classic counterinsurgency concept — to increase the pacified zone outward.

Of course that's a big if. It may be that we still don't have enough troops to successfully carry out this strategy. It may be that we don't have the will to see it through. It may be that we don't have enough reliable Iraqi partners. But considering the massive investment we have already made in Iraq, and the lack of good alternatives, it seems worth one final effort to see if we can salvage something from this dire situation.

Petraeus Time (WSJ)

By Reuel Marc Gerecht

The Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Can one back President Bush's new strategy in Iraq? Yes. For all its serious faults, his new approach is the first one since the fall of Baghdad to offer a chance to reverse the radicalization of Iraq. But it needs revision quickly.

Too much of this new plan leaves unchanged the disastrous approach of John Abizaid and George Casey, the two top generals on Iraq. The new offensive, assuming it doesn't peter out through a slow arrival of soldiers, or become enfeebled by "Iraqi leadership" in its execution, envisions a too-small U.S. force doing too much. Recent remarks by Defense Secretary Robert Gates -- predicting troop reductions within a year, and saying that we might not need an additional five brigades in Baghdad for a successful operation -- are a frightening echo of the self-defeating, undermanned optimism that came from the U.S. military under Mr. Gates's predecessor. * * *

The good news is that by emphasizing a military, not political, strategy to diminish Iraq's debilitating violence, the president has correctly set aside one of the primary factors destroying the Shiite Arab center. While waiting for a "political solution" to the Sunni insurgency, we watched Shiite timidity and patience turn to anger -- and to a revenge which now threatens the integrity of the Shiite-led Iraqi government. Gens. Abizaid and Casey had gambled that they could stand up an effective Iraqi military and police against the Sunnis before violence threatened everything in Baghdad. That bet collapsed with the destruction of the Shiite shrine in Samarra in February 2006 -- but the administration kept playing the same hand as if nothing had happened. The reversal of this soft-power, politics-not-troops mentality is an essential step forward.

Still, David Petraeus, who will succeed Gen. Casey as the overall boss in Iraq and who is one of America's finest, most adaptable commanders, may have to perform a miracle to compensate for this shortfall in manpower, especially if the required five brigades for Baghdad take months to arrive, and if Washington allows the offensive to move forward before he is even in charge. The president can pre-empt these lethal problems by ensuring Gen. Petraeus's rapid arrival in Iraq and by allowing him to determine how many soldiers he needs.

Nevertheless, there is a dismaying hesitancy in the military's and the White House's deliberations on this conflict. Although the president wants a new approach, the Pentagon, the State Department and even the National Security Council appear wedded to the past. The contradiction between what the president says and what his government does has never been greater. We need to move rapidly: The enemy is digging in and the drift to full-scale civil war is gaining speed.

The administration needs to rethink its understanding of Iraqi culture and politics, as the "new" strategy still contains ideas that have catastrophically guided American officials in the Green Zone ever since Sunni Arab insurgents started killing Americans in significant numbers. U.S. officials still believe they must soon see sectarian reconciliation, a reversal of de-Baathification, and a nonsectarian, equitable distribution of oil wealth.

All these achievements are meant to placate the aggrieved Sunni Arabs, who represent 15% of the population. But no one knows how many Sunni Arabs sympathize with their brethren who've been killing Shia. It certainly seemed like a very large number before the Shiites started counterattacking through their militias. The statements of Iraqi Sunni Arab organizations, the coverage of the Iraqi Sunni press and the region's Sunni Arab media, which often quotes and echoes the opinions of Iraqi Sunnis, suggest strongly that there is substantial communitarian support for both domestic and foreign suicide bombers.

For the serious ex-Baathists, Sunni supremacists and Iraqi Sunni fundamentalists -- the lethal hardcore of the insurgency -- it's still a good bet that they're not into democratic negotiations. They probably don't think much at all about an equitable distribution of oil revenues -- or wanting their jobs back in the new army's officer corps.

De-Baathification for the Shiites and the Sunnis is really about only one thing: the army. But from the moment the U.S. started building a more representative Iraqi military in 2003, there was no way in hell the old Baathist Sunni officer corps could come back. And now, with the Shiites killing Sunnis, even the most enlightened of the proscribed Baathist officers (this isn't a large group) know that return would be suicide. No one knows how many Sunni Arabs would turn against their uncompromising, murderous brethren and align themselves with Shiites if the right "deal" were struck. It's a very good guess that such men, if they exist in any number, would get mowed down by their radical compatriots.

If the U.S. and Iraqi governments are going to bring peace to the "Sunni triangle," they must break the back of the insurgency. A minority, used to the prerogatives of a communitarian dictatorship, the Sunnis have been trying to derail the new Iraq: They must come to know that they will lose everything if they don't abandon violence as their principal political tool. They must know that if they choose to cease their violent opposition, they will not be murdered for doing so. This means, as it has always meant, a combined American and Shiite Iraqi occupation of major Sunni Arab cities. If the Sunni community hasn't hopelessly gone into a dominance-or-death opposition, then it could still come to its senses, provided the violent hardcore among them is neutralized and the Shiites and the Kurds allow them sufficient access to oil wealth. Shiite death squads have certainly taught the Sunnis of Baghdad that there are worse things than infidel U.S. troops in their neighborhoods.

Baghdad is the first step. And as retired general Jack Keane and the military historian Frederick Kagan have been pointing out, restoring security in Baghdad will take at least 18 months and all the troops the president pledged. To quote Gen. Keane: "We need all five brigades in Baghdad as soon as possible. It will take three to four months to clear neighborhoods of death squads and insurgents, and at least the rest of the year to establish proper security for the population." This is going to be a long, hard slog. And the Americans, not the Iraqis, are going to have to lead it.

The president's stated contention -- that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's army and police will lead efforts to cleanse the city, while the Americans just support them -- will produce dismal results. Mr. Maliki's pride doesn't win battles. George Bush has been fond of underscoring the counterinsurgency success in Tal Afar, in which the Iraqi army played an important supporting role. If Gen. Petraeus is really put into a supporting role in the Battle of Baghdad, then we've lost already.

Gen. Petraeus will have to deal with Muqtada al-Sadr. The thuggish son of Iraq's most revered clerical family, he has become for many Shiites in Baghdad a rapturously praised defender. This esteem is merited: He, not any American general, increased the security of the average Shiite in the capital. And if he is smart, he'll attack the Americans before they have the chance to deploy much new strength. If the Americans successfully down Sunni insurgents in the capital, then they will go after Mr. Sadr.

But the U.S. military should absolutely not go after Mr. Sadr first. We may barely have sufficient forces to handle a one-front war against Sunni insurgents and holy warriors. We need to show the Shiite community, which by no means has embraced Mr. Sadr's radicalism en masse, that the Battle of Baghdad's primary thrust isn't against the capital's large Shiite ghetto.

The key here is how Shiites view the first encounter. If it goes against the insurgents, then a subsequent attack on Mr. Sadr and his militia might not provoke a large-scale uprising. And he just may play along. He and his forces were mauled by the Americans in 2004. Since then they haven't been particularly bold in attacking U.S. soldiers. Mr. Sadr has recently manifested some statesmen-like behavior, and has been more correct in his behavior toward Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the spiritual guide of Iraq's Shia and a bulwark of moderation. Yet Washington ought to plan on Mr. Sadr hitting U.S. forces -- another reason why Gen. Petraeus, who appears acutely sensitive to the Sadr conundrum, should be given as many brigades as the U.S. can rapidly pull together.

Wars are often decided by one battle, where the genius and resources of one commander proves decisive. We are undoubtedly at that point in Iraq. The Bush administration should ensure that Gen. Petraeus has everything he needs, and that any opposition inside the military to him and a larger, longer counterinsurgency campaign is squelched. America and Iraq probably won't get a second chance.

Senators To Introduce Resolution Opposing Bush's Iraq Policy (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 17, 2007

Senate leaders will introduce a bipartisan resolution of opposition to President Bush's new Iraq policy as early as today, taking the lead from House Democrats who are increasingly divided on how far to go to thwart additional troop deployments to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0117681

The resolution -- crafted by Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) -- will not come to a vote before Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday. But by sending it to Biden's committee this week, Democratic leaders will give senators from both parties multiple opportunities to voice concerns about the president's policy.

In another high-profile move, Democratic leaders yesterday tapped Sen. James Webb (D-Va.), a Reagan administration Navy secretary who secured victory in November on an antiwar push, to deliver the party's nationally televised response to Bush's speech.

House leaders opted to allow the Senate to strike first, reasoning that a strong, bipartisan vote there would splinter Republican support in the House, Democratic leadership aides said. The Senate resolution will not only express opposition to the president's deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Iraq but also lay out policy alternatives that have bipartisan appeal, according to a senior Senate Democratic aide familiar with the negotiations.

House leaders are beset by division over efforts to choke off the deployment through Congress's power of the purse. Moreover, antiwar groups are growing uneasy about a nonbinding resolution of opposition.

Thomas Andrews, a former House Democrat who heads the Win Without War coalition, said any such resolution would allow Republicans to voice their opposition to the president's policy, giving them political cover when they later oppose binding legislative efforts to stifle that policy.

"The whole thing could let Republicans off the hook with a meaningless, toothless vote," said Andrews, who has been meeting with senior Democrats on war issues. "It's a pressure valve that could work against us."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) promised yesterday that the House will move forward with its resolution, but he added that more legislation will follow.

"Iraq will not disappear with the vote on a resolution," he said. "Substantively, we're going to move ahead" through the appropriations process.

But it is not clear what that substantive legislation will be. The chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), and his allies on the House Armed Services Committee are continuing to push for a requirement that the administration may deploy troops only from military units that are certified as combat-ready. That requirement would seriously curtail future deployments.

Murtha's committee will begin closed-door hearings today with military officials on Army, Marine Corps, Navy and Air Force readiness; equipment conditions; the state of the National Guard and reserves; and the readiness of military medical personnel.

"We will most likely move carefully within constitutional bounds to cordon the funding in the Iraq supplemental appropriations bill . . . so that our troops in the field will be supported and the personnel, as well as the equipment, exhausted by the Iraq war can be rested, retrained and refurbished," said Rep. David Wu (D-Ore.), a Murtha ally on the issue.

Democratic voters appear to be solidly behind that effort. In a poll released yesterday by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, 61 percent of Americans said they oppose Bush's decision to increase U.S. troop strength in Iraq, while 62 percent of Democrats said Congress should withhold funding for the plan.

Antiwar activists yesterday presented Democratic House members an "appeal for redress," signed by more than 1,000 active-duty service members, reservists and National Guardsmen -- including more than a hundred officers -- urging that U.S. troops be withdrawn from Iraq.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is backing Murtha's insistence that Bush must meet benchmarks for troop preparedness and safety before funds for deployments are released, said Brendan Daly, the speaker's spokesman.

But some senior Democrats are skeptical that such a move would be politically wise, constitutionally permissible or legislatively possible. The Pew poll found that overall support for the withholding of funds was a tepid 43 percent. One senior Armed Services Committee member asked why Democrats would want to put their fingerprints on a war policy that is likely to prove fruitless long before legislation could have any impact.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.) noted that many of the additional troops Bush wants to deploy will already be in Iraq by the time Congress completes work on an emergency war-spending bill. That bill will not even be sent to Capitol Hill until next month.

Moreover, setting aside the money for the president's "surge" from the funds to support the 132,000 troops that are already there may be impossible.

"If you've got a shirt that's 90 percent cotton and 10 percent polyester, it's pretty hard to separate the fibers," Obey said.

Anti-Buildup Measure To Have Bipartisan Stamp (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0117682

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 — Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, an outspoken Republican critic of the administration's Iraq policy, will join two leading Democrats in introducing a resolution opposing President Bush's buildup of troops in Iraq, putting a bipartisan stamp on the looming Congressional showdown over the war.

Lawmakers and aides said Mr. Hagel had been consulting for the past few days with the two Democrats, Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and Carl Levin of Michigan, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, to develop the wording of the resolution, which could be introduced as early as Wednesday.

"Senator Levin, Senator Biden and I have been working together on it and we are pretty close," Mr. Hagel, a potential Republican presidential candidate, said Tuesday night as he left the Senate.

Mr. Hagel said the intent of the resolution was not to "bash the president" or to call for the immediate withdrawal of United States troops from Iraq, but a responsible way for senators to register their opinion on the increase of more than 20,000 additional troops announced by Mr. Bush last week.

While Senate opponents of the buildup were preparing to move forward, Senate Republicans backing the president were trying to map their own strategy, considering proposals that could appeal to Republicans frustrated with events in Iraq but keep them from supporting the most critical resolution.

"There will be alternatives," said Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona, the third-ranking Senate Republican.

At the White House, officials were continuing to discuss the new plan with members of Congress, with an emphasis on lining up Republicans behind Mr. Bush's approach. "We knew this was not going to be an easy policy to explain or one that was going to be met with open arms," said a White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

That official said that the message to Congressional Republicans was similar to the one the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, conveyed Tuesday at his press briefing: that approval of any resolution critical of Mr. Bush's approach, even if nonbinding, would send a damaging message.

"In an age of instant and global communication, what message does it send to the people who are fighting democracy in Iraq?" asked Mr. Snow. "And, also, what message does it send to the troops?"

Mr. Bush on Tuesday stepped up his challenge to Congress to provide an alternative plan if it is going to criticize his.

"My only call to Congress is that if you've got a better way to succeed, step up and explain it," he said in an interview on "The NewsHour With Jim Lehrer" on PBS. "What's your prescription for success? And I think they owe that explanation to the American people."

In the House, the Democratic leadership said it would wait for the Senate to act before bringing its own resolution up for a vote. "We think it will be useful for the Senate to go first," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer, Democrat of Maryland and the majority leader, who predicted a bipartisan vote in the House against the troop buildup.

Members of both parties in the Senate have said as many as a dozen Republicans may ultimately support a resolution against the president's policy. Mr. Hagel's participation could ease the concerns of other Republicans about breaking from the president.

But some Republicans, including Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, suggested that Republicans critical of the plan could be reluctant to cast such a clear vote in opposition to the president and might be willing to hold off until they hear from Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the newly selected ground commander in Iraq.

The level of Democratic support for a resolution is not certain, though the overwhelming majority of Senate Democrats have expressed opposition to the buildup.

"If they have the language right, I will be right there," said Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska.

Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, has promised to raise procedural arguments against any proposal he sees as undermining the president.

Mr. Hagel was brutally critical of the president's new strategy during a Foreign Relations Committee hearing last week and spent some time on the floor Tuesday night discussing the Iraq resolution privately with Mr. McConnell. But Mr. Hagel said he did not anticipate an angry reaction from his colleagues for joining with Democrats, since he had such a strong record of opposition on the issue.

White House officials have dismissed Mr. Hagel as an established critic of the war who is now seeking to stake out antiwar ground in the nascent Republican primary fight for president.

Still, the officials said in interviews that while they believed any substantial Republican support for the resolution would be a symbolic blow, they were far more concerned about threats from Congressional Democrats to take aim at spending on the president's new plan. Officials say that they will rely upon Mr. McConnell to help head off any such move.

Senate Democrats Ready Resolution On 'Surge' (RC)

By John Stanton

DOJ_NMG_0117683

Roll Call, January 17, 2007

Senate Democrats will introduce their Iraq "surge" resolution as soon as today, as Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) moves to increase the pressure on President Bush to make dramatic changes to his war policy, a Democratic leadership aide said Tuesday.

At the same time, Reid's "war room" has launched the Iraq Accountability Project, designed to publicize Democratic oversight activities of the Bush administration's prosecution of the war.

Although details of the resolution were still being worked out at press time, the leadership aide said it would be a "vote on whether or not [members] support the president's plan" to boost troop levels by more than 21,000 in Iraq. It does not appear likely, however, that it will include language condemning the approach or explicitly disavowing a surge. Rather the resolution appears to be focused more on putting Members on record as to whether they support Bush.

Aides said Reid is attempting to carefully craft the resolution to appeal to as many Republicans as possible in the hopes of piecing together a truly bipartisan coalition. As a result, the language of the resolution will remain as neutral as possible to allow Republicans to feel comfortable casting their votes with Democrats on such a high-profile issue.

Additionally, while there has been talk in Democratic circles of holding a vote on the resolution the day of Bush's State of the Union address, a Reid aide said it was unlikely that would occur, since it likely would provoke claims of partisanship.

A number of Republicans, including Sens. Norm Coleman (Minn.), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and presidential hopeful Sam Brownback (Kan.), already have come out against the plan, while other members of the GOP — notably Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, who also has presidential ambitions — have been critical of the surge notion and Bush's handling of the war.

Last week Reid told reporters that he believed he would have at least 12 Republican supporters and predicted that he easily would make the 60-vote threshold needed to beat back any attempt to filibuster the resolution by Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

According to aides familiar with the Iraq Accountability Project, it is part of Democrats' broader public relations push to further strengthen public opinion against the White House's handling of the war as well as heighten the profile of Congressional oversight activities.

As part of the project, the war room will release a weekly schedule of Senate committee hearings focused on various aspects of the war, ranging from contractor abuses to emerging terrorist threats and appropriations requests. This week the Senate Judiciary Committee is holding hearings on "the plight of Iraqi Refugees," while the Foreign Relations Committee is holding a series of hearings on the "remaining options" for dealing with Iraq, according to a release from the war room.

At the end of each week, the war room will release "highlights of important hearing testimony, summaries of the latest news out of Iraq and a compilation of key themes emerging from hearings across multiple committees," according to a Reid aide.

Reid appears to be modeling the Iraq Accountability Project on his successful opposition to the White House's Social Security reform plan in 2005. At the time, Reid used a series of well-publicized Democratic Policy Committee hearings on Social Security, floor speeches by traditionally high-profile Members such as Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and "red state" lawmakers including Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), and public events to vilify the plan and build an early tide of public opposition to it.

Democrats Aim To Exploit GOP Split Over War (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 17, 2007

Congress is gearing up for a big vote next week to oppose President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, beginning with a nonbinding resolution that could draw strong Republican support.

It's the first step in a long struggle between the White House and the new Democratic-controlled Congress over the endgame in Iraq.

If a nonbinding resolution opposing the surge of 21,500 troops into Iraq is approved, Democrats could quickly move stronger legislation to build a congressional firewall against any future move to broaden the war to Iran or Syria. Others are testing the waters for GOP support for the ultimate weapon in a showdown with the White House – curbs on funding.

But the key to an effective push back – including the 67 votes needed to overturn a presidential veto – is building bridges to Republicans. The blitz of oversight hearings continuing this week gives lawmakers on both sides of the aisle time to sound each other out.

Congressional committees plan 10 hearings this week on issues ranging from defense contracting practices and US force protection to alternative Iraq strategies and the influence of Iraq's neighbors. Especially on the Senate side, Republicans have been among the strongest critics of administration policy.

DOJ_NMG_0117684

"It's fair to say you saw 21 very concerned senators today," said Sen. Chuck Hagel (R) of Nebraska, after hearings on the administration's plan for Iraq before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week. An early opponent of the war, Senator Hagel called Mr. Bush's proposed troop surge "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam."

"It's now up to the Congress to give to our friends in the Middle East some reassurance that we can govern," he says. "Someone has to start framing up some reality, and this administration is disconnected from reality."

In public comments, Senate majority leader Harry Reid has claimed up to a dozen Republicans who could join Democrats in votes opposing the surge of troops into Iraq.

"It's possible that you could see 12 Republicans split" with the president, says Jennifer Duffy, who covers the Senate for the Cook Political Report. "They're in the minority now, Bush is a lame duck, and Republicans think that Iraq played a big part in losing their majorities. It's become every man for himself."

GOP leadership aides say that the size of the defection will depend on the precise wording of the resolution, which has yet to be finalized. Should Democrats go too far in their criticism of the commander in chief at a time of war, it could pull the GOP caucus closer together.

"One thing that will unite the Republican conference is if there is an attempt to cut off funds to our troops at a time of war. That will provoke a backlash from the American people," says Sen. John Cornyn (R) of Texas.

Sens. Gordon Smith (R) of Oregon and Norm Coleman (R) of Minnesota, who are up for reelection in 2008, were among the first Republicans to break with the White House over Iraq. Last week, they were joined by other critics from within GOP ranks.

"I am skeptical that a surge of troops will bring an end to the escalation of violence and the insurgency in Iraq," says Sen. George Voinovich (R) of Ohio. "I don't see that you'll end up having the democracy I once hoped for. I'm absolutely against the surge."

The pressure is especially strong on Republicans in states swinging Democratic. Sen. John Sununu (R) of New Hampshire, who is also up for reelection next year, says that the burden has to shift to the Iraqi government. "There's very strong expectation that they follow up on commitments, and this isn't an open-ended commitment. I have [doubts] that troops preparing to be used in Iraq can be effective against sectarian organizations," he says.

"I'm also disappointed that there still is not a formal framework for other countries in the region to play a more effective, constructive role in supporting the Iraqi government," he says.

Sen. John Warner, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, has been attempting to develop a bipartisan consensus on Iraq. "So far, he has expressed concern about putting US forces in the middle of a sectarian conflict," says spokesman John Ullyot, who says the senator will make his position known this week.

Meanwhile, Republicans still supporting the White House on the war say it's important that Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the new American commander in Iraq, appears quickly before Congress.

"He's the strongest spokesman the administration has, and he needs to get here fast," says Sen. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina.

Sen. Jeff Sessions (R) of Alabama, who has been a strong supporter of the administration's policy on Iraq, says that he's encouraged that the White House is taking up some of his concerns. In talks with the president last Monday, he raised the issue that Iraq needs to quickly "create a court system that deals with threats to the Iraqi state promptly."

He adds: "When people don't feel safe, you can't wait five years to create a court system."

Groundwork For A War Debate (WSJ)

By David Rogers

Wall Street Journal, January 17, 2007

Democrats Expect A Series of Fights Over Iraq Spending

WASHINGTON -- Republican votes will decide the coming debate in Congress over the Iraq war, so Democrats are first working to build bipartisan support for nonbinding criticism before taking on the White House over funding.

The two-part strategy is on display this week as top Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee expect to announce agreement on a resolution challenging President Bush's decision to increase U.S. troop levels. As those talks proceed, the House Appropriations Committee will also begin hearings this morning to lay the groundwork for tougher fights over war-related spending requests this spring and summer.

The Iraq debate won't be one single battle but a series of firefights over the coming months during which events on the ground in Baghdad will be pivotal. Much as Democrats are emboldened by November's victories, they also have their own divisions on the issue. And Mr. Bush, whose powers as commander in chief give him immense leverage, has said he has no intention of backing down.

But the landscape has changed and left him more vulnerable on three points:

November's election shook rank-and-file Republicans, who are fearful of going into 2008 with the war still a major issue.

The planned troop increase has aggravated divisions in the Republican foreign-policy establishment, best captured by the opposition from Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, a Vietnam veteran with ties to two former secretaries of State, James Baker and Colin Powell.

The growing financial strain of Iraq will be spelled out as never before in a series of defense and war-related spending requests by the White House next month, expected to total more than $700 billion through Sept. 30, 2008.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice presidential nominee who already is running for the White House in 2008, is pressing hard for a vote to cut off funding for any military escalation in Iraq. But Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith, whose December floor speech against the war captured the post-election shift among Republicans, cautions Democrats against moving too fast.

"Democrats are wise not to push this too hard, but I think within this year, the issue will have ripened enough that the correct course of action will be clear," Mr. Smith said.

In the House, the skittish Republican mood was apparent last week as party leaders faced warnings that there must be real progress in Iraq before July 4 to keep members in line. That date also coincides with when Democrats hope to have begun debate on the 2008 defense appropriations bill.

The measure will include not only funding for basic defense operations but, for the first time, a request by the White House budget office for what it anticipates will be the annual war costs in Iraq and Afghanistan for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

The total package, to be revealed with the president's budget next month, could exceed $600 billion. On top of this, the administration is expected to ask for 2007 emergency supplemental funding, providing an estimated $100 billion in emergency appropriations to sustain military operations overseas for the remainder of this fiscal year ending Sept. 30.

Taken together, that means lawmakers will be asked to address -- in a matter of months -- defense and war-related requests in the range of $700 billion. Driven up by Iraq, annual spending on defense already matches -- in terms of dollars adjusted for inflation -- expenditures at the height of the Vietnam War. And these numbers could further shake Republican resolve.

"I think it will have an impact. Money issues may be put in play for real," said New Hampshire Sen. Judd Gregg, the ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee.

"For those of us from the Northeast, it's pretty evident that people are losing patience and want to get out," said Rep. Rodney Frelinghuysen (R., N.J.), a member of the defense appropriations panel. "A lot of people are peeling off from supporting the president."

Among Republicans, Sen. Hagel is most crucial given his standing on the Senate Foreign Relations panel, war experience and long attachment to prominent Republican foreign-policy figures. "This is not just Chuck Hagel charging out based on some 12 months in Vietnam," Mr. Hagel said in an interview. And if he should enter the 2008 presidential campaign, it could emphasize the divide among Republicans.

Mr. Hagel has stressed to Democrats that they must let "the system work" to build ties with Republicans on the war debate. "The American people have to have some hope that we're not just a bunch of political animals and we can come together."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) has kept himself one step removed and left the early negotiations to his Armed Services and Foreign Relations committee chairmen, Sens. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) and Joseph Biden (D., Del.), respectively. One option would be to have the resolution reported out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to give it more standing, and House Democrats have signaled that they could use the Senate product as a model for their own resolution next week. "I expect it to be a bipartisan vote," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D., Md.)

The nervousness among House Republicans is striking after November's losses. "Two years before the elections, people are worried about their political skins," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.). A Pew Research Center survey shows Republican voters rallying behind the president, but independents were the swing force in 2006 and by a 2-1 margin the same Pew poll shows independents opposing the plan to send more troops.

Thus, Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), who will manage the Iraq spending bill this spring, is convinced he can get bipartisan support even as he proposes to add restrictions that could impede the planned deployment of four more Army combat infantry brigades into Iraq. And, rather than cutting funds, lawmakers could add more money to defense bills, but then attach readiness requirements that must be met for it to be used. "It is not going to end because of any legislative action we take, but the legislative actions we take can help to bring it to an end," said House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D., Wis.).

Dems Struggle To Shift Focus To Afghanistan From Iraq (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

DOJ_NMG_0117686

The Hill, January 17, 2007

In addition to addressing the White House's Iraq "surge" plan, Democrats could be facing another quandary: redirecting attention to the war in Afghanistan and the search for al Qaeda's leader, Osama bin Laden.

Several top Democrats, including 2008 presidential hopefuls Sens. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), said a troop increase should occur in Afghanistan rather than Iraq.

Clinton, Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) and Rep. John McHugh (R-N.Y.) returned from a congressional delegation to Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq and are expected to talk about the trip today.

But congressional plans have yet to emerge for keeping a firm grip on Afghanistan, which is dealing with rampant poppy production and is at risk of sliding back into the hands of Taliban insurgents.

Several lawmakers fear that the Iraq plan will overshadow any efforts related to Afghanistan.

"Afghanistan is the biggest concern, but I see no concerted effort" to deal with the issues there, Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) said. "Iraq is the dominant thing and we have to deal with that."

Two years ago, Lautenberg sent a letter to Bush asking him why the United States had not captured bin Laden after then-CIA Director Porter Goss said he had an "excellent idea" where the 9/11 plotter was hiding.

"I would like to continue that pursuit," Lautenberg recently said of the military's efforts to track down al Qaeda's leader. "But the picture is so clouded by the discussion on Iraq that you can't really be sure that it is going to be successful."

U.S. commanders in Afghanistan whose troops are fighting alongside NATO coalition forces have called for reinforcements against resurgent Taliban fighters. Military officials said the number of attacks against NATO forces tripled year-over-year in 2006, to 5,000.

It has been reported that at least one Army battalion fighting in Afghanistan could be deployed within weeks to fight in Iraq as part of the president's "surge" plan.

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, said the Pentagon could send more troops into Afghanistan despite the strain the military faces in Iraq.

Although he said the U.S. focus should shift to Afghanistan, Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) plans to refrain from calling for additional troops there because he wants to ensure any effort is multinational.

"Democrats feel very strongly that the war in Afghanistan is much more directly related to the war on terror," Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said. "I am sad that they are taking another [battalion] out."

Schumer last year passed an amendment to the 2007 defense appropriations bill, allocating $700 million for narcotics eradication in Afghanistan.

Schumer was not alone in his victory. Two other Democrats, Sens. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) were successful in reactivating a CIA unit dedicated to finding bin Laden in an amendment to the same Senate bill that provided $200 million for the mission.

"We know from the 9/11 Commission Iraq was not involved in the attacks of 9/11. It was ... al Qaeda led by Osama bin Laden," Conrad said at the time. "That is where we have to focus." Conrad is now the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee.

"Everyone would agree that the effort in Iraq has diverted efforts from the operations in Afghanistan," said Rep. Gene Taylor (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Armed Services Seapower and Expeditionary Forces subcommittee. "We are engaged in two simultaneous wars and we do not have the resources that we would have had on Sept. 12, 2001."

Taylor, however, commended the U.S. military's efforts to find bin Laden under less-than-conducive circumstances.

"Seeing how big the place is, steep valleys and extremes of hot and cold — I can empathize [with] how difficult and dangerous it is for our troops," said Taylor, who has been to Afghanistan several times. "Osama bin Laden needs to be caught and brought to justice."

He added that the committees with jurisdiction over the military need to allocate resources for the fight in Afghanistan, but also take into consideration how difficult the terrain is in Afghanistan, complicating the military's mission.

Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), chairman of the armed services panel, is planning to hold hearings about the situation in Afghanistan this month. Skelton has been concerned that Afghanistan has been ignored and has called the conflict there "the forgotten war."

The key to finding bin Laden may not lie with spending more money on technology. Rather, dedicating Army Special Forces (known as white special operations forces) to missions wherein soldiers spend time in Afghan villages, establishing long-term relationships and building trust, could lead to information on the al Qaeda leader, according to André Hollis, a former Pentagon official with knowledge of special operations.

Unfortunately, Pentagon deployment policy (12 to 18 months) limits soldiers' ability to foster relationships with locals, added Hollis, who is now a vice president at Van Scoyoc Associates.

Afghanistan will be the topic of Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committee hearings, according to Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), a senior member of the armed services panel. He said, however, that the military has not asked for additional resources to find Osama bin Laden.

"They have not made any requests; they thought they had sufficient funds," he said.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the House defense appropriations subcommittee, said his panel will look at the problems in Afghanistan, including the Taliban resurgence and the growing poppy-seed production.

"Afghanistan is a little bit of a problem," he said in a short interview. Murtha plans to meet with Marine Gen. Jim Jones, the retiring NATO supreme allied commander in Europe, to talk about the problems facing Afghanistan.

Rep. Marty Meehan (D-Mass.), who will chair the House Armed Services investigations and oversight subcommittee, said he has solicited ideas from all members of his panel on how to go forward in Afghanistan. "There has been a discussion but we have to agree on a plan to do that," he said.

"It is clear that al Qaeda does not have its headquarters in Iraq; it's in Afghanistan and at the border with Pakistan," he added.

"The war in Iraq has taken [focus] away from finding Osama."

Bush Adviser To Join Staff Of Top War Critic (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 17, 2007

A counterterrorism adviser to President Bush is leaving the White House to join the staff of a prominent Democratic senator gearing up to investigate the administration's war policies.

A Senate source said Todd M. Hinnen, a director for combating terrorism on the staff of the president's National Security Council (NSC), will become the chief counsel for Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. Biden has announced that he is running for president and is planning a series of committee inquiries. Some Republicans reacted to word of Mr. Hinnen's move by wondering whether he will go from Bush adviser to Bush inquisitor.
